TWENTY-FIRST CONGRESS...FIRST SESSION:

FROM DECEMBER 7, 1829, TO MAY 31, 1830.

DEBATES IN THE SENATE.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1829.

At noon, the Honorable SAMUEL SMITH, of Maryland, President pro tempore of the Senate, took the chair. The roll of Senators having been called over by WALTER LOWRIE, Esq. Secretary of the Senate, it appeared that thirty-five members were present.

The usual message was sent to the House of Representatives, notifying that a quorum of the Senate had assembled.

Mr. WHITE and Mr. SANFORD were then appointed a committee to join the committee of the House of Representatives, to inform the President of the United States that quorums of the two Houses had assembled, &c.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 8, 1829.

Mr. WHITE reported from the Joint Committee, that they had, according to order, waited on the President of the United States, who replied that he would, to-day, at 12 o'clock, make a communication to each House of Congress.

Soon after which, a written message (which will be found in the Appendix) was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. DONELSON, his Secretary.

The message was read, and, on motion by Mr. ROWAN, it was Ordered, That four thousand five hundred copies of the message, with one thousand five hundred copies of the documents accompanying it, be printed for the use of the Senate.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 9, 1829.

The Senate, this day, elected its several standing committees: and on motion of Mr. SANFORD, it was Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to consider the state of the current coins, and to report such amendments of the existing laws concerning coins, as may be deemed expedient.

HONORS TO THE DEAD.

Mr. ELLIS having announced the death of his colleague, the Honorable THOMAS B. REED, of Mississippi, submitted the following resolutions, which were unanimously agreed to:

Resolved, That the members of the Senate, from a desire of showing every mark of respect to the memory of the Honorable THOMAS B. REED, deceased, late a Senator of this body, from the State of Mississippi, will go into mourning for one month by wearing crape on the left arm.

Resolved, That, as an additional evidence of respect to the memory of the Honorable THOMAS B. REED, the Senate do now adjourn.

[From the 10th to the 22d of December, inclusive, there was no business transacted to give rise to debate. The Senate was principally occupied in receiving and referring petitions, and disposing of motions for inquiry, &c.]

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 23, 1829.

INTEREST DUE TO CERTAIN STATES.

The bill providing for the allowance of interest to certain States therein mentioned, on such advances made by them to the United States, during the late war, as have been or may hereafter be refunded to them, with the amendments of the Committee on the Judiciary to the bill, were taken up in Committee of the Whole. The amendments, viz: To provide for the payment of interest due to the States of Rhode Island and New Hampshire, were agreed to; and, on motion of Mr. IREDELL, the bill was further amended by inserting the State of North Carolina; and the question being on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading—

Mr. BENTON expressed some repugnance at voting for the bill, until he was better informed of the consequences which might attend that vote, and how far the accounting officers of the Government might be authorized to go under the bill. Formerly great rigor and exactness were observed in the investigation of claims on the Government before Congress ordered their allowance. It was a good practice, and he should be sorry to see a different and looser mode introduced. For himself, he did not know that the United States owed a debt to a single State, and if the bill proposed to authorize the accounting officers to ascertain the fact of the existence of debt to the States, and allow interest thereon, without other examination, he could not consent to it. He should himself like to see the accounts, whether for advances made in money, or for services rendered, and know whether they were rendered by order or against order, and judge of their validity. At present he was in the dark as to the whole subject of the bill; he had seen no report on it, and knew not if there was any. He desired further information.

Military Peace Establishment.

[DEC. 24 to 29, 1829.]

Mr. MARKS adverted to certain documents in his possession which would elucidate the principle of the bill, but not anticipating the consideration of the bill to-day, he had not brought the papers to the House with him. He, therefore, moved to lay the bill on the table for the present, but withdrew his motion at the request of

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, who said that the bill did not contemplate the admission of any claims for advances, or the examination of any accounts; there were none to be rendered—they had all been settled and paid—and the bill is for the allowance of interest on those claims which have been settled and paid. Instead of laying the bill on the table, he preferred postponing it to Monday, and making it the order of the day; which motion he made, and it was carried.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1829.

The Senate were engaged to-day in receiving and referring petitions and reports of committees. Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 28, 1829.

There was no debate in the Senate to-day.

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 29, 1829.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate proceeded to the special order of the day on the bill explanatory of the act to reduce and fix the military peace establishment of the United States, passed March 2, 1821.

The bill is as follows:

"Whereas doubts have arisen in the construction of the act of Congress, passed the second day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, entitled 'An act to reduce and fix the military peace establishment of the United States,' which have hitherto prevented it from being carried into execution, so far as relates to the arrangement of a colonel to the second regiment of artillery: And whereas it was the true intent and meaning of the said act, that the vacancy aforesaid should be filled by arranging to it one of the colonels in the army of the United States at the time of the passage thereof: And whereas, in the execution of said act, Daniel Bissell, then a colonel in the line, and a brevet Brigadier General in the army of the United States, was ordered to be discharged as a supernumerary officer, which order, as it affected the said Daniel Bissell, and some other officers, was held by the Senate to be illegal and void: And whereas the President of the United States has since nominated the said Daniel Bissell to be colonel of the second regiment of artillery aforesaid, which nomination the Senate have not acted upon, because they hold the said Colonel and Brevet Brigadier General Daniel Bissell to be in the army, and to need no new appointment: Now, therefore, to put an end to all doubt and disagreement upon this subject, and to enable the President to carry said act of March second, one thousand eight hundred and twenty-one, into execution:

"Be it enacted, &c. That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to fill the vacancy in the second regiment of artillery, by arranging Daniel Bissell thereto."

Mr. BENTON, in support of the passage of the bill, read the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred that part of the President's message to Congress in 1826, which relates to this subject.

Mr. SANFORD moved to expunge the preamble from the bill. He considered it wholly unnecessary, and stated that there was no instance in our Government in which a preamble to a bill was employed as a vehicle of the reasons why the bill itself ought to be passed. It was, he repeated, wholly unusual and unnecessary; and, in the present case, especially unnecessary, since all the reasons why the bill ought to be passed, were explained more at length in various other documents.

Mr. BENTON, in reply, said, that he would be sorry to be the occasion of introducing any innovations into the proceedings of this body; but if it was any innovation, he considered the present instance of sufficient importance to authorize a departure from the usual practice. It was a case, he said, which stood alone, and which, in his opinion, not only justified, but required a preamble. The object of the preamble was to explain the nature and the end of the act itself. The necessity for the preamble in this particular case, was, that the reasons for the act only existed in the secret Executive records of the Senate, and could not be known to the public or the other House unless stated in this way. There was no danger to be apprehended of its growing into precedent, nor of our bills being loaded with unnecessary preambles. He therefore hoped that the motion of the gentleman from New York would not prevail.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that precedents arise, and only arise, from the repetition of particular cases, which increase gradually till at length they become common usage. Thus, if it be acceded to in the present instance, it would be quoted hereafter in support of a repetition of it. He considered it wrong to follow the English practice in this respect, as the reports of our Committees, with which all bills are accompanied, supply the place of preambles.

Mr. HOLMES deemed a preamble nothing but an apology for legislation; and for apologies he thought there was no necessity. His chief objection to preambles was, that they rendered legislation complex instead of elucidating it.

Mr. HAYNE said, that in the good olden times, when people were not ashamed to tell the truth, bills were preceded by preambles always. They were used to set forth the object of the bill, and the means by which that object was to be obtained. It now happens that the practice is changed, and preambles have come into disuse because legislative bodies are less candid. So much for precedent, which has led us to dispense with the use of preambles. He knew cases in which it would have been well to have retained the old practice. He knew a case in which a preamble would have been of infinite advantage—he meant the Tariff law. A preamble to that act would have stated its true objects—that it was for the purpose, not of raising revenue, but for the protection of the manufacturing interests. As to the apprehensions of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] he [Mr. H.] would say that there was no danger of its becoming a precedent—on the contrary, the only danger to be dreaded was, that we may be left without a precedent for stating the grounds of our legislation. The gentleman not only objects as to the danger of its becoming a precedent for future action, but he also says that it is not proper to spread our reasons for legislating upon record. This very case, he [Mr. H.] contended, required that the reasons should go with the act. Suffer it to go to the world naked, and what will it appear? Why, that Colonel Bissell is assigned to the command of the second regiment of artillery by an act of Congress. This would seem out of course, and what, he would ask, would be the consequences? Why, that Congress undertakes to fill vacancies in the army by special acts. But this is an extraordinary case, and to prevent the possibility of its being misunderstood, we state the reasons of passing the bill in a preamble to it. Unless these reasons were spread upon record, he would hesitate much whether he should vote for the passage of the bill, as he was not disposed to search for the reasons amongst the public documents of the Senate, or the Executive archives of the Senate. He hoped, therefore, the reasons for this act would go with it, and speak for themselves to all future time. The preamble of a bill, he said, was the key to unlock the motive which induced its passage.

Mr. FOOT said that this bill required no key to unlock it. The bill was perfectly simple, and easily understood; it reads, "that the President be, and is hereby, authorized to fill the vacancy in the second regiment of artillery, by arranging Daniel Bissell thereto." As to assigning reasons for the passage of a bill he thought there was no necessity for it. He was opposed to making apologies for our public acts—he would make no apology. As the gentleman from Maryland had well observed, the reports accompanying the bills contain the reasons of our legislation.

Mr. KANE said there was some difficulty with him about this matter. The necessity which gave rise to the bill was a different construction being given to the act of 1821 by the President and the Senate. The President thought that he had not the power to arrange General Bissell to the command of the second regiment of artillery, and the Senate, on the contrary, thought he had the authority to do so. A bill has been formed for the purpose of settling the difficulty. If the bill pass in the proposed form, without the preamble, we call upon the President to sign a bill stating that to be right which he has declared or believed to be wrong; we call upon him to sign against his conviction. As he stated before, the President denies that he has the authority which the bill supposes. He moved to amend the motion of the Senator from New York, by striking out all from the word "artillery" to the words "And whereas," exclusive.

Mr. SMITH said that this very motion showed the impropriety of introducing preambles into bills. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAYNE] considered a preamble necessary to show the intent and meaning of an act; and he said that if a proper preamble had been placed before the tariff bill, the objects set forth would be widely different from what was there stated. His opinion was, that the preamble was wholly unnecessary; if it prevail in one case it must prevail in all, and the result will be that, instead of discussing bills, we will be employed in the consideration of preambles.

Mr. DICKERSON said he would vote against striking out the preamble in this particular case, though he objected to the general use of it. In reply to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HAYNE] who expressed his regret that a preamble was not introduced into the Tariff bill, Mr. D. read the preamble of the act of 1789, laying duties, which was as follows:

"Whereas it is necessary for the support of Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandises, imported."

Mr. HAYNE said the gentleman had given the best reason why the practice ought not to be dispensed with. If the real object of the Tariff act of 1828 had been prefixed to it, we could then have gone to the judiciary and tested the constitutionality of that law.

Mr. KANE, with the consent of the Senate, so modified his amendment as to read, "And whereas it was decided by the Senate to be the true intent and meaning," &c.

This amendment was agreed to—Ayes 21, Noes 15.

The question on striking out the whole preamble was next taken, and negatived—Ayes 19, Noes 20.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, inquired whether the person referred to in the bill would be entitled to his pay for the time from which he was deranged to the time when he is to be arranged.

Mr. BENTON replied that each officer was obliged to give a certificate of honor that he was employed, and had incurred the usual expenses, during the time for which he claims pay, before he is entitled to any emolument.

The question of engrossing the bill for a third reading being stated,

Mr. BIBB asked the yeas and nays. He said he was equally opposed to the principle of the preamble and the bill. He thought the decision of the President right and this bill wrong. He was also opposed to paying any man a sum of perhaps fifteen thousand dollars, who had rendered no service for it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH moved to lay the bill on the table. He thought the bill could be amended by the insertion of a clause, providing against the payment of this individual for the time he has been out of service.

The motion was agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1829.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

The following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. BARTON, was taken up:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a uniform national currency for the United States, and to report thereon to the Senate."

Mr. BARTON said that, in offering this resolution to the Senate, his chief object was to produce inquiry into the subject, which he viewed as one of importance. If the resolution was adopted, he should move to refer some documents in relation to the subject to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BENTON said the resolution was a very important one, and he therefore hoped that the gentleman who had moved it would state what objects he had in view in offering it.

Mr. BARTON was proceeding in compliance with the request of his colleague, to state his reasons for offering this resolution, which he said he would do in general terms, when—

Mr. BENTON rose and stated that he had mistaken the nature of the resolution proposed. His impression was, that it was the resolution proposed yesterday by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. FOOT] in relation to the public lands, which was under consideration.

Mr. SANFORD hoped that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTON] would still proceed to state his object.

Mr. BARTON declined this for the present. He thought a better opportunity would be afforded for this in a report from the Committee, and any explanatory observations he had to make would be more appropriate when the subject should come to be considered by the Senate. In the mean time, he would state that although he was one of those who believed in the advantage of a well regulated paper currency, he did not claim the merit of originating this proposition. As respected it he was merely the disciple of others.

The question on the adoption of the resolution was carried in the affirmative, nem. con.

Mr. BARTON then moved to refer to the Committee a volume containing sundry printed papers on the subject of a national currency, among them a memorial signed by Thomas Law, Esq. of this city, Walter Jones, Esq. and others, some years ago presented to Congress, and an essay on the subject, addressed to the Columbian Institute, by Mr. Law.

The motion was agreed to, and the papers were referred accordingly.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

The following resolution, offered yesterday by Mr. FOOT, was taken up for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of limiting for a certain period the sales of the public lands to such lands only as have heretofore been offered for sale, and are subject to entry at the minimum price. And also, whether the office of Surveyor General may not be abolished without detriment to the public interest."

The resolution having been read,

Mr. BENTON hoped that the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. FOOT] would take notice of the request he had made to another gentleman, [Mr. BARTON] but which was intended for him.

Mr. FOOT replied, he certainly would take notice of the challenge given by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON] although he had hoped the very terms of the resolution would be sufficiently explanatory of its purport. He had, he said, been induced to offer that resolution from the circumstance of having examined the report of the Commissioner of the Land Office, at the last session, by which he ascertained that the quantity of land which remained unsold at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, exceeds 72,000,000 of acres. In addition to this inducement, he was actuated by another: On examining the report of the Land Commissioner, made during the present session, in which he found the following words: "There is reason to believe there will be an annual demand of about one million acres land, which will probably be increased with the progress of population and improvement, &c. That the cash sales in one district in Ohio, where the lands were of inferior quality, and not more than three or four hundred thousand acres for sale, amounted to $35,000; and in other places, where there are immense quantities, and of very superior quality, the sale, during 1828, amounted to only $2,000."

From this statement of the Commissioner, Mr. F. said, he was induced to institute an inquiry into the expediency of stopping, for a limited time, this indiscriminate sale of public lands, and whether the public interest did not demand that an end should be put to it. His own State, every State in the Union, was interested in it, since there lands are the common property of the United States. If the fact was as it was stated in the Commissioner's report, the subject was worthy of inquiry. Mr. F. thought it was better to confine the sales merely to those lands which have been already brought into market; an inquiry into the expediency of which was all that his resolution proposed. As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had observed, this was a subject which involved important interests; the whole United States have a deep interest in it; and as such, he hoped that he had a right to make the proposed inquiry. These were the reasons, which he said he stated briefly, why he was induced to offer the resolution.

Mr. HOLMES made an inquiry as to that part of the resolution relating to the propriety of abolishing the office of surveyor general. There were, he said, five survey districts in the United States; one northwest of the Ohio, one south of Tennessee, one in Missouri, one in Alabama, and another in Florida. These officers in the districts he had mentioned, were known by different names, some were called surveyors, and others surveyors general. He wished to know, did the gentleman from Connecticut mean to extend his inquiry to all these States.

Mr. FOOT said, he was not aware of any difference in the names of the officers when he submitted his resolution. His object was to inquire if the office of surveyor ought not to be discontinued, if it should appear that surveys were no longer necessary. He wished his resolution to include surveyors as well as surveyors general. His object was to abolish the office, if the quantity of land already surveyed was considered sufficient for the demand.

Mr. BENTON said, that he did not challenge the right of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FOOT] to offer resolutions. He, himself, was not opposed to resolutions: on the contrary, he thought they presented the best mode of presenting subjects for discussion. They presented the principle, or object aimed at, in its simplest form, unconnected with the details which trammel and encumber it in a bill. It was then debated on its own merits. If, after discussion, it went to a committee, it went with the advantages of being illuminated by all the light which the intelligence of the whole body could shed upon it. He was willing to discuss this resolution. He wished to do so. It was one of infinite moment to the new States in the West. It was a question of checking the emigration to them. To stop the surveys, to suspend the sales of fresh lands, was an old and favorite policy with some politicians. It had often been attempted. The attempts were as old as the existence of the Government. He wished to have a full debate, and a vote of the Senate upon that policy. He knew the mover of the resolution [Mr. FOOT] to be a direct man, who would march up firmly to his object. He would, therefore, suggest, that he had better change the form of his resolution; give it an imperative character; make it a resolution of instruction instead of inquiry. He paused to give the Senator an opportunity to say whether he would thus modify his resolution.

Mr. FOOT acknowledged the kindness of the gentleman from Missouri, but he must say that he had not the vanity to pretend to understand this subject, and therefore could not consent to give the resolution that peremptory character which he (Mr. B.) wished for. His object was inquiry—to obtain information. When the committee shall have reported on the subject, then would be the time for gentlemen to submit their views on it. He was not disposed to alter the phraseology of his resolution. He preferred to act upon it as it was.

Mr. BENTON said that the refusal of the gentleman to modify his resolution could not prevent him from treating it as a resolution of instruction. He could still oppose it, and give his reasons for doing so. It was not usual [Mr. B. said] to oppose the reference of resolutions of inquiry; but this was a resolution to inquire into the expediency of committing a great injury upon the new States in the West, and such an inquiry ought not to be permitted. It was not a fit subject for inquiry. It was immaterial to him what the design or object of the mover might be, the effect was what he looked at, and it was clear that the effect, if the resolution should lead to correspondent legislation, would be to check emigration to the Western States. Such would be its inevitable effect. [Mr. FOOT here shook his head.] The Senator from Connecticut shakes his head, but he cannot shake the conviction out of my head, [said Mr. B.] that a check to Western emigration will be the effect of this resolution. The West is my country; not his. I know it; he does not. I know the practical effect of his resolution would be to check emigration to it; for who would remove to a new country if it was not to get new lands? The idea of checking emigration to the West was brought forward openly at the last increase of the tariff. The Secretary of the Treasury gave it a place in his annual report upon the finances. He dwelt openly and largely upon the necessity of checking the absorbing force of this emigration, in order to keep people in the East to work in the manufactories. I commented somewhat severely upon his report at the time. I reprobated its doctrines. I did it in full Senate, in the current of an ardent debate, and no Senator contested the propriety of the construction which I had put upon the Secretary's words. No Senator stood up to say that emigration ought to be stopped for that purpose; but systematic efforts go on, the effect of which is to stop it. The sentiment has shown itself here in different forms, at various times, and has often been trampled under foot. The resolution now before us involves the same consequence, but in a new phraseology. What are the lands to which the gentleman would limit the sales? What are they that could be sold, if his resolution should take effect? Scraps; mere refuse; the leavings of repeated sales and pickings! Does he suppose that any man of substance would remove to the West for the purpose of establishing his family on these miserable remnants? They are worth something to those who are there, to farmers whose plantations they adjoin, to settlers who have made some improvement upon them; but they are not the object to attract emigration. The man that moves to a new country wants new land; he wants first choice; he does not move for refuse, for the crumbs that remain after others are served. The reports of the registers and receivers show the character of these seventy millions to which the gentleman refers, and which alone would be in market under his plan, to be such as I have represented it; the good land all picked out, inferior and broken tracts only remaining, such as may be desirable for wood, or outlet, or to keep off a bad neighbor, to the farmer whose estate they adjoin, or to a poor family, but no object to induce emigrants to come from other States. So much [said Mr. B.] for checking emigration. But I have another objection to the gentleman's plan. It will operate unequally and partially among the Western States. It will fall heavily upon some States and not touch others. How would it operate in Ohio? Not at all. It would have no effect there; all her lands have been surveyed, all have been offered for sale, all would, therefore, still be in market, under the gentleman's plan; every acre within her limits would be open as ever to sale and settlement. How would it operate in Louisiana? I wish the Senators from that State would answer the question. It would stop the surveying where millions are yet to be surveyed; it would stop the sales where millions are yet to be sold; it would lock up twenty-five millions of acres of her soil! it would prevent twenty-five millions of acres from being surveyed and sold! Such [said Mr. B.] would be the difference of the operation of this plan in the two States of Louisiana and Ohio. The Federal Government has done nothing towards settling Louisiana, for I count as nothing the two hundred thousand acres which she has sold in a quarter of a century. The Kings of France and Spain gave the five millions of arpents which compose its settlements. For all that the Federal Government has done, that State would now be a desert; and the effect of this resolution would be to crown the policy that has held her back, by locking up twenty-five millions of her soil from further use. This, however, is a subject of too much moment to be disposed of in this brief way, or to be sent to a committee of inquiry. I have not risen to speak to it, but to make a motion—not a motion to lie on the table, for I dislike that mode of getting rid of a subject—but to move to place the resolution upon the calendar, to make it an order for some future day, that the Senate may discuss and act upon it after the holidays, when the members are all present.

The Public Lands.

Mr. NOBLE said it was unusual to vote against a resolution simply of inquiry, but the object of the one now before the Senate was too palpable to be misunderstood. When [said Mr. N.] I see such a disposition manifested on this floor, as that which dictated the resolution of the gentleman from Connecticut, I cannot be silent. He well recollected, and he supposed it was within the memory of many members of the Senate, when the governor of a State in that region of country, (alluding to New England) submitted to the Legislature of the State over which he presided, a message urging a measure similar to that embraced in the present resolution; and we as well recollect the feelings of public indignation with which it was treated. If gentlemen were determined to press the resolution forward in its present form, they might do so; it will still be a legitimate subject for discussion after the committee shall have reported. But, as it had been observed, he would prefer to meet it at the threshold. He would move, therefore, that it be laid on the table, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. HOLMES expressed his regret, at so early a stage in the new administration, to see symptoms of an inclination to prevent inquiry. He supposed that the operation of inquiry would be certain; he had expected that it would be necessary to institute an inquiry to discover whether any offices existed in our Government which were sinecures, in order that they might be abolished. It was not [he said] his motive, in supporting the adoption of this resolution, to check emigration to the West. When the people go there, they are still our people; the Western States are a component part of our common country, and he trusted in God they would always remain so. He was not an advocate of the exclusive or sectional legislation. But the fact here developed is, that there are seventy-two millions of acres of land at present in the market, of which it appears that only one million a year can be sold. We have, therefore, from these calculations, enough to supply the market for seventy-two years to come. If, then, at the end of seventy-two years, a similar inquiry to that now contemplated is proposed, it might then be said that the motive which induces it is a desire to check emigration to the West. Suppose, according to the reasoning of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON] that it is all refuse land—all poor land; then certainly there is much need of inquiry; very much indeed. How, he would ask, has it happened that these surveyors have surveyed land which is good for nothing? How has it happened that so many thousands of dollars have been appropriated to survey lands which no one will inhabit? Does not this state of things indicate the necessity of instituting an inquiry? If this office of surveyor is a sinecure, he hoped the doctrines of the day would be extensive in their operation, and that all sinecures would be abolished. If officers have surveyed seventy-two millions of acres of bad land, of which one million only is sold every year (whereby it will last for seventy-two years) should we not inquire why it is so? Should we not inquire why this state of things has come to pass? He would ask, was it not important to institute the inquiry, even for this cause alone? He never changed his views as to the propriety and necessity of making inquiries; he was always in favor of them; he would prune wherever it was necessary; he would never spare the knife. He was an advocate of "reform" in the true and legitimate sense of that term—not of that species of "reform" which reforms a good man out of office and puts a bad one in; which removes an opponent for the purpose of substituting a favorite. When we do not want officers let us discharge them.

Mr. H. said, he recollected being a member of a committee in 1817, in the House of Representatives, to inquire into the abuses which, it was thought, had crept into the Executive Departments. That committee was supplied with large powers; they could call for persons and papers, and could issue subpoenas ad testificandum. So "searching" were their "operations," that they were repeatedly obliged to exercise their powers. The result of our labors was, [said Mr. H.] that the different heads of the Departments united together and gave us the basis of the act of 20th April, 1818. He was, he said, in the Senate in 1821, a member of the Committee on Finance, which was then employed in reforming abuses in the customs, and exerted his humble talents in passing the act of the 7th May, 1822. He recollected, also, being once associated with the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON] on other subjects of reform; he meant the control of Executive patronage, and the abolition of useless offices. The gentleman from Missouri was chairman of the committee, and made the following able report, to which he [Mr. H.] would beg leave to call the attention of gentlemen for a few minutes. Mr. H. then read the following passage:

"Mr. BENTON, from the Select Committee to which was referred the proposition to inquire into the expediency of reducing the patronage of the Executive Government of the United States, made the following report: That, after mature deliberation, the Committee are of opinion that it is expedient to diminish or to regulate by law the Executive patronage of the Federal Government, whenever the same can be done consistently with the provisions of the constitution, and without impairing the proper efficiency of the Government. Acting under this conviction, they have reviewed, as time and other engagements would permit them to do, the degree and amount of patronage now exercised by the President, and have arrived at the conclusion that the same may and ought to be diminished by law."

Executive patronage! From all this, and what else he had observed, he had come to the deliberate conclusion that the Executive patronage "has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished." Mr. H. proceeded to read a few other passages from the same report, as follows:

"The King of England is the 'fountain of honor;' the President of the United States is the source of patronage. He presides over the entire system of Federal appointments, jobs, and contracts. He has 'power' over the 'support' of individuals who administer the system. He makes and unmakes them. He chooses from the circle of his friends and supporters, and may dismiss them, and upon all the principles of human action will dismiss them, as often as they disappoint his expectations. His spirit will animate their actions in all the elections to State and Federal offices. There may be exceptions, but the truth of a general rule is proved by the exception. The intended check and control of the Senate without new constitutional and statutory provisions will cease to operate. Patronage will penetrate this body, subdue its capacity of resistance, chain it to the car of power, and enable the President to rule as easily, and much more securely, with than without the nominal check of the Senate."

"Your Committee have reported the six bills which have been enumerated. They do not pretend to have exhausted the subject, but only to have seized a few of its prominent points. They have only touched in four places the vast and pervading system of Federal Executive patronage: the Press, the Post Office, the Armed Force, and the Appointing Power. They are few, compared to the whole number of points which the system presents, but they are points vital to the liberties of the country. The Press is put foremost because it is the moving power of human action: the Post Office is the handmaid of the Press: the Armed Force its executor: and the Appointing Power the directress of the whole. If the Appointing Power was itself an emanation of the popular will, if the President was himself the officer and the organ of the people, there would be less danger in leaving to his will the sole direction of all these arbiters of human fate."

Solemn language, this, said Mr. H. The Committee reported six bills, in one of which is this extraordinary provision:

"SECT. 2. And be it further enacted, That in all nominations made by the President to the Senate, to fill vacancies occasioned by an exercise of the President's power to remove from office, the fact of the removal shall be stated to the Senate at the same time that the nomination is made, with a statement of the reasons for which such officer may have been removed."

These six bills were reported in the session of 1826, and in that session it was too late to act upon them. During the next session they were not called up. The succeeding session [Mr. H. said] he was not here, but he understood they had not been called up since.

Mr. H. said he was pleased that any subject occurred in the Senate, which enabled him to call their attention to this able report of that able chairman. He presumed that that gentleman, as he himself did, entertained the same views now as at that period. The Executive patronage is increasing, and do what we will, it always will increase: for the more power a President assumes, the more popular will he become. Mr. H. was desirous that this inquiry should be instituted, especially in these days of reform, when the people are expecting retrenchment. The people have been promised this, and we must fulfil that promise. We should inquire whether there are any useless officers; and if there are any, they ought to be discharged. It would seem the land surveyors had nothing to do; not at least for seventy years and upwards. He wished to see whether the land was valuable or not, and whether surveyors were any longer required. If the land is not valuable, why has it been surveyed? If these officers are useless, we ought to prune, and not to spare the knife. These facts [said Mr. H.] imperatively demand inquiry.

He would not, he said, detain the Senate any longer, as it seemed probable that the subject would come up again. He hoped that no feeling to prevent inquiry would deter gentlemen from voting for this resolution. He was against employing officers who had nothing to do: he was opposed to sinecures. Mr. H. concluded by stating, he was willing to facilitate emigration to the West, but that he was opposed to the increase of the Executive patronage, and he hoped that in this respect the gentleman from Missouri retained his former sentiments.

Mr. BENTON immediately rose, when Mr. HOLMES sat down, and said that he had seen all that before; that a newspaper had been sent to him last summer, containing the extract from his report, which the gentleman had read; also a train of remarks similar to the gentleman's, and an interrogatory like his. He had not given any answer to an anonymous writer; but since the same process was gone over in the Senate, and by a Senator in his place, he would reply to it, and say that the two years which followed the making of that report, were not favorable to his object—that it was an unpropitious season for enlarging the rights of the people. If this answer was not sufficiently explicit, Mr. B. would be more particular. [Mr. H. said the answer was sufficient.] Mr. B. proceeded to remark upon the suppression of inquiry. He denied that there was any attempt to suppress on his side, but rather on the other. He was for discussion, ample discussion in full Senate, and upon an appointed time. Does that look like suppression? Does it deprive the Senator from Maine of any right? On the contrary, does it not enlarge the exercise of his rights? For, if the resolution goes to the Committee named for it, he not being a member of that Committee, will have no share in the inquiry; but if it is discussed here, he takes his full part in the discussion. Does he call that suppression? Mr. B. returned to the resolution, not for the purpose of debating it now, but to say that he would debate it hereafter. That he would trace the progress of these measures to check emigration to the West through a series of forty-four years. Since all that time a system of measures had been pursued—he did not speak of their design, but their effect—to check emigration to the West. He was able to trace these measures, and would do it. It was time to arrest them—time to make a stand—to face about; and to fight a decisive battle in behalf of the West. He acquiesced in the motion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NOBLE] but wished a longer day. The young West, [he said] had been saved from an attempt to strangle it in the cradle, forty years ago, by Virginia and the South. The Senators of Virginia are now absent, engaged in paramount duties at home. He wanted their presence again, now that the old and persevering policy which would check emigration—not to Ohio, but to the further West and South West, was to have a formal decision. He would, therefore, move a longer day, to allow time for these Senators to arrive; he named Monday week.

Mr. NOBLE acquiesced in the day named.

Mr. HOLMES added a few remarks. The subject in his opinion imperatively demanded inquiry; and as he saw and knew something of surveys, he thought it required a thorough examination. He wished that a Select Committee should be appointed for the purpose. It was absolutely necessary, since it was seen that surveys had been made and large appropriations of money; and such a large quancity of the land remained unsold. He would call the attention of the Committee to another fact. There was a district in Ohio, where the surveyor general lived three or four hundred miles from the land which he is employed to survey. He [Mr. H.] was desirous to have an inquiry made into this matter; for, he was of opinion, that the object of having a surveyor general, required that he should be where the land to be surveyed lies. He hoped, therefore, that an inquiry would be instituted, and a full report, upon which the Senate could act, would be made.

Mr. WOODBURY said he deemed it an act of comity to accede to the motion made to postpone the consideration of this resolution, especially as the mover and supporter of it had expressed a wish to have the subject debated again. But if the time required is refused, he would, with his present knowledge, be disposed to vote against any proposition tending to stop the surveys. He would treat the subject as an individual private owner would. The public lands belonged to the Union at large, and were deemed valuable property. The Indian title has now been extinguished to about one hundred millions of acres, which have not been surveyed, and individual buyers cannot make a selection out of them until the surveys are made, and the lands put in the market; with a wider field to select from, purchasers could accommodate themselves better, and would give a higher price. In addition, he considered it an act of justice to the States: for, in some, these surveys have been nearly completed, and in others much less done. To stop now would be considered favoritism. It was due to the new States equally to survey the lands: for, if they are not surveyed and offered for sale, how are they to increase their population, their wealth, and their resources? The public, also, have a deep concern, from considerations of sound political economy, that the best lands should be occupied first. Then the same quantity of labor will produce larger crops and income. Poor lands ought not to be occupied till they are the very worst uncultivated in the country. The same information which he had on this subject, and which, in a like case, would govern his private conduct, would now govern his public conduct, as an agent for the public. But further debate might throw new light upon the question, and, from courtesy to those desiring it, he should certainly vote for the postponement.

Mr. FOOT said he had not the least objection to postpone the consideration of this resolution, although it was an unusual motion to postpone a resolution for inquiry merely, and make it the special order of a day. He agreed with the gentleman from Missouri, that the Southern and Western States were greatly interested in this question. The States of Illinois, Alabama, Missouri, Mississippi, and Louisiana, were; and from these States are all the members of the Committee to which the inquiry would go. As to preventing emigration, or any hostility to the West, he disclaimed any such intention; but he objected to this mode of disposing of the resolution.

Mr. BARTON said he approved of the suggestion to appoint a Select Committee. The question now was, whether we should go on with the surveys; whether the officers were properly arranged, or whether there were too many of them. As to going on with the surveys, the officers are already appointed for that purpose. The exploration of the country, the making of correct maps of it, rendered it important to go on with the surveys, whatever might be decided as to the details of the public lands. He said he would not vote in favor of the postponement of the resolution, but he hoped that a Select Committee would be appointed, instead of sending the inquiry to a Standing Committee.

The motion to postpone the consideration of the resolution till Monday week, and to make it the special order of the day, was then agreed to; and the resolution was postponed accordingly.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

The bill authorizing a subscription of stock in the Washington Turnpike Road Company was read the second time, and considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDRICKS having explained the nature and object of the bill, the importance of a speedy completion of the road, in a national point of view, and the prospects of the tolls remunerating the holders of stock, by liberal dividends—

Mr. DICKERSON desired more time for deliberation, and for affording to absent Senators an opportunity of voting. After some conversation between Mr. HENDRICKS, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. DICKERSON, the bill was postponed to Monday week, and made the special order for that day.

[The bill authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe for four thousand five hundred shares of the stock, and appropriated ninety thousand dollars for the purpose.]

Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 4, 1830.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. SANFORD presented a petition from a meeting of the citizens of the city of New York, asking the protection of the United States for the Indians against injustice and oppression; and on motion of Mr. S. the petition was ordered to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BURNET moved that the memorial be printed.

Mr. FORSYTH called for the reading of it.

The Secretary proceeded to read the memorial to the Senate; and had gone on for some time, when

Mr. BELL rose, and objected to the further reading of it.

Mr. TROUP hoped the memorial would be printed, if the reading of it were discontinued. He wished to know the contents of this document; to become acquainted with the manner in which it was written, and with the matter which it contained, before any disposition was made of it by the Senate.

Mr. BELL said he asked the discontinuance of the reading of the memorial merely with a view to save the time of the Senate. He thought that the printing of the document would enable gentlemen better to understand its contents than the cursory reading of it by the Secretary.

Mr. BURNET said he would withdraw his motion to print the memorial, for the purpose of enabling the Senate to dispose of it as they might think proper.

Mr. FORSYTH said that he believed the memorial had been ordered to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. From the manner in which the memorial was presented, he was not aware of its real character. He had supposed it to be a memorial on the subject of Indian affairs generally. He now understood it, from what had been read of it, to refer particularly to the conduct of certain States towards the Indians. If that were the purport of it, he should move a reconsideration of the vote referring it to the Committee. He then moved to discharge the Committee from the further consideration of the memorial, as this appeared to him to be a better mode of effecting his object.

Mr. SANFORD said he would not oppose the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, although he did not wish to move the printing of the memorial until it was examined by a Committee.

Mr. FORSYTH repeated that he was not aware of the peculiar character of the memorial when it was first presented. He understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] to say that it had a general reference to all the Indians. If he now understood the memorial correctly, it was the memorial of a meeting held in a particular part of the country, whose object was the vindication of the alleged rights of the Southern Indians; if he understood it correctly, it impeached the character and conduct of the Southern States; and it did not relate to the Indians generally, but to the Indians within the Southern States alone, to the condition in which they are placed by the Southern States. It might be that the memorial was expressed in terms to which he could have no objection; but all he wished for was, that it should lie on the table, that he might have time to examine it, in order to see whether it was the case or not. If it impeached the character or conduct of the Southern States, he should object to its reference to the Committee; if not, he could not of course have any objection. As to the printing of the memorial, he was opposed to it till he examined it, and knew whether it was worthy of being printed. When, therefore, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURNER] moved to have it printed, he [Mr. F.] called for the reading of it in order to ascertain whether it was worthy of it—whether it was deserving of being spread upon the records of this body. He called for the reading, in order to ascertain its contents, which he thought was more respectful and becoming than to ask the gentleman who offered it to explain its matter. He hoped that the motion to discharge the Committee from the further consideration of the memorial would prevail, and that it should be laid on the table, that he might have an opportunity of examining it. After having examined it, he [Mr. F.] would inform the Senator who presented it whether he had any objection to the disposition of it which had been proposed.

The question on discharging the Committee from the further consideration of the memorial was put, and carried in the affirmative; and

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the memorial was laid on the table.

PRE-EMPTION RIGHTS.

The bill to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands, was read the third time, and the question was stated on its passage.

Mr. BELL said that this bill, in its operations, would produce this effect: the encouragement of future violation of the laws which regulate our public land system. This bill gives the right of pre-emption to all those who have violated our land laws by entering on the public lands, and now have actual possession of them. It gives the right to those who have thus entered these, to purchase them at the minimum price. It will confer the right on a large portion of those intruders who have entered on those new tracts of land which have been surveyed, but which have not been as yet offered for sale. It will confer the right on those who are in possession of the most eligible portions of land in the new country, and the effect will be, that when those lands are offered at public sale, the intruders who are in possession of them, will deter purchasers from bidding for them. There are many and obvious reasons, [said Mr. B.] why purchasers who already have lands, will decline interfering with the possessors of these lands when offered for sale, however eligible they may be. Compassion for the situation of these people and their families, will prevent competitors from interfering with them. There are, in fact, many other reasons to convince them of the imprudence of purchasing such tracts of land over those who have taken possession of them. These intruders then will remain in possession, and this bill gives them the right to enter these lands at the minimum price, although they might be worth four times as much. This bill, besides, allows the purchasers time which is not allowed to others; it, in effect, gives them a credit of one year. If he understood the bill, [Mr. B. said] its operations would not cease here. If its operations would end there only, the objection he had stated to the bill would still be conclusive with him; but its effects extended farther; it sanctions, [said he] an act forbidden by the laws of the United States: it sanctions intruders on the public lands, and it will sanction this as a precedent for future intruders to act likewise. How many will it not tempt to follow the example, thus to give them a title to the public lands, at the minimum price, and on a year's credit? He would ask whether this law would not encourage other intruders to enter upon the public lands, when they can purchase them at the minimum price? We cannot, and we will not refuse them the same privilege, when they ask us, which we now propose to grant. Any person who has witnessed the effect of precedents in this body, must see that this precedent will be acted upon hereafter. Thus by holding out this encouragement, the effect will be to induce other intruders to enter upon the public lands, with the hope of finally being allowed to purchase them at the minimum price. This is the natural, the probable, and certain effect of the measure proposed. It would be better to repeal all laws on this subject, and to permit a general scramble, than to pass the present law.

Mr. BARTON said, he would state briefly the reasons which influenced the Committee in reporting the bill. There had been, heretofore, some difficulty with the Committee on this subject of pre-emption rights; but he believed no difficulty on that subject existed at present. With respect to the prohibition of settlements on the public lands, contained in the old act of 1807, and alluded to by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BELL] that act did indeed prohibit such intrusions, (and it was proper enough for any government intending to sell the whole of its lands to make such provision) but the more particular object of that act was to prevent any difficulty in relation to the bature at New Orleans. The act, however, although intended to apply to that particular case, must necessarily have been general in its effects; and for this reason, and because of the many cases of hardship which arose from it, Congress had on various occasions deemed it necessary to depart from the provisions of the act of 1807, and grant pre-emption rights to actual settlers on the public lands. Inasmuch, then, as these various grants, made at different periods, in different sections of the country, together with the operations of the old law above alluded to, created great inequality in the conditions of the various settlers on the public lands, the object of the committee was to destroy that inequality, and place all the new States and Territories on the same footing. So far from its being the settled policy of the Government to prevent intrusions on the public land by others than actual purchasers, the general prohibition of the law of 1807 had been, as he had just observed, departed from in various instances, so that the bad precedent of reward in violation of the law, objected to by the gentleman from New Hampshire, had in fact been often set, and long ago. As to the policy or expediency of the measure recommended by the Committee, they were chiefly induced to report the bill in consequence of the operations of the public land system at the present time. If the gentleman from New Hampshire would turn to the documents on the subject, he would find that, for the last thirty years, the sales of the lands had netted to the Government but little more than the minimum price, while the actual settler had paid more; and that result was produced in this manner: among other causes, not necessary to detail, there was a kind of intermediate power interposed between the actual settler and cultivator, and the Government. Speculators formed a combination, and run up the price of the lands under sale, in some instances, but in a great many more cases, formed combinations to intimidate that class of purchasers who usually till the soil, and bought up large bodies of land for but little more than the minimum price; which they afterwards sold to them at a great profit. On consulting with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and learning that this system of speculation had been carried on to a very great extent, particularly in the Southwest, the question presented itself to the Committee, whether it would not be the better policy for the Government to give to the actual settler the tract cultivated by him, at the minimum price, than to give it, at the same price, to those who only purchased with a view to ultimate profit; and they had come to the conclusion that it was as much for the interest of the Government as of the cultivator and settler, that this combination of speculators should be disarmed and put down, by thus preferring the occupant. No injury could possibly accrue to the Government: for, if the only object be to put dollars into the treasury, the actual settler, under the provisions of this bill, would pay as much as the speculator; while, on the other hand, encouragement would be given to a most interesting and meritorious class of our fellow-citizens, the cultivators of the soil.

By the pre-emption policy, we would be sure to place the lands in the proper hands of those whose occupation it is to cultivate them. These are usually a class of men who have not much money or other means of competition at the public sales. Wherever this can be done without injury to the public, it should be done by every Government. As a source of revenue is by no means the most important view of our public lands, they ought, in his opinion, to be considered as a fund, with which to elevate the numerous non-freeholders of our country to the proud rank of freeholders; and to give them new interests in their country, and new motives to promote its prosperity and protect its existence. In that view, our public lands were the most important to the United States.

The supposed objection that pre-emption laws, as they are termed, gave encouragement to violators of the law, and enabled them to choose the best tracts of the public domain, was sufficiently answered [Mr. BARTON said] by the notorious fact, that it was their poverty and love of liberty, and not their disregard of the laws, or their want of patriotism, that drove them to encounter the privations of a pioneer life, and by the equally notorious and recorded fact, (which the gentleman from New Hampshire could see, by perusing, at leisure, the land documents of the United States for thirty or forty years past) that, under the operation of our land laws, our public domain had produced but a fraction over the minimum price. So that no practical injury could be done by laws which tend to place the lands in the hands of those whose occupation it is to till them, and who are generally least able to buy them, rather than in the hands of those who already have not only lands, but the means of buying more, and speculating upon the more poor and more interesting part of mankind, who actually cultivate the earth.

Mr. HOLMES said he hoped that the further consideration of this bill would be postponed, and brought up on another day. He said he would make a motion to that effect. He fully coincided in the sentiment expressed by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BARTON] that the object of selling the public lands was not so much to raise revenue as to obtain settlers in the country. He could not, however, help expressing his belief that this bill, at some future period, would encourage depredations of the public lands to a greater extent than the Committee seemed to be aware of. This bill will give to the possessors the same right to the land, and at the same price, without regard to the condition in which the land may be placed, to the quality of it, or to the improvements which may have been made upon it. He need not, he thought, state to the Senate that land was worth in one place ten times as much as in another; yet the bill had no regard to this consideration. He wished to inquire—and it was for that purpose he chiefly rose—whether the Committee was able to ascertain what was the area of these lands, how many acres they embraced, how many sections were thus to be disposed of at the minimum price. He was afraid that little encouragement would be held out to purchasers at the public sales. He hoped the Senate would consent to postpone the further consideration of this bill. Mr. H. concluded by moving to that effect, and to make the bill the special order of the day for Thursday week.

Mr. McLEAN named to-morrow week, instead of Thursday week.

Mr. HOLMES acceded to this modification of his motion.

Mr. NOBLE said that, as the subject had been brought under the consideration of the Senate, he could not remain in silence, especially on account of the expressions uttered by the gentleman from New Hampshire, that it would be better to leave the public lands to a general scramble than to pass this bill. The entering wedge [said Mr. N.] has now been introduced, and the citizens of the new States are to be left at the mercy of the tomahawk and scalping knife. The surveys of the public lands are to be checked in the first place, [alluding to Mr. FORT's proposition] and now pre-emption is denied to actual settlers; a scramble for the lands is next proposed. The history of the sale of the public lands commenced at the Congress held in New York. These lands were at one time sold at twelve and a half cents per acre, and although the possessors of them have risked their lives in settling them, yet we are told that it would be better to have a general scramble for these lands than to pass the proposed bill. He hoped that we would feel for the people thus situated, and who have risked so much in making the settlements which they ask the privilege of buying. Without money, without clothes, without bread, they have settled this country, and now they are told that the surveys of the land must cease. The partition of these lands was first commenced by forming townships, and now they are narrowed down into eighty acres. But now surveys are to cease, emigration to be checked, the actual settlers to be turned off; the plough and the sickle are to be broken into pieces. We [said Mr. N.] will resist this attempt. It is said that the people are violators of the public land laws, and would, if this bill were passed, injure the sale of these lands, by deterring purchasers from bidding for them. He, [Mr. N.] on the contrary, asserted, that, instead of diminishing, they augmented the value of these lands. He was willing that the motion to postpone should prevail, but he could not remain silent when the subject of the bill was even remotely touched upon; for our people, [said Mr. N.] whether they have schools or no schools, have common sense, and they will not suffer their members to sleep at their posts, but will call upon them to resist such measures as he had adverted to, as far as they are able.

The bill was then postponed to Tuesday week.

MASSACHUSETTS CLAIM.

Mr. SILSBEE rose and said, that, agreeably to notice given yesterday, he was about to ask leave to introduce a bill, entitled "A bill to authorize the payment of the claims of the State of Massachusetts for certain militia services during the late war;" but as this claim, which had been so long in Congress, had never been before this branch of it, he was induced to accompany its introduction here by a remark or two in relation to it. The subject of this claim, he said, had been embraced in every annual message of the Chief Magistrate of Massachusetts, and had occupied a portion of the attention of every successive Legislature of that State, for some time past; that this consideration, in connexion with the interest and the feelings of the people of Massachusetts upon the subject, made it the duty of their Representatives here to press it upon the early consideration of the Senate, without waiting longer for the action of the other House upon it. Massachusetts, one of the oldest States of the Union, had presented a claim upon the Government of the United States, for military expenditures in the course of the late war, to an amount exceeding eight hundred thousand dollars. This claim had been considered an equitable one, not only by that administration of the government of Massachusetts under which it originated, but by every succeeding administration of the State, from that period of time to the present one, and after twelve or thirteen years' application for a remuneration of the claim, a bill was reported, about two years ago, for two hundred and forty odd thousand dollars, or a little over one quarter of its amount. This bill [said Mr. S.] was accompanied by a report from the most scrutinizing officer of the War Department, stating this amount, at least, to be due, according to the most rigid principles which had ever been adopted in the adjustment of any similar claim whatever; and although nearly or quite two years had elapsed since that report was made, it has not been acted upon; yet, while this claim of Massachusetts had been pending before Congress, most, if not all, those of a similar character, from other States, had, he believed, been settled. Massachusetts [said Mr. S.] asks and expects the same measure of justice to be rendered to her which has been accorded to those other States; and she asks also, and asks earnestly, for a decision upon her claim. It has, therefore, in the opinion of her delegation, become their duty to urge it to a settlement, and to express their desire that an early report and decision may be had upon it in the Senate. With this explanation, he asked leave to introduce the bill.

Milage Bill.

The leave was granted, and the bill was read and ordered to a second reading.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 6, 1830.

MILEAGE BILL.

Mr. WEBSTER moved that the Senate proceed to consider the bill "to establish a uniform rule for the computation of the mileage of members of Congress and for other purposes," which had been yesterday laid on the table on his motion. He said he made the motion to lay the bill on the table, in consequence of the difficulty which appeared to exist as to its proper direction. He was not disposed to suggest any particular direction for the bill, but merely to place it where he found it yesterday.

The motion was considered and agreed to.

Mr. BIBB said that there had been speculations upon former occasions about the compensation bill of members of Congress, which he was not now inclined to interfere with unnecessarily. When the public mind had become quieted on this subject, he, for his own part, felt no disposition to render it again unquiet; because he did not believe that the compensation of members of Congress was too much. As an individual, he was unwilling to see legislation transferred exclusively to those who are able to defray their expenses at the seat of Government, and going to and returning from it, out of their own private funds. Nor was he disposed, although he had great respect for many gentlemen of that fraternity, [bowing to a member across the chamber] to entrust legislation to the bachelors exclusively. Whilst these were his opinions on this subject, he must state that he would gladly see the measures as to the compensation of members of Congress rest where it was placed at the time when the ferment, into which the public mind had been formerly put respecting it, had ceased. When he read that part of the bill referring to compensation, he was strongly impressed with the idea that, according to his conception of the second section of the bill, relative to the payment of members who absented themselves from Congress, it deserved some correction. Mr. B. said (and he begged leave to call the attention of gentlemen to this particular) that the bill declared that any member of Congress, who is not present in the House of which he may be a member, at some time every day during the session, will not be entitled to compensation for that day. To that rule he had the most serious objections; and his objections were founded not only on his experience of the present session of Congress, but of former sessions, when, many years ago, he was a member of this body. The absence of a member, he contended, was not evidence of his inattention to the public business. He was a member of a Committee of this House, and in that capacity, had, on one occasion, during the present session, to go to one of the offices for information for the Committee; yet, before he returned, the Senate had adjourned. He thought a member under such circumstances ought not to be deprived of his compensation. He went, as he had before said, to one of the public offices, to obtain information to enable him to discharge his duty more efficiently; and on his return to this House, he met a Senator, who informed him that it had adjourned. Was he, under such circumstances, at all culpable? He had therefore felt it his duty to call the attention of gentlemen to this part of the bill, in order that, if it should pass, this section might be amended. Mr. B. felt himself constrained to say, however uncourteous it might seem, that the bill was unworthy to be a subject of legislation. Yet, if the bill is to be taken up and passed, he thought he had stated enough to show gentlemen that the second section of it deserved correction. The Senate could not, yesterday, agree upon the particular Committee to which this bill ought to be referred. It appeared there was no Committee of the Senate to which it could be properly referred. For these considerations he moved its reference to a Select Committee.

Mr. NOBLE inquired of the President what was the title of the bill; and being informed, said that he thought it was entitled "An act to retrench." The word "retrenchment," he said, should have appeared on the margin of the bill at least. He thought that the reference which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BIBB] proposed, went against his own arguments: for, he had said that the bill was unworthy of notice; in which opinion, he [Mr. N.] fully concurred. The bill was not deserving of notice. For the last fourteen years, during which time he had been a member of this body, this was the first time that a bill had been presented, which no member was willing to receive, and which could not be properly referred to any one of the thirteen Standing Committees of the Senate. A select committee was now proposed. He [Mr. N.] was strongly induced to think, from the context of this bill, that it ought to be entitled "An act to provide materials for stump orations on the first Monday in August next." He was therefore opposed to a reference of this bill to a Select Committee; he wanted copies of it to be made, that he might send one to each of his constituents, who might then call township meetings to instruct him how he was to act. He was not afraid of the people, and he could say that the people detested the smallness of such measures as that now under consideration. Mr. N. concluded by moving to lay the bill on the table.

This motion was negatived without a division.

Mr. HAYNE said, he had but one remark to make on the question before the Senate. He thought it was only respectful to the body with which the bill originated, to refer it to some Committee, in which, if it were liable to the objections stated, it might be so amended or corrected, as to remove those objections. As the Senate had agreed that there was no appropriate committee to which it could be referred, the usual course in such cases was, according to parliamentary rules, to appoint a Select Committee for it. He therefore hoped that this motion would prevail.

Mr. FORSYTH said that, as the Senate had yesterday, according to the best of his recollection, refused to refer the bill to a Select Committee, and that therefore such a motion was not now in order, he should move a reconsideration of that vote.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to, and the bill was referred to a Select Committee.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 7, 1830.

The Senate was occupied for the best part of this day in the discussion of bills of a private nature, particularly the bill for the relief of citizens of the United States who have lost property by the depredations of certain Indian tribes. Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 11, 1830.

The Senate spent nearly the whole of this day's sitting in considering the bill which was before them on Thursday last, as above noticed.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 12, 1830.

EXECUTIVE POWERS.

Mr. BARTON rose and said, that, considering all discussions of the relative constitutional powers of the President and Senate, upon matters of displacing, as well as of appointing federal officers in their nature public; and that no rule or order of the Senate made such subjects secret; he gave notice that, at the next executive session of the Senate, he would move to transfer the discussion of that question from the executive to the legislative journal of the Senate, with a view of giving to it that publicity which the importance of the subject merits.

Mr. KING said he rose to express his surprise at the course pursued by the Senator from Missouri. It is a course so entirely novel, [said Mr. K.] that I am confident that gentleman has not given to it his usual reflection. Are we thus, sir, to confound our legislative and executive proceedings? Is the executive journal thus to be made public, without the sanction of the Senate, or a notice given while in our legislative capacity, of an intention to do an act, when we shall be in our executive capacity? I hope, sir, the Senator from Missouri will perceive the propriety of withdrawing his notice, and take an occasion, when the Senate shall be engaged on executive business, to bring it forward. Should he, however, persevere in pressing it on the Senate, I am confident you will, sir, [addressing the VICE PRESIDENT,] in the discharge of the duties of your station, refuse its reception.

Mr. HAYNE said he would submit to the Chair whether it was competent for the gentleman from Missouri to make any motion in the Senate, acting in its legislative capacity, in relation to a matter which was stated to be pending before the Senate in its executive character; and if not, whether the notice of such a motion could be now received? If the gentleman desired to bring up any question on the subject to which he had alluded, he might submit a distinct resolution to the Senate, or, if he desired it, to transfer any resolution now pending elsewhere, the motion could only be made there.

The CHAIR decided the whole subject to be out of order.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 13, 1830.

PRE-EMPTION RIGHTS.

On motion of Mr. MCKINLEY, the Senate resumed the consideration of the engrossed bill to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands.

Mr. MCKINLEY rose, and replied to the objections which were made to the bill when it was last before the Senate. He stated his anxiety that the bill should pass now, as some of the lands occupied by the description of persons which the bill proposed to relieve, were advertised for sale by auction in Alabama, on the second Monday of the next month.

Mr. HENDRICKS moved that the bill be recommitted for the purpose of inserting a clause to guard against abuses under it, which seemed to be apprehended by some gentlemen; and Mr. HENDRICKS, and Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, spoke in favor of the recommitment.

Mr. BIBB, Mr. BARTON, and Mr. MCKINLEY, opposed the motion to recommit, and advocated the passage of the bill.

The question on recommitment was decided in the negative: yeas, 16—nays, 21.

The question on the passage of the bill was then decided in the affirmative, as follows: yeas, 29—nays, 12.

MR. FOOT'S RESOLUTION.

Agreeably to the special order of the day, the following resolution, submitted by Mr. FOOT, on Tuesday, the 29th ultimo, was again taken up for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of limiting for a certain period the sales of the public lands to such lands only as have heretofore been offered for sale, and are subject to entry at the minimum price. And also whether the office of Surveyor General may not be abolished without detriment to the public interest."

Mr. FOOT observed, that in twelve years' experience in legislative assemblies, it was not within his recollection that a resolution merely for inquiry had ever been made a special order: he must, therefore, consider the case as wholly unprecedented. Instances were not unfrequent in which resolutions of this character had been arrested by the "question of consideration;" such questions were generally made, where it was considered improper to make the inquiry. As he could not discover any benefit which could possibly arise from introducing this practice, he should decline giving it his sanction, by taking the lead in the debate; indeed he should feel himself placed in a very awkward situation, to be gravely debating the question, whether it is expedient to inquire into expediency. And as he had not the vanity to think it was in his power "to enlighten" this, or any other committee of five members of the Senate by a speech, he wished the resolution to go directly to the committee for consideration. But although he waived his right to lead, he reserved the right to reply, if in his judgment it should seem expedient; for the present he only asked the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were accordingly ordered.

Mr. KANE, of Illinois, said that, whatever might have been the most appropriate disposition of the resolution upon its first introduction, it appeared to him proper, after the discussion it had already undergone, that it should now be disposed of by an expression of the sense of the Senate upon its principle. If there are, [said Mr. K.] any portion of the people of this country who look to the accomplishment of purposes like those indicated by this resolution, and by kindred efforts elsewhere made, and their hopes not to be realized, the sooner they know it the better. Should, on the other hand, the fears of the people of the new States be alarmed at such projects, simultaneously brought forward in both Houses of Congress, the more speedily they are undeceived the better. The character of the resolution is so peculiar, that the opinions of a Committee will not tend to recommend it to the Senate. No fact is called for, and no state of facts can justify the adoption of its principle. It is a mere direction to the Committee of Public Lands to express their opinion upon a theoretic proposition. A reference for such an object is unusual, and can accomplish no good. The business of standing committees of this body is to examine into matters that cannot, consistently with the ordinary despatch of public business, be examined by the House itself: opinions upon principles are formed by gentlemen for themselves, and reports of committees cannot, and ought not, to influence them.

This resolution is any thing but what it has been represented to be. One gentleman [Mr. HOLMES] supposes that the proposed inquiry will be, whether certain principles of reform cannot be applied to surveyors of public lands; whether sinecures exist, and may not be dispensed with. How different is the fact! The Committee are to inquire into the expediency of limiting, for an indeterminate period of years, future sales of lands to such as are now in market. Of course, the business of surveying is postponed, and the office of surveyor is to be made a sinecure, and then abolished. The question is, whether a sinecure shall be created; not whether a sinecure shall be abolished. There is no propriety in connecting with the single project of thus confining sales and stopping surveys, considerations so distant and inappropriate as those referred to. The Western People and their Representatives are not to be drawn off from a course of determined resistance to this attempt to check their growth and prosperity, into discussions about sinecures and reform, which are "trifles light as air" in comparison.

The language of this resolution is too plain, its objects too pointed, to be misunderstood. It appears to me strange that this particular time should have been selected by the honorable gentleman from Connecticut to make his proposition: that, at a time when the whole people of the United States are looking with intense interest to a speedy payment of the public debt, which is to present an incident in the history of nations as remarkable as it will be favorable to the reputation of free governments, he should think it his duty to set on foot an inquiry which, in its results, may disturb one of the established sources of the public revenue. Since the year 1801, the probable receipts from the sale of lands has formed a regular item of estimate. Every Secretary of the Treasury has presented this item as one of the means of discharging the debt, and of defraying the expenses of Government for the ensuing year. In 1801, the estimate of probable receipts from this source was four hundred thousand dollars. It has since risen to more than a million of dollars. Upon what basis were these estimates formed? Upon the quantity of land at the time, compared with the probable annual demand? Constantly recurring disappointments would have followed such a calculation, as the history of every year has proved. No, sir. The estimates have been made not only upon the quantity in market at the time, but upon the additional quantity intended to be thrown into market within the year. Its quality, and more especially its locality; I speak of locality, because settlement and cultivation have usually preceded surveys and sales; advantages, real or imaginary, have induced migrations to the most distant points. The first American settlements in Ohio and Illinois were nearly simultaneous. During the last session of Congress, we were informed that, within the contemplated limits of the Huron Territory, where not a single acre of the public land has been surveyed, there was a population of ten thousand souls. Petitions have reached us from various and opposite quarters of the country, stating the fact that settlements were formed beyond the surveys, and praying for pre-emptions. I have had the honor of presenting the memorial of many of my constituents, residing in the northern parts of Illinois, representing that a large population inhabited a region not in market, and praying for the establishment of a land office, that sales may be authorized. Does the Senator from Connecticut believe that a people thus situated, either desire, or can be induced to purchase, lands in Louisiana, Ohio, or Indiana? No, sir. When you get the hard earnings of these people into your treasury, it will be for the lands and homes of their choice. Do not be deceived in the expectation of augmenting your revenue by selling them lands at a distance from their residences, and such, too, as have been in market ten and twenty years.

For the purpose of exhibiting more clearly the dangerous influences of this project upon the public revenue, and of showing how completely it will place all estimated receipts of public lands upon an ocean of uncertainty, permit me, sir, to allege and prove—

1st. That nearly half of the public land now offered for sale is unfit for cultivation.

2d. That so much of it as can be cultivated is not of equal value, and cannot be sold at equal prices.

3d. That the demand for land is large, and cannot be satisfied without a thorough change in the existing system, and a great diminution of price.

I will not fatigue your attention, sir, by going over all the voluminous documents presented to Congress, which establish the truth of these positions. I have been long convinced, that the greatest difficulty the new States had to encounter in their application to Congress for relief and a change in your land system, was to make known the whole facts in such a mode as to show that the interests of the nation, as well as of those States, equally called upon you for the change. With this view, a call was made, under the authority of this body, at the instance of an honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON] upon the proper authority, for information upon the following points:

1. Quantity and quality of land at minimum price, unsold, 30th June, 1828.

2. Probable character and value of same.

3. Length of time same has been in market.

In answer to this call, a statement from the commissioner of the general land office was made, exhibiting information received from almost every land office in the new States and Territories. It will surprise any gentleman unacquainted with the subject, to discover how much of the vast domain of this Government is absolutely worth nothing, in the present condition of the country. The register and receiver at St. Louis report that, out of more than two millions acres of unsold land, in that district, three-fourths of it is unfit for cultivation. By the officers at Huntsville, Alabama, we are informed that, out of a quantity of more than three millions of unsold land, within that district, there is a very inconsiderable part, if any, that may be termed first rate land, and they estimate the greatest portion of it as mountainous, and unfit for cultivation. The officers at Tuscaloosa, in the same State, say, that, of more than three millions of unsold land, in that district, no part of it would come under the head of first quality, and that there is not exceeding ten thousand acres fit for cultivation. Reports from other districts disclose a more favorable view of the matter. From the whole, I have selected the report of the register and receiver at Edwardsville, in Illinois, as presenting, in my judgment, a fair average view of the whole. The statement from that quarter is, that the amount of unsold land was, on the 30th June, 1828, two millions seven hundred and seventy-eight thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven acres and twenty-eight hundredths. The amount unfit for cultivation, one million one hundred and ninety-five thousand two hundred and thirty-eight acres eighty-seven hundredths. We may then, sir, safely infer, that nearly one-half of the whole quantity of land now in market is unfit for cultivation, and cannot be sold at any price. Moreover, the same documents disclose the fact, that not more than one-twelfth part of the land fit for cultivation is of that class called first quality, and although the most of this has been in market for many years, it remains on hand at the minimum price.

So long as the same price shall continue to be demanded for lands without regard to quality, so long will your sales be confined to such as are the best, and all inferior lands may be considered as withdrawn from the market. If this be true, it is at once perceived that the amount of land in market for revenue objects has been greatly over-rated. For we have seen that half of the whole is good for nothing, and that but one-twelfth part of the remainder is first rate. So that, for every twenty-four acres we have been in the habit of counting, we ought only to have counted one. The idea has been frequently suggested, that there is no demand for land beyond the quantity already surveyed. If, by this, is meant that sales must be confined to the surveyed regions, and that the same price is to be asked for all sorts of land, and that the minimum is not to be reduced, there is much truth in the suggestion. And as, under these circumstances, the demand will be very much limited, your revenue must be diminished in the same proportion. That there are people, and a great many of them, without land, who want it upon fair terms, and who are unable and unwilling to procure it, under the existing state of things, is unquestionable. Again I refer to documentary evidence to prove my position. By a message transmitted to the Senate, by the President of the United States, in the month of December, 1828, we were informed that, in the State of Ohio, there were fifty-seven thousand two hundred and eighty-six free taxable inhabitants who were not freeholders: that, in the State of Missouri, there were ten thousand one hundred and eighteen persons of the same description; and it is not probable that in any one of the new States the proportion of non-freeholders is less. In such States as Illinois and Missouri, then, more than half of the persons entitled to vote are not owners of the soil. Do you believe that these people do not want lands and homes of their own? Did it never occur to gentlemen, that the reason for this state of things was found in the fact that, for the best of your lands, you ask more than they can afford to give, and for those of inferior quality you demand the same price? As well might a merchant, in possession of a stock of goods of every variety, from the finest silks and broadcloths, down to the coarsest cottons and woollens, fix the same price upon every yard of each, and, after selling the finest, conclude that there was no market for the remainder, though he should see the great body of his neighborhood without cotton shirts and woollen blankets. But, sir, upon this branch of the subject, I will detain you no longer.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

I think I have succeeded in showing that, when the objects of this resolution are accomplished, the interests of the nation will be more generally affected than has been supposed. It is to the especially injurious consequences of this measure upon the interests of the new States that I invite the attention of the Senate. In the first place, sir, it will be extremely unjust, because its operation will be partial to an extent not justifiable upon any ground whatever. The amount of lands in market in these several States is very unequal. In the State of Illinois, the number of acres surveyed and unsold is not less than twenty millions: in Indiana, the older and more populous State, not more than one-half that number. In Missouri, not less than twenty millions: in Louisiana, the older State, not more than three millions. In the Territory of Arkansas, about fifteen millions: in West Florida, less than half a million; and, in the Northwestern Territory, not one acre has been surveyed. How unequally will the people of these several States and Territories be situated with regard to all their prospects, domestic and political! A sense of justice, apart from every view of the organic principles of free and equal political associations, pronounces it unjust. Could any man be satisfied with the integrity of his own motives, and declare that it was intrinsically right to permit the inhabitants of Arkansas to enjoy the blessings of improved society, and the benefits of an increased and increasing population, and forbid them all by law, to the people of Florida, or the Northwestern Territory? Such must be the certain consequences of carrying into operation the principles of this resolution.

As a Representative from Illinois, were it possible for me to be governed by unworthy motives, this inequality would not furnish cause for complaint: for we have seen that the quantity of surveyed land there is comparatively large. Poorly, indeed, should I represent her character by consenting to a measure so unjust and ungenerous towards her sister States. That State contains more than forty millions of acres. By the means proposed, you not only deprive her of the use of more than one-half of her beautiful territory, but that half is by nature the most wealthy, the most desirable, and the most likely to be densely populated. It lines the shores of Lake Michigan, from whence the products of the soil are to be transported to the North Atlantic markets. It contains her extensive mineral grounds, which will give employment to thousands of your fellow-citizens, and it is intersected, at convenient distances, with the purest streams of the navigable waters which pay tribute to the great father of rivers. Is it reasonable to believe that a State, thus deprived of her choicest blessings, thus cut off from her fondest hopes, will be consoled by the reflection that her neighbors are more hardly dealt by than herself?

Need I go into argument to prove, what is so self-evident, that, whilst you close up the one-half of the lands from sale, within all the new States, and much more than that in some, you deprive them of the advantages upon which they have calculated from migration? I will not believe that such a disposition exists on the part of any man. Connected with this subject, there is a view to be taken, compared with which all I have said is insignificant. I now speak of the power of this Government, in the just exercise of its authority, under the constitution, and upon a fair interpretation of the spirit of its obligations, contracted with both old and new States, to pursue the course indicated by this resolution. I am not about to renew the argument, heretofore urged upon this floor, and elsewhere, that the lands, in virtue of the sovereignty of the new States, belong to those States. The little favor which that proposition has heretofore met with in Congress, admonishes me to forbear the argument. However clearly you may distinguish between the sovereign rights of States, and the proprietary rights of the Federal Government; whatever may be the construction of words and phrases employed to secure your authority, it is not difficult to show that, by withdrawing from market a portion of the territory of the States, or by refusing to sell the whole upon equitable terms, you, in point of fact, exceed your powers, violate your plighted faith and solemn obligations, and lay the sovereignty of the new States in the dust.

Your right to withhold a part cannot be distinguished from your right to withhold the whole of your lands within any one or all of the new States from market; and what do the rights of sovereignty, for any practical purpose, over vacant territory, amount to? The rights asserted by this resolution extend to the selling all the lands in one State, and withholding all or nearly all from sale in another. Where, sir, then, is the security for that "equal footing" of the new States, for all substantial purposes of State Government, so emphatically expressed in your compacts?

You have stipulated to admit not less than three nor more than five States into the Union, out of the lands ceded by Virginia. The time when is not fixed. Can you get round this obligation, with regard to the Northwestern territory, by refusing to survey and sell the lands therein, and prohibiting its population forever?

Surely there must be some standard by which the relative rights and duties of the Government and the new States and Territories can be justly fixed; and I am willing that the standard should be good faith. What this requires must be determined by a reference to the state of things which existed when these lands became the property of the Federal Government, the objects of the cessions, and by an honest interpretation of the meaning of the parties, as derived from their written contracts. Without intending to go into all the particulars of history connected with this view of the subject, I will content myself by saying, that the difficulties which surrounded the Congress of the Confederation induced them, in September, 1780, to invite the States having unappropriated lands to make liberal cessions for the general good. The resolution of that venerable body of the following month declares, that the unappropriated lands that may be ceded or relinquished to the United States, by any particular State, pursuant to the recommendation of Congress, of the 6th day of September last, shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union, &c. Thus, we see, the object then was to acquire lands, not to be held up in the hands of a great speculator, but to be disposed of and settled; not to be reserved from settlement as this resolution proposes. Let us proceed a little further, and see what was meant by the common benefit, for which the lands were to be disposed of. The State of New York appears to have been the first in point of time, to comply with the invitation referred to. The preamble of her act of the Legislature of the 17th March, 1780, is as follows: "Whereas nothing, under Divine Providence, can more effectually contribute to the tranquillity and safety of the United States of America, than a federal alliance, on such liberal principles as will give satisfaction to its respective members; and whereas the articles of confederation and perpetual union recommended by the honorable Congress of the United States of America, have not proved acceptable to all the States, it having been conceived that a portion of the waste and uncultivated territory, within the limits or claims of certain States, ought to be appropriated as a common fund for the expenses of the war," &c. The States of Virginia, and North Carolina appear to have had the same object in making cessions. For they both declare that the ceded lands should be a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the States as had or should become members of the confederation, "according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure." What "usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure" were here meant? Precisely what was meant by New York, when she spoke of the expenses of the war. Can it be supposed that the objects of Virginia, New York, and North Carolina, were to make the Federal Government a rich and more powerful one? Or did they intend only to remove existing embarrassments? The old Congress declared before the cessions that the lands should be disposed of and be settled, and formed into distinct republican States. The time was not fixed, it is true, within which either the lands were to be sold and settled or the States admitted. I may, however, at least infer that it was not then intended, that if, in fifty years, the land was not sold, that one half of it should be withdrawn from market, and not settled at all. My interpretation of the intentions of these parties is, that the debt was to be paid as far as might be, by sale of the lands; and the promise that they should be settled, and be received into the Union, was the guarantee that no unnecessary delay in the sale or settlement should be interposed. How different are we in the habit of considering this matter! The public domain is now considered an object of great national wealth, and it is believed to be the duty of Congress to play the part of land jobber, and hold it up for the highest prices, making the settlement of the ceded country, and its admission as States into the Union, solely dependent upon the pecuniary interests of the Federal Government. Nay, sir, I have heard it alleged, that the lands ought not to be brought into market extensively, because it would affect the prices of real estate in the old States; and I have understood that it is seriously debated elsewhere, whether the proceeds of the lands shall not be divided among the several States, not according to the proportions of charge and expenditure, but according to their representation in Congress.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

It is not wonderful that those who are willing to disregard the original understanding of the parties to these cessions should be at a loss to know what to do with so much money. To get rid of the objection that it was never intended to make this Government unnecessarily rich, and to place in its hands the destinies of ten or a dozen States of the confederacy, as this resolution proposes to do now, some States of older date, by their representatives, very kindly offer to take the money themselves, and their younger brethren into their kind keeping also. For one, I very much desire to see the day, when the new States shall neither be an object of envy or cupidity. When the people thereof can be permitted to rest under their own "vine and fig tree," without being eternally subject to the projects of other people. This time will arrive, whenever the energies of this Government shall be directed with fidelity to the honest discharge of its obligations and constitutional duties; whenever it shall in good faith dispose of the land to pay its debts, and with a view to its settlement. But if the national honor is to be sacrificed to gratify national cupidity; if the immediate and pressing interests of the new States are to be sacrificed for the remote and speculative interests of some of the old; if, for the interests of those who wish to monopolize the manufactures of the country, land is to be kept from market in the new States, that labor may be cheap in the old, it will be for the new States, embracing, as they do, the fairest portions of this hemisphere, to decide, whether they shall not accomplish the destinies to which Heaven itself invites them.

Mr. BARTON said, as he should vote differently from those with whom he usually acted on questions respecting the public lands in the new States and Territories, it might be prudent to assign his reasons. If this were a peremptory resolution, affirming the expediency of making any radical change, in that respect, that could retard the migration to the West, or lessen the facilities of acquiring lands by the settlers, and the encouragement of the great agricultural interests in the West, he should vote against it. But being a mere proposition for inquiring into the subject, and that, too, by a committee known, and mentioned by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. POOR] to come from the very States most directly concerned in this matter, he should vote for the inquiry.

It was an unusual and an ungracious thing, [said Mr. B.] in the estimation of this body, to vote against inquiries, and they had become almost a matter of course. He was not afraid to let the people of the United States, east of the Alleghenies, look fully into this matter and see the plain truth as it really exists in the West. He feared the creation of unfounded and unfavorable suspicions, by thus stepping forward, at the approach of a portion of the owners to examine how this interest of theirs has been managed, and blowing out the light, as if afraid they really would make some unpleasant discoveries, if permitted to come in and examine. Let them examine. He gave the gentleman fair notice of his prepossessions in favor of going on with the surveys and sales. We had now, [said Mr. B.] in existence all the offices, officers, and their subordinates, necessary to complete the surveys; and why arrest their progress? The survey of our country was necessary to know its physical features and capabilities; to know the rivers and streams; the prairies and forests; hills, mountains, arable lands, minerals, and the situation and general aspect of our great purchase from France, as well as of all our other domains. The surveys were necessary to correct descriptions and maps of our country; and, as the machine was now in useful motion, it would be a saving, even in an economical view, to go on and finish the surveys rather than demolish the machine, and, after a lapse of ten or twenty years, rebuild it and begin anew. The marks of surveyors, he said, like other human marks, could not last always; but, if faithfully made, they would last long enough, for the purpose of finding and disposing of our public lands. With respect to the sales, it was necessary that our Presidents, under their discretionary powers of selling public lands, should be liberal. It promoted the great agricultural class of our people; the agricultural interests of the country, which lie at the bottom of all the others as their foundation. It was upon this very ground that the late Secretary of the Treasury [Mr. RUSH] gave a correlative encouragement to manufactures. He had understood Mr. Rush only to draw an argument from the great ease with which lands were acquired and agricultural interests fostered in the United States, in favor of a similar encouragement to the other great interests of manufactures and the useful arts of mechanism; and not to be unfriendly to the growth of the West. And to that intent Mr. Rush was certainly correct. Without the manufacturing arts in our country, agriculture could not thrive, when all Europe refuses to receive the products of our soil. Agriculture feeds manufactures, and manufactures encourage and sustain agriculture, by affording it a market at home. They mutually aid each other, and are necessary to each other's prosperity. There may be details in our land laws which ought to be reformed. But the great feature of liberality in them, he should be unwilling to mar, even for a week. So long as that was retained, you might encourage and practise manufactures east of the mountains, where they must necessarily spring up first, as much as you pleased, it could never injuriously affect the migration to the West. So long as the attractions of land, liberty, and free space, are there on their present easy terms, the tide of migration will set towards them.

But why use arguments? Cast your eyes towards the West and you will see the streams of migration to your new countries setting in that direction wide and deep and unrestrainable by the manufactures of the East, which had required a high consideration in this nation, and he regretted that they were thought prejudicial to any part of the Union.

Mr. McKINLEY said he was in favor of the adoption of the resolution, not because he expected or wished the inquiry to result in the adoption of a new system, such as that implied in the resolution; but because he was in favor of a full and fair inquiry into every subject connected with the public lands. To refuse it was but to create new prejudices and suspicions, and to increase those already existing. Public attention was now directed to the public lands, with a view to the distribution of their proceeds; and every subject connected with them would of course become more interesting to the people. Although Congress had been legislating upon this subject for more than forty years, a great portion of the members from the old States were ignorant of the land system, and the laws relating to it, (and he meant no disrespect when he said so.) The reason is obvious. They did not consider it their duty to become minutely acquainted with this subject, and therefore generally left it to those who represented the States where those lands lie, to investigate and explain all matters connected with them. This [said Mr. M.] furnishes an additional reason why inquiry should not be refused. For himself, he said, he had nothing to apprehend from any investigation that might take place. And although it was a novel proceeding in the Senate, to discuss the merits of a resolution of inquiry, so far as the discussion was intended to throw light on the subject, and aid the committee in coming to a correct conclusion, he had no objection to it; but so far as it was intended to arrest inquiry, he was opposed to it. It does seem to me, however, [said Mr. M.] that the proper time for discussing the merits, is upon the coming in of the report of the committee; there being nothing now properly before the Senate, but the simple question—Is the subject proposed in the resolution proper for inquiry? Mr. M. said that, as the merits of the proposed system had been, and would probably be further discussed, he ventured to say, if the sales of public lands were confined to those which had been already offered for sale, (excluding the reverted and relinquished lands) the treasury would not receive two hundred thousand dollars a year from that source.

In Alabama there were a great many millions of acres of land which had been offered and not sold; and if no other land but that were permitted to come into the market for five years to come, not one acre in five thousand would bring one dollar and twenty-five cents, not one in two thousand would bring a dollar, and not one thousand would bring seventy-five cents, or any other price. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. KANE] had said that he was not one of those who contended that the new States were entitled to the public domain within them, in virtue of their sovereignty. Mr. M. said, he did not consider that there was any merit in holding the one opinion or the other, provided it be honestly entertained. But as it had been his fortune, or rather fate, to be the first to advance the doctrine that the new States, in virtue of their sovereignty, had a right to the public lands within their respective limits, and that the United States could not constitutionally hold them, he would now merely say that his opinion on that subject remained unchanged; and that the argument which he had delivered in this Senate some two years ago, on that subject, remained, in his opinion, unanswered. Should it again become necessary to discuss that question, he would maintain the same opinion; but while he did so, he did not ask to control the opinions of others. He regarded that question, for the present, as decided against him, and therefore should discuss all other questions, in relation to the public lands, as if they did constitutionally belong to the United States.

Mr. HOLMES wished the resolution to lie on the table for the present. He wished to offer the following resolution for the adoption of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of the Land Office be directed to inform the Senate of the quantity of public land which is now, or can be brought into the market, distinguishing in what States or Territories such lands are;

But, upon the suggestion of Mr. FOOT, he abandoned his resolution.

The people of the United States [said Mr. H.] are an inquiring people; they wish for light. If you refuse this inquiry, they will be apt to suspect that we "love darkness rather than light, because our deeds are evil, and that we will not come to the light, lest our deeds should be reproved."

We have [said Mr. H.] a report of the quantity and quality of the public lands which were in market at the commencement of the year 1828. I wish to know what quantity of land has been brought into the market since that period; what is the quality of it, and in what part of the country it is located. If on inquiry it be found proper to go on with the surveys, he should vote for this continuance and for the continuance of the officers employed for that purpose. So far as the subject has been developed, there is a large quantity of land now ready for the market; probably it was not all ready. But I believe there is a large quantity owned by the States. The States would soon become competitors of the United States: for Ohio has a vast quantity of her own land for sale; so has Indiana, and, I believe, so has the State of Illinois. Besides, there are large tracts which have been sold to speculators, (by speculators I mean those who purchase the lands, not for the purpose of settling them, but to re-sell them again) which land is now in the market. If all the lands were not sufficient to gratify the desires and wants of purchasers, (which would be ascertained by the inquiry proposed) let us then give them more. He wished the inquiry to be made, but he was desirous of having the information his resolution contemplated, before he voted for the resolution of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. FOOT.] But, as he would probably obtain the information from the Commissioner of the Land Office, or the Committee of Inquiry might obtain and present it to us, he was willing the discussion should go on; still he was surprised that any attempt should be made to smother investigation.

Mr. FOOT said he had supposed that his proposition to refer this subject to the Committee on the Public Lands, composed exclusively of Senators from the States most deeply interested, would have screened him from any imputation, and even the slightest suspicion of unfriendly feelings or sinister views, in offering this resolution for inquiry merely. His object was to obtain information, and he knew of no committee better qualified to give full information on this subject; it was their peculiar province; he had full confidence in that committee, that all the information would be communicated in their report, if the resolution should be referred to them, of which he could not entertain a doubt. But if the Senate should refuse to let this resolution for inquiry go to the committee, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HOLMES] could then obtain from the Department the information he desired, and he [Mr. F.] hoped the Senator would not delay the decision on the resolution, by renewing his motion for postponement.

Mr. HOLMES said he would not renew the motion; he did not wish delay.

Mr. BENTON opposed the resolution. He said he would not, at the present advanced hour of the day, enter into a statement of the reasons which induced him to oppose it. He would, however, to-morrow, undertake to show the mischievous consequences which would result to the new States from the adoption of this resolution, notwithstanding it only proposed, as was said, an inquiry.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The following bill, to enable the President to extinguish the Indian title within the State of Indiana, was read a second time, and considered in Committee of the Whole:

"Be it enacted, &c. That the sum of forty thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, for the purpose of holding Indian treaties, and extinguishing Indian title within the State of Indiana."

Mr. WHITE briefly explained the objects of the bill, which he said was reported in consequence of a memorial received from the State of Indiana, stating that the Legislature of that State had appropriated a sum of money for the purpose of cutting a canal through a part of the country in which a large number of Indians now resided. We all know [said Mr. W.] that there will be constant collisions between the laborers who will be engaged in the construction of this canal and the Indians who inhabit the section of the State through which it is to pass, and it is for the purpose of preventing the carnage and bloodshed which must ensue from these collisions, that this bill has been reported. It was very desirable to have these Indians removed, which could be effected much more easily at this period than when the canal will have been made through the country. The committee were of opinion that the sum mentioned in the bill would be required for holding the treaty, and for subsisting the Indians and their families while holding it. Mr. W. concluded by calling the attention of the Senate to the facilities which would now be experienced in making this purchase, and to the opportunity which it afforded of carrying into effect what was regarded as the settled policy of the country—the removal of the Indians beyond the Mississippi.

Mr. SPRAGUE objected to the amount of the appropriation contained in the bill. The sum of forty thousand dollars was much greater than could be necessary to defray the legitimate expenses of holding a treaty. He presumed, therefore, that it was intended to form a part of the consideration to be given for the lands which were to be obtained by the treaty. This he considered improper, because, if the money was paid to the Indians immediately, the treaty would be carried into effect before it should have been submitted to the Senate for their approbation and ratification; thus depriving that body of its constitutional right, and executing the treaty without their sanction. The proper course was to stipulate in the treaty what should be done by the United States—then to submit it to the action of the Senate, and, if approved by them, execute it in good faith according to its terms.

Mr. WHITE replied that the purchase money was not contemplated in the bill, but an appropriation sufficient to defray the expenses of holding the treaty. It was necessary for the purpose of entering on any negotiation with the Indians to subsist them and their families while the treaty was going on. It was also necessary to give them presents, as every one knew who was acquainted with the matter. The expense of holding Indian treaties was, he said, very great, but he did not know that this appropriation would be all required. However, if any balance remained after the object of the bill will have been accomplished, it will not be lost.

Mr. SPRAGUE said that the explanation of the Senator from Tennessee, who was at the head of the Committee on Indian Affairs, had not removed his objections to the amount of the proposed appropriation. Is the sum of forty thousand dollars necessary to defray the expenses of merely holding a treaty? With what nation does it cost half that sum to negotiate? But it was said we must make provision for presents to be made to the Indians at the time of the negotiation. He believed that he understood how this power to make presents had been sometimes exercised. When the Indians, the primitive, original proprietors of the soil, were unwilling to part with their lands, particular chiefs, or other influential individuals, were applied to, their necessities and their cupidity were appealed to, their promises and appetites were solicited, and presents were made to them to purchase their consent and their influence, to sacrifice the interest of their tribes, to betray the trust reposed in them by their nation. Such practices he reprobated, and he would not willingly put into the hands of our commissioners the means of resorting to them. He would appropriate a sufficient sum to pay our own agents and commissioners, and their necessary expenses. He would leave the other party with whom we are about to make a solemn compact, to act freely and independently, according to their own conviction of their interest. Upon these terms he would treat, or not at all. He wished not to acquire their property, nor divest them of their lands, unless it were done honestly, fairly, and justly.

Mr. HENDRICKS said he would vote for the appropriation which the bill proposed; and although it might be that the whole amount would not be required to defray the expenses of holding the treaty, yet he was confident that whatever remained unexpended for that purpose would not be lost; it would be returned to the treasury. He considered the opposition to this bill arose from a misconception, as well of its principles, as of the objects it had in view; and he was confident when gentlemen came to a correct understanding of these points, their opposition would cease. It was impossible [Mr. H. said] to treat with the Indians without making them presents. We must treat with them as they are, and not as the Senator from Maine and the Senate would wish them to be; and it would be idle to think of entering into any negotiation with them without making an appropriation adequate to subsist their women and children, who always accompany them on such occasions. Mr. H. illustrated the necessity of such an appropriation, by a reference to the treaty of the Wabash, in 1826, at which he was present. Fifteen thousand dollars had been appropriated to defray the expenses of holding that treaty—to feed them on the ground; and for that purpose the appropriation was, perhaps, sufficient. But the commissioners found it necessary to advance them goods; to one tribe upwards of thirty thousand dollars, and twenty or thirty thousand to another. For this purpose it was necessary to purchase on the ground, at exorbitant prices, to indemnify the merchants for the contingency of an unauthorized transaction, and a subsequent appropriation by Congress. It is obvious, that, under such circumstances, the Government must have paid more for advances in goods than would have been necessary if the money had been in the hands of the commissioners. Mr. H. said, we would have ample security that the funds would be reimbursed, and the advances properly accounted for, if the Senate should not ratify the treaty: for we pay these Indians, at the present time, large annuities, which place it in our power to indemnify ourselves for any loss we may sustain. We pay to the Miami Indians twenty-five thousand dollars, and to the Pottawattamies, six thousand dollars, as annuities, and we can retain these sums, and cover advances, should the treaty not be ratified. Such stipulations were made in the treaty of the Wabash, and he presumed they would be inserted in any treaty which should be hereafter made.

But to the necessity of the treaty. The Miamies, consisting of about eleven hundred souls, principally reside on a few reservations on the southern shore of the Wabash. Through these reservations the Wabash canal had already been located. True it is, [said Mr. H.] that, by the treaty of 1826, the State has a right to make this location, and to appropriate six chains in width for the use of said canal; but nothing could be more obvious or certain than that the intercourse between the Indians, and the whites already surrounding them, together with the laborers on the canal, within their own territory, would engender strifes and animosities, which would terminate in blood. This tribe, [said Mr. H.] is perhaps the most vicious and depraved on the continent. They exhibit human existence in its worst and most degraded form. Surrounded by the white population, it is impossible to exclude them from the use of ardent spirits. They get drunk, and commit murders, not only on their own territory, but in the organized counties of the State. The present seemed to be a proper time to give additional impulse to the humane and judicious policy of settling them west of the Mississippi. Various circumstances induced this belief. The Legislature of the State would probably, at its present session, extend the jurisdiction of her laws over the Indian territory, as the States of Georgia and Alabama had heretofore done. He had just seen a paper from the seat of Government of that State, which informed, that the Judiciary Committee of one branch of the Legislature had reported favorably to that object. This would strongly incline them to emigrate. He had recently been informed of another circumstance. A murder had lately been committed among themselves in the county of Cass, adjacent to their boundary. The murderer was an influential person of the tribe. He had been indicted, and well knew the penalty of the law in such cases. It was not probable he would ever be taken, nor was it desirable he should. He would go beyond the Mississippi, and his clan would follow him. Others would follow in their rear, and the inclination to sell, if not now universal, would soon become so. Mr. H. said that the Pottawattamies were much more numerous than the Miamies, and their country more extensive, but less valuable in proportion to its extent. There were but the two tribes in the State; their numbers about four thousand; their territory between four and five millions of acres. The present seemed to be a propitious moment for extinguishing their whole title, and for getting them out of the State, and he hoped the bill would meet the approbation of the Senate.

Mr. WHITE, in reply to the observations made by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. SPRAGUE] as to the presents, or rather, according to his view of them, bribes given to the Indians, remarked that they were not given secretly, as he intimated his suspicion, to the chiefs of the nation, to seduce them from their path of duty, but were given openly to the nation, to use them according to their own internal regulations. They would not negotiate without these presents, which, indeed, he thought should be more properly called a consideration in part of the value of the purchase made. The Indians divide these presents amongst themselves, and apportion them according to their notions of their rank and distinction of their headmen. Is it not better [said Mr. W.] to make an agreement with them, and pay them in the shape of presents, than to terminate all negotiations with them, as would be the consequence of the adoption of the principles advocated by gentlemen? It cannot be considered in any sense offensive to the delicacy or morals of any man. Mr. W. repeated, that there was no secrecy employed in making these presents—that they were usual—and without their being made, no negotiations could be proceeded with. No man could say what sum it would be necessary to appropriate for the presents, &c. As to the sum of the rations, we must [he said] subsidize all their families: for they, not like the whites, bring their wives and children with them to the treaty ground. If they did not, and were not confident of being supported there, they would not negotiate at all. If a treaty thus made is to be considered unfair, then he would say that no treaty has been concluded fairly with these people in modern times. Entertaining these views, [Mr. W. said] the Committee had recommended the appropriation of forty thousand dollars as sufficient to cover the expenses of the treaty. He therefore hoped the bill would be agreed to.

Mr. KING said he was opposed to the passage of the bill, not from any objections he had to the principle of it, but because he thought the appropriation was too large. From the letter of the Secretary of War, it appears that there are only four thousand Indians, who are the remnants of different tribes, now inhabiting the State of Indiana. Can any one then suppose that so large an appropriation as forty thousand dollars will be required to defray the expenses of a treaty with these miserable people? His objections did not arise from any fears he had that the commissioners would exercise an undue influence over the chiefs of the Indians, by making them presents, which gentlemen so much apprehended. Gentlemen did not understand what was meant by giving them presents, unless the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITE] had satisfactorily explained it to them. But what he objected to especially was, the distributing of goods among the Indians, while the treaty was in progress, to a very large amount, and thus rendering it imperative on the Senate to ratify their treaties, however objectionable they may be, or to lose the immense sums of money thus expended. He was opposed to this practice, and, for his own part, would never sanction it. He therefore hoped the gentlemen who supported the bill would consent to reduce the appropriation to a reasonable sum, and enable those who are friendly to its principles to vote for it. When the treaty with the Creeks and Choctaw Indians was proposed, twenty thousand dollars was only appropriated to defray the expenses of it, although they exceeded in number forty thousand souls. If the appropriation of this bill were reduced to a reasonable amount, he should give it his cordial support.

Mr. SPRAGUE said that he was not opposed to negotiating with the Indians for the objects of the bill, but to the means proposed in order to attain it. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. WHITE] supposed that he had misapprehended what was meant by the term presents. He willingly accorded to that gentleman the utmost purity of intention; but, whatever might be intended by him, he [Mr. S.] had not misunderstood the manner in which this power to make presents had been sometimes exercised. We do know, that, in order to get a treaty, secret and confidential agreements have been made by our commissioners with certain chiefs, to give them large sums to procure their assent and influence, agreements which they dared not make known to the tribe, and which were to buy them over to our interest, and to render them false and treacherous to their own people, who had confided to them a sacred trust. Mr. S. said he wished every agreement to appear on the face of the treaty, that they might know what stipulations had been made, and with whom, and, therefore, was unwilling to place in the hands of our commissioners large sums of money which they might dispose of in secret and confidential negotiations with individuals. There was no necessity for giving to our agents such a power.

It was said, indeed, that we must subsist the Indians during the negotiation, and not only the chiefs, but the warriors, and their women and children; that all must be drawn from their homes to the treaty ground; that rations must be issued for their daily food; and something in the nature either of presents or payments must be given them in hand. And why is this necessary? How do the Indian chiefs subsist themselves, in their own councils, when we are not present? what is the necessity of gathering together the females and their infants? You thereby place them in our power, and, after a short time, their own food being exhausted, we can offer them the alternative of submission to our terms, or starvation. He believed he understood what had sometimes been the process of obtaining a cession of Indian lands. The chiefs, the head men, the wisest and most sagacious, were opposed to selling their country. They were operated upon not only directly, but indirectly. Large quantities of goods and merchandise, particularly such as are most attractive to the savage taste, are ostentatiously displayed to the assembled multitude; they are told, if a bargain shall be concluded, these shall be yours; if not, even the daily food which you now receive shall be withheld; the women and children are brought to influence their husbands and fathers by their entreaties and their wants; the young and thoughtless among the warriors are made to press upon the older and more reflecting, and all to operate upon the chiefs, to subdue their firmness, and seduce them to our will. We may be told that this is the only mode of treating with the Indians, and that we cannot otherwise obtain their lands. If it be so, [said Mr. S.] which he doubted, still the end cannot sanctify such unhallowed means. These feeble remnants of once mighty nations are in our power; at our mercy. He wished to obtain no treaty from them by the weight of such extraneous aid as the measures he had described. If, without such appliances, they will not cede to us the inheritance of their fathers, let them retain it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said that a disposition had lately manifested itself to consider the savage tribes in our territory and under our protection, as already civilized, and entitled to all the respect in our intercourse with them, with which equal and independent Powers were treated in our diplomatic intercourse. The Senator from Maine, [Mr. S.] in this spirit, thinks, that to negotiate our treaties with them no other appropriation is necessary than to provide a salary for our commissioners, leaving the Indians, if I understand his objection, to provide for the salary and outfit of their own ministers. This proposition has, at least, the merit of novelty; for, from the original settlement of the country to the present day—from the first treaty held by the benevolent Penn, whose transactions with the natives will not be reproached with fraud or ill faith; whose gifts to the Indians are on record in his treaties, and whose manner of treating with them has been accurately delineated by the pencil of West—from that treaty, to the last which we have ratified, every one has been preceded by presents, and accompanied by a liberal allowance for the daily support of the nation. It is a new course, therefore, that is to be prescribed to the Executive. Heretofore, the mode of making a treaty has been to invite the head men of the nation to hear our proposals; if they accept the proposition, they come accompanied by all the warriors of the nation, bringing with them their wives, and the talk is delivered in a public assembly. It is considered by the whole tribe, and the answer is dictated by the council of the nation. All this it appears is now to be changed. The savages are to be told, we have appointed commissioners to treat with you. Do you appoint ministers on your part. We will pay ours, do you pay yours. When they meet they will exchange their full powers, and then proceed regularly and diplomatically to negotiate. No more provisions to feed your wives and children while the treaty is proceeding; no more presents: you are a civilized and independent people, and we mean to treat you as such, and the first step we take is, by making no provision for your support while the treaty is going on, to prevent your attending it. Your chiefs, who make the treaty, then cannot consult you; it will be concluded without your knowing any thing about it, and we shall have obtained your lands very diplomatically at our own price. What answers, sir, would be made to such an address, if the Indian tribe could be made to understand it? Depend on it, that if any essential change is made in our mode of treating, the treaties you have just ratified will be the last you will ever make; you must treat with barbarous or half civilized people, according to their customs, not yours. We have always done so; not only with our Indian, but with the Barbary Powers. We have necessarily done so; to refuse it would be to refuse to treat; and every one acquainted with the habits of the savage tribes, must know that they must assist at the treaty in a body, and must be subsisted while it is negotiating; and that the negotiation would be immediately and necessarily broken off if the necessary supplies were withheld. As to the amount of the appropriation, Mr. L. would be guided by the report of the Committee, having no data by which he could estimate the proper amount. There was one sentiment, [Mr. L. said,] in which he entirely agreed with the Senator from Maine, that of a marked disapprobation of any secret emoluments given, or stipulated to be given, to the chiefs who signed the treaty; gratifications to them in proportion to their rank and power in the tribe, he believed, had been usual and might be proper, provided it were known and approved by the tribe; but a secret donation he could, for obvious reasons, never approve. The passing this appropriation, however, he did not think would sanction any such proceeding.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said he was constrained to oppose the passage of this bill, and for the very reasons urged in its favor. It may, perhaps, arise from my ignorance of the subject, [said Mr. F.] but I confess, sir, that I heard with great surprise the fact announced by an honorable Senator, that it was impossible to treat with the Indians, unless we made them presents. If this be indeed so, I protest, in the face of this Senate, and of the world, that all negotiation should cease with them. Can it be that no cession of their lands can be obtained, no compact formed with these tribes, unless we bring to bear upon them the influence of our gold? That their consent is to be bought—that the only way of access is (to call things by their right names) through bribery and corruption? I can hardly accredit an intimation so humiliating to ourselves. Sir, has a fair experiment ever been made? If not, it is surely time. We owe it to our national character to adopt other means. When has the Senate ever been informed that negotiation had been fruitless, because of the absence of the corrupting agency of our money? What commissioners have ever reported such a failure for such a cause? I beg, sir, that we may meet them on equal, manly terms; such as become a great People treating with a feeble race. Let them be approached with honorable proposals; let the terms and conditions be distinctly stated; let them look at our side of the bargain full in its face, and then, if they accord a voluntary acquiescence, and conclude the contract, it will be well. I desire to see such a negotiation conducted in a spirit which this august body will approve, in which these tribes shall have acted freely, unseduced by the influence of money, and unawed by the presence of chiefs, corrupted by individual and extravagant gifts. The Hon. Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LIVINGSTON] has referred us to the Barbary Powers, and inquires whether such means are not constantly employed in all diplomatic intercourse with them? It may be so, sir. But these are distant, independent nations, towards whom we are strangers. The Indian nations are, at most, but dependent sovereignties under our guardianship, and to whom we have promised protection. And can it be for a moment tolerated, that a guardian shall, by the force of extraneous and corrupting motives, obtain from the ward his lands? Where is the tribunal that would not frown indignantly upon such a procedure? But it is said that this has been an uniform practice for many years; that it has grown almost into a prescriptive privilege. The plea cannot avail us: for we led the way; we first held out these lures to beguile; and I submit it, sir, to this honorable body, if it be not time to arrest this practice. Let us deal with these men as we do with the rest of mankind—upon open, equal, and just terms; such as our country and the world will sanction; such as future history, in its impartial retrospects, will not censure and condemn.

Mr. KING corrected a mistake which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] had fallen into with respect to the presents made to the Indians. Presents were always made to them; no treaty was ever made without them; and the Indians accept them without believing that they are offered to them as bribes. Mr. K. concluded by moving to amend the bill by striking out the words "forty thousand," and inserting, in lieu thereof, "twenty thousand."

On the motion of Mr. HOLMES, the question was divided; and the motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. NOBLE said that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] had addressed himself to the passions rather than to the judgment of the House, in the specimen of pulpit eloquence which he had given us. The gentleman has indulged in his passion; I hope, said Mr. N., I will be permitted to indulge in mine. We must defend ourselves from the incursions and rapine of these lawless tribes; and I would ask, is it against the laws either of God or man to protect ourselves from the carnage and bloodshed which these tribes inflict upon us? We are surrounded by these Indians, and are daily and hourly exposed to their rapacious violence. The object, then, of this appropriation, is to lead this people beyond our settlements, and to obtain for ourselves quietness and security. But if this appropriation is refused—if our People are to be cut off day and night, we will not any longer wait for the assistance of the Executive officers; we will undertake our own defence; and it is no easy task to persuade the brave and hardy people of the West from the pursuit of the Indians, when they have assailed our rights or property. But what is the abuse which is apprehended by gentlemen? Will not the money thus appropriated be placed under the control of the President of the United States, by whom the commissioners are to be appointed, who will have the management of it? Was not this, Mr. N. asked, a sufficient security against the apprehended abuse? Who then can doubt that it will not be properly expended? In the last war, this tribe of Indians, at the instigation of British emissaries, annoyed us very much. Their chief was a Canadian—he might call him a Canadian Frenchman. He has a house, and generally resides, at Montreal. During the war he occasionally retired there, for what purpose could not be well ascertained; but we saw enough of his operations to convince us that he was not friendly to us. What, then, is to become of us, thus surrounded? Will the Indians work? asked Mr. N. No; they will roam at large in the forests, and will plunder and destroy whatever comes across them; and if any opposition is offered to them, they will satiate their appetites in the blood of our unprotected wives and children. If, then, we have the feelings of humanity we profess, we should not hesitate a moment to make this appropriation. As to talking of holding treaties with these people as with civilized nations, it was an idle loss of time. As to what was said about leaving a blot on our national character by giving them presents he [Mr. N.] did not believe a word of it. If the gentleman from Maine [Mr. SPRAGUE] can show on what principles of natural law he can make a white man or an Indian honest, then I shall agree with him that this appropriation ought not to be made.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said that he was not opposed to the bill, as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NOBLE] seemed to apprehend, but he wished that the influence of presents to the Indians would be kept out of operation while the treaty was in progress. He repeated, he desired to throw no obstruction in the way of the negotiation.

The question on the amendment proposed by Mr. KING was then put, and carried in the affirmative.

Mr. MCKINLEY then moved to amend the bill by adding the following section:

"And be it further enacted, That no secret present, or consideration, shall be offered or given to the chief or chiefs of the tribe or tribes of Indians with which said treaty may be holden."

The amendment was agreed to—Yeas 24.

The bill being then reported to the Senate as amended, Mr. HENDRICKS rose and said, that he could not be silent when the question was about to be taken in the Senate on the amendment which had just been adopted in Committee of the Whole. He thought its adoption would be a reflection upon the integrity of the Executive, and upon the commissioners appointed to make the treaty. It would also be a reflection upon the integrity of all heretofore concerned in negotiating Indian treaties. The section offered for the adoption of the Senate, presupposed abuses which he believed had no existence. He did not know of any undue influence heretofore exercised in making Indian treaties. That which this section would remedy, was found in almost every treaty ever made with the Indians; but it was produced, not by the commissioners, but stipulated for by the Indians themselves. [Mr. HENDRICKS quoted the provisions of several Indian treaties.] Here [said Mr. H.] are brick houses provided for; reservations of land for certain individuals and families, and donations in money. These were made in conformity with the wishes of the individuals composing the tribe, who certainly have it in their power to say, that A shall receive more than B; but these arrangements never before were called bribes, nor can the officers of the Government fairly be charged with impropriety in such stipulations. Mr. H. repeated, that, as the adoption of the amendment could be considered in no other light than as a reflection on those who are constitutionally charged with the negotiation of the treaty, he hoped it would be rejected.

Mr. MCKINLEY replied, that the practice of giving secret presents to the head men of the Indian tribes with whom we treat, is of recent date, and it ought to be discouraged as soon as possible. He believed the most effectual method of putting an end to the practice was by inserting such a provision as he had proposed in the law making the appropriation. By persevering in the practice, the Senate will be, as it often has been, placed in the dilemma of either losing the money which has been expended, or of ratifying the treaty, whether satisfactory or not. Mr. McK. did not object to a necessary donation being made to the chiefs, if it were made public. Is it proper, he asked, to make presents to the head men, which the nation does not know? The less, he thought, which was given, the better: for the great amounts thus expended often rendered it imperatively necessary for the Senate to ratify bad treaties. The effect of this would be, to prevent the insertion of secret articles in our treaties: for he was of opinion that, in private as well as public transactions, honesty was always the best policy.

Mr. HENDRICKS remarked that the reasons given by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. McKINLEY] in support of the amendment, had suggested to his mind additional arguments against its adoption. It was not competent for the Senate to legislate into existence instructions to be given to the Commissioners who negotiate Indian treaties. This had uniformly been considered the constitutional prerogative of the President. The Senate, [said Mr. H.] in its legislative capacity, is no part of the treaty-making power; and legislation prescribing the duties which the constitution has plainly devolved on the Executive, is not only unconstitutional, but impeaches the integrity of the President, in pre-supposing that he would not perform his constitutional duties. While he was up, he would say a word in reply to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRANKLIN] He deprecates the practice and the unnecessary expense of collecting, on such occasions, the young men, the women, and children; says that their influence on their chiefs, who are competent to make treaties without them, is prejudicial to the Indians, and unworthy of the Government. To this class of observations, it may be replied, that the chiefs never, without the consent of the tribes, make treaties at all. This consent is never given in advance, when they can be present. Their presence is necessary to prevent the chiefs consulting in a signal manner their own interests, instead of the interests of the tribe generally; and of all the treaties ever made with the Indians, those which have been made by the chiefs, remote from the tribes they represented, have been the worst for their people. These are the treaties in which special benefits have been most liberally provided for the chiefs. When the warriors were present, with the women and children, at the treaty-ground, every thing was known, and it was almost impossible for any thing unfair to be done by either party.

Mr. ROWAN said, if it was the object of the amendment to regulate the conduct of the commissioners, in forming treaties or compacts with the Indians, it will be utterly unavailing. The intercourse between them and the Indians, during the treaty forming process, must, from the nature of the transaction, necessarily be apart from the public gaze; must be, to some extent at least, private. The intercourse between the contracting parties must be of a conciliatory character. The object will be, to make the treaty or compact; the means, in that, as in all other cases of the like kind, will be adapted to the end. Instructions cannot be graduated to every occurrence which may take place during the negotiation; much must necessarily be left to the discretion of the commissioners, subject to be eventually controlled by the President and Senate. Secret stipulations in a treaty will be unavailing, unless ratified by the Senate, according to the constitution. We ought not to presume that any of an improper character would be authorized by the President, or confirmed by the Senate. Treaties with Indians have been made, from time to time, from the commencement of the Government up to the present period, without the force of the rule contemplated by this amendment. There has been no complaint; the Government has found safety in its reliance upon the integrity of its Executive department. We have all as much confidence in the present as in any former administration. Where, then, the necessity of this rule at this time? No man in the Senate has more confidence in the present Executive than the honorable Senator who has introduced this amendment. He does not, I am sure, think it necessary to the purity of our intercourse with the Indians, under the present administration. It is agreed on all hands, that nothing like bribery should be used in the making of an Indian treaty; that nothing of the kind would receive the sanction of the present Chief Magistrate; and that this Senate would withhold its assent from any treaty obtained by corrupt practices, on the part of the commissioners. But [said Mr. R.] the Senator who introduced this amendment, will perceive, upon a little reflection, that it infringes upon the treaty-making power confided by the constitution to the President and Senate. The amendment cannot regulate the conduct of the commissioners while making a treaty; their conduct will be regulated by instructions from the President, and the constitution alone can regulate him, in making out his instructions. It cannot regulate the conduct of the Senate in approving or rejecting a treaty. The constitution will be their guide; nothing can be added to that instrument or taken from it by a statute.

Mr. R. said he was sorry to differ from his friend, who had introduced this amendment. He considered it as evidence of the purity of the sentiments not only of that gentleman, but of every member of the Senate, in relation to the subjects to which it related. But the exercise of the sentiment was enjoined by the constitution, and would be displayed as well without as with the amendment. He thought, with a very respectful deference for the opinion of his friend, that the amendment was impolitic as well as unconstitutional. It would seem to justify the inference that bribery had been heretofore practised in obtaining Indian treaties. He should feel himself constrained to vote against the additional section proposed.

Mr. BENTON remarked that we had been in the habit, for upwards of half a century, of making Indian treaties, and no such provision as that now proposed had ever been inserted in a bill.

Mr. FOOT said the Senator from Indiana, or himself, certainly misunderstood the amendment offered. He [Mr. F.] did not consider it as applying to the customary presents to the tribe, or to articles in Indian treaties, making special reservations in favor of particular chiefs. These were not secret, being embodied in the treaty, and known to the whole tribe. This amendment was intended to prohibit "secret presents" to any influential chiefs, to induce them to sell the reservations of land belonging to the tribe. He felt some delicacy in discussing this subject in legislative session, but thought he might safely say, without violating any rules, that the Senate had not, as yet, ratified any treaty in which it appeared such secret presents or annuities had been given. But he considered it indispensable that this restriction should now be imposed, for reasons which could be stated here, but which every Senator would fully understand, and he should most cheerfully vote for the amendment.

Mr. HAYNE said he did not apprehend that there existed any difference of opinion with respect to the impropriety of giving presents to the Indian chiefs, for the purpose of influencing them in their negotiations with us. So he had understood the chairman of the Committee who reported the bill, [Mr. WHITE] and every gentleman who had participated in the discussion, to have expressed themselves. The question is not, therefore, shall we give our sanction to such a practice? but it is, shall we attempt to instruct the President, and put a limitation on the executive power of the Senate? He [Mr. H.] had two objections to this proposition. The first was, that the Senate, in its legislative capacity, has no control over the Executive, in the exercise of the treaty-making power; and the second was, that the proposed amendment seemed to imply a "far-gone conclusion" that the Executive intends to do wrong. It belongs [said Mr. H.] to the Executive, and it is not for us to say how treaties are to be carried on. We travel out of the sphere of our appropriate duties when we interfere in this matter; we ought not to do so; we ought not to do any act that can be considered as casting imputations upon the Executive, or the commissioners he may appoint. But we have no evidence of the fact that any such practice exists as that which the amendment is intended to prevent. If any such evil existed in the Government, and the facts be submitted to us, he would examine the subject frankly and candidly, and suggest the proper remedy.

But if the amendment were free from all constitutional objections, do we not see what a reproach it would still cast on the Executive and the country! Suppose we had provided for carrying on a treaty with any European Power, and a bill was submitted to appropriate a certain sum for fitting out a ship to carry our ambassadors, and to defray the other expenses of the negotiation, what would he said if a proviso were added to the bill to the following effect: "Provided, however, That the President shall not appropriate any part of the money for secret or corrupt purposes?" The impropriety would be the same in the present case, where you are providing for making a treaty with the Indians. I take it for granted [said Mr. H.] that the President will not permit any secret presents to be made, and that the commissioners whom he shall appoint will not be guilty of doing so. Until these practices were brought to view, he should oppose any bill containing such a provision. He knew that the Senator who proposed this amendment had the same views that he had on this subject. That gentleman had certainly no design to interfere unconstitutionally with the Executive, or to express any distrust as to his proceedings. His only object unquestionably was, to prevent any improper means from being resorted to, in making treaties with the Indians. While there existed, however, no just cause for apprehension that any such means would be resorted to, the amendment was altogether unnecessary.

Mr. BENTON asked that the question be taken by yeas and nays, if they were not already ordered. He expressed his obligation to the Senator from South Carolina, who had called the attention of the House to the constitutional nature of the amendment. This was the first year [said Mr. B.] of the new administration, and here was a proposition implying a direct censure of it, as the object of it was to place us on our guard against anticipated corruption. There was no necessity for the restraint on the present administration more than on any preceding one. Mr. B. repeated his desire to have the question taken by yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BARTON said he had voted for this amendment in Committee of the Whole; but certainly not for the purpose of reflecting on those who had preceded us, or on the present administration. He was not aware, now, that it amounted to any undue reflection on any branch of the Government, legislative or executive; for he knew of no instance of treaties, procured by means of secret bribes, and known to this Government, having been ratified. The parallel drawn, or attempted, between our negotiations with the European nations and with the aboriginal tribes of America, did not hold. Europe does not acknowledge us as her Great Father; nor our protection or supremacy over her; but as an equal. And hence the evident impropriety of such a provision to guard those civilized nations from such influences. But the Indian tribes are a conquered broken down people, who acknowledge our protection and supremacy, and call us their Great Father; looking to us for justice and protection, as the ward looks to the guardian. Where, then, is the impropriety of the legislative taking the lead of the executive, in announcing to the world that, in our negotiations with these subjected wards and broken tribes, such means should not be lawful? Congress are the guardians of these people. He voted for the amendment in Committee of the Whole, and must repeat that vote on the yeas and nays.

Mr. MCKINLEY said he had no design to question the virtue and integrity of the present administration. He had as much confidence in it as those who made greater professions. It is strange [said Mr. McK.] that a proposition cannot be made to appropriate money, for public purposes, under certain restrictions, without having the charge imputed to us of entertaining unfriendly feelings to the present administration. As this was a new subject, and as there was no immediate necessity to have it settled, he moved that the bill, as amended, be laid on the table, that gentlemen may have an opportunity of giving it a sufficient examination.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate then adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JAN. 18, 1830.

HEIRS OF ROBERT FULTON.

Mr. BARTON rose and said, I wish to submit to the Senate a resolution respecting the heirs of Robert Fulton, deceased, who are known not to be in circumstances suited to their education, character, and feelings; nor to the great public services of their father; and still less to the magnanimity and honor of this republic, his greatest beneficiary. When we consider [said Mr. B.] the great and growing benefits derived by the United States from Mr. Fulton's application of steam to the various purposes of machinery, stationary as well as locomotive; and especially when we cast our eyes into the vast valley of the Mississippi, and behold its long navigable rivers, reaching from the bases of the Alleghanies to those of the Northern Andes, or Rocky Mountains, and from the Northern lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, rendered as useful and valuable to us as so many Mediterranean seas, by the unrequited genius, perseverance, and sacrifices, of Fulton, we must acknowledge him among our greatest public benefactors, not even excepting Lafayette, or the founders and patrons of institutions of learning in America, or those of the African Colonization Society, whom it shall be crowned with success. In this view of the subject, I submit for the consideration of the Senate this resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands inquire into the expediency of making a grant to the heirs of Robert Fulton, deceased, of a portion of the public lands, bearing some proportion to the great benefits derived by the United States from his application of steam to the purposes of machinery, stationary as well as locomotive.

[This resolution was taken up on the next day, and agreed to.]

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. WEBSTER said he rose to present the petition of the South Carolina Canal and Rail Road Company, praying Congress to authorize a subscription, on the part of the Government of the United States, of two thousand five hundred shares of the capital stock of that company. The rail road, contemplated by the petitioners, was to extend from Charleston to Hamburg, in the vicinity of Augusta; and the petition sets forth the practicability of the intended work. The enterprise certainly was one of a very laudable nature, such as had, in other instances, met encouragement and assistance from the Government of the United States, and it was with pleasure that he presented it to the consideration of the Senate. It had been confided to his hands from no disrespect, certainly, towards the honorable gentlemen who were Senators from S. Carolina, but solely because the petitioners were unwilling to trespass on the reluctance which the honorable Senators from South Carolina naturally felt, or might be supposed to feel, to presenting petitions for aid from the Government of the United States, in cases in which their known opinions, as to the constitutional powers of Congress, would oblige them to oppose the prayer of the petitioners. For his own part, [Mr. W. said] it was well known, that, during the whole time in which he had had any connexion with Congress, he had uniformly been in favor of what was called internal improvement, when applied to objects of sufficient magnitude and importance to be properly called national. And, while he admitted the necessity of great caution and wisdom in the exercise of the power, he must still say that every day convinced him, more and more, of the necessity of such exercise, in suitable cases. He would take occasion to add, that he was a thorough convert to the practicability and efficacy of rail roads. He believed that the great results which the power of steam had accomplished, in regard to transportation by water, were not superior to those which it would yet accomplish, in regard to transportation by land. The only doubt was, as to the amount of cost; and that was a point which experience would shortly solve, he hoped satisfactorily. He would only add, that, while he felt pleasure in presenting this petition, he looked forward, with equal pleasure, to the time, he hoped not distant, when it would be his duty, in conjunction with his colleague, to ask a subscription, by Congress, to the Massachusetts Rail Road, a contemplated work, which, if executed, would facilitate intercourse between several States, and be felt, in its beneficial effects, all the way from the bay of Massachusetts to the mouth of the Ohio. When the proper time should come, he doubted not the Senate, and the other branch of the Legislature also, would give to that enterprise such aid and assistance as it should be entitled to by the consideration of its magnitude, and its obvious public utility and importance.

Mr. W. then presented the petition, and it was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

MR. FOOT'S RESOLUTION.

The consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. FOOT, and which was before the Senate on Wednesday at the hour of adjournment, was resumed:

Mr. BENTON commenced a speech with an analysis of the resolution, which, he said, presented three distinct propositions, viz:

1. To stop the surveying of the public land.
2. To limit the sales of the land now in market.
3. To abolish all the offices of the Surveyors General.

These were the propositions. The effect of them would be:

1. To check emigration to the new States and Territories.
2. To limit their settlement.
3. To deliver up large portions of them to the dominion of wild beasts.
4. To remove all the land records from the new States.

Mr. B. disclaimed all intention of having any thing to do with the motives of the mover of the resolution: he took it according to its effect and operation, and conceiving this to be eminently injurious to the rights and interests of the new States and Territories, he should justify the view which he had taken, and the vote he intended to give, by an exposition of facts and reasons which would show the disastrous nature of the practical effects of this resolution.

On the first branch of these effects—checking emigration to the West—it is clear, that, if the sales are limited to the lands now in market, emigration will cease to flow; for these lands are not of a character to attract people at a distance. In Missouri they are the refuse of forty years picking under the Spanish Government, and twenty more under the Government of the United States. The character and value of this refuse had been shown, officially, in the reports of the Registers and Receivers, made in obedience to a call from the Senate. Other gentlemen would show what was said of it in their respective States; he would confine himself to his own, to the State of Missouri; and show it to be miserable indeed. The St. Louis District, containing two and a quarter millions of acres, was estimated at an average value of fifteen cents per acre; the Cape Girardeau District, containing four and a half millions of acres, was estimated at twelve and a half cents per acre; the Western District, containing one million and three quarters of acres, was estimated at sixty-two and a half cents; from the other two districts there was no intelligent or pertinent return; but assuming them to be equal to the Western District, and the average value of the lands they contain would be only one-half the amount of the present minimum price. This being the state of the lands in Missouri which would be subject to sale under the operation of this resolution, no emigrants would be attracted to them. Persons who remove to new countries want new lands, first choices; and if they cannot get these, they have no sufficient inducement to move. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Foot] had read a part of Mr. Graham's, the Commissioner's report, to show that the lands had sold rapidly in the Steubenville District, the oldest in the Union; he had shown the sales there for 1828, to be about thirty-five thousand dollars; but if he had wished to have shown the other side of the question—how much faster they sell in new districts—what a fine opportunity he would have found in the Crawfordville District, in Indiana: the sales there, in the same year, being no less than one hundred and ninety thousand dollars.

The second ill effect to result from this resolution, supposing it to ripen into the measures which it implies to be necessary, would be in limiting the settlements in the new States and Territories. This limitation of settlement would be the inevitable effect of confining the sales to the lands now in market. These lands in Missouri, only amount to one-third of the State. By consequence, only one-third could be settled. Two-thirds of the State would remain without inhabitants; the resolution says, for "a certain period," and the gentlemen, in their speeches, expound this certain period to be seventy-two years. They say seventy-two millions of acres are now in market; that we sell but one million a year; therefore, we have enough to supply the demand for seventy-two years. It does not enter their heads to consider that, if the price was adapted to the value, all this seventy-two millions that is fit for cultivation would be sold immediately. They must go on at a million a year for seventy-two years, the Scripture term of the life of man—a long period in the age of a nation; the exact period of the Babylonish captivity—a long and sorrowful period in the history of the Jews; and not less long nor less sorrowful in the history of the West, if this resolution should take effect.

The third point of objection is, that it would deliver up large portions of new States and Territories to the dominion of wild beasts. In Missouri, this surrender would be equal to two-thirds of the State, comprising about forty thousand square miles, covering the whole valley of the Osage river, besides many other parts, and approaching within a dozen miles of the centre and capital of the State. All this would be delivered up to wild beasts: for the Indian title is extinguished, and the Indians gone; the white people would be excluded from it; beasts alone would take it; and all this in violation of the Divine command to replenish the earth, to increase and multiply upon it, and to have dominion over the beasts of the forest, the birds of the air, the fish in the waters, and the creeping things of the earth.

JAN. 18, 1830.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

The fourth point of objection is, in the removal of the land records—the natural effect of abolishing all the offices of the Surveyors General. These offices are five in number. It is proposed to abolish them all, and the reason assigned in debate is, that they are sinecures; that is to say, offices which have revenues and no employment. This is the description of a sinecure. We have one of these offices in Missouri, and I know something of it. The Surveyor General, Colonel McRee, in point of fidelity to his trust, belongs to the school of Nathaniel Macon; in point of science and intelligence, he belongs to the first order of men that Europe or America contains. He and his clerks carry labor and drudgery to the ultimate point of human exertion, and still fall short of the task before them; and this is an office which it is proposed to abolish under the notion of a sinecure, as an office with revenue, and without employment. The abolition of these offices would involve the necessity of removing all their records, and thus depriving the country of all the evidences of the foundations of all the land titles. This would be sweeping work; but the gentleman's plan would be incomplete without including the General Land Office in this city, the principal business of which is to superintend the five Surveyor General's offices, and for which there could be but little use after they were abolished.

These are the practical effects of the resolution. Emigration to the new States checked; their settlement limited; a large portion of their surface delivered up to the dominion of beasts; the land records removed. Such are the injuries to be inflicted upon the new States, and we, the Senators from those States, are called upon to vote in favor of the resolution which proposes to inquire into the expediency of committing all these enormities! I, for one, will not do it. I will vote for no such inquiry. I would as soon vote for inquiries into the expediency of conflagrating cities, of devastating provinces, and of submerging fruitful lands under the waves of the ocean.

I take my stand upon a great moral principle: that it is never right to inquire into the expediency of doing wrong.

The proposed inquiry is to do wrong; to inflict unmitigated evil upon the new States and Territories. Such inquiries are not to be tolerated. Courts of law will not sustain actions which have immoral foundations; legislative bodies should not sustain inquiries which have iniquitous conclusions. Courts of law make it an object to give public satisfaction in the administration of justice; legislative bodies should consult the public tranquillity in the prosecution of their measures. They should not alarm and agitate the country; yet, this inquiry, if it goes on, will give the greatest dissatisfaction to the new States in the West and South. It will alarm and agitate them, and ought to do it. It will connect itself with other inquiries going on* to make the new States a source of revenue to the old ones, to deliver them up to a new set of masters, to throw them as grapes into the wine press, to be trod and squeezed as long as one drop of juice could be pressed from their hulls. These measures will go together; and if that resolution passes, and this one passes, the transition will be easy and natural, from dividing the money after the lands are sold, to divide the lands before they are sold, and then to renting the land and drawing an annual income, instead of selling it for a price in hand. The signs are portentous; the crisis is alarming; it is time for the new States to wake up to their danger, and to prepare for a struggle which carries ruin and disgrace to them, if the issue is against them.

Mr. B. alluded to the coaxing argument of some gentlemen, who endeavored to carry this resolution through, by promising the Senate that the Committee on Public Lands, to whom it was to be referred, would report against it. He ridiculed this species of argument. Such an inquiry would become nugatory and idle. Why send a resolution of inquiry to be returned non est inventus? Why send your bucket to the bottom of a dry well? Why this perseverance for three weeks to get the inquiry before a committee who are to reject it? Surely for some purpose; and that purpose may be to gain a foot hold, to get jurisdiction, to get the subject going, and then refer it to another committee that would report favorably, under the plea that the first committee was composed of interested members from the new States. He then took notice of the terrifying argument which was used to get the resolution through. It was said it would excite suspicion and prejudice against us, if we did not agree to it. Suspicion of what? Prejudice in what? Explain these terms. Name the thing, foul or hidden, which the new States have to avoid in this inquiry. There is none. None can be named. It is an attempt to terrify little children and aged women. Prejudice indeed! The way to avoid it, and to command respect, is to show a knowledge of your rights, and a determination to defend them. He next adverted to a class of arguments which undertook to smuggle this resolution through—to convey it along unobservedly, as one of the harmless or beneficial inquiries which daily passed as a matter of course. This was putting the enemy into a covered wagon; but he would pull off the cover, and show the character of the cargo. He animadverted upon the suggestion, that a rejection of the resolution was a suppression of inquiry. He thought the attempt to send it off to a committee-room was more like suppressing debate. But he had no notion of letting it escape under a flash and a smoke. He would wait till the atmosphere cleared up, and then call gentlemen back to the character of the resolution, and urge them to meet him on the perniciousness of that character. He discriminated between resolutions for good and for evil; the former passed, of course; the latter should be resisted. If not, the whole country may be alarmed, agitated, and enraged, with mischievous inquiries: the South about its slaves and Indians; the West about its lands; the North-east on the subject of its fisheries, its navigation, its light houses, and its manufactories. What would be the condition of the Union, what the chance for the preservation of harmony, if each part struck at the other in a system of pernicious and alarming inquiries? And yet, unless the discrimination is made which I propose, all this may be done. The argument used by the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. McKINLEY] the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FOOT] and others, would carry through every species of inquiry, even the most fatal to the interest, the most insulting to the pride, and most destructive to the harmony of the States.

But this resolution is not only unjust to the new States, but it is partial and unequal in its operation among them. It bears hard upon some, and not at all upon others. It would lock up twenty-five millions of acres from sale and settlement in the State of Louisiana, and not one acre in Ohio; it would desolate Florida, and do comparatively but little mischief in Michigan. It is not sufficient to reject such a resolution—the sentiments in which it originated, must be eradicated. We must convince gentlemen that it is wrong to entertain such sentiments—that it will be wrong to act upon them in the progress of any of our land bills. This whole idea of checking emigration to the West, must be shown to be erroneous. It is an old idea, and lately brought forward with great openness of manner, and distinctness of purpose. Mr. Rush's Treasury Report of 1827 placed it before Congress and the people. Since then, there has been no ambiguity about it. The doctrine has taken a decided turn. The present resolution is, in effect, a part of the same system, and a most efficient part. The public mind has laid hold of this doctrine, and subjected it to the ordeal of reason and discussion. Professor Dew, in the college of William and

* In the House of Representatives.

Mary, in his able lectures, has spoken my sentiments on this point, and I will avail myself of his language, to convey them to the Senate.

Mr. B. then read as follows, Mr. Dew's lectures, page 43:

"In the second place, these tariff measures injure the South and West, by preventing that emigration which would otherwise take place. Now, this is an injustice committed upon those States, towards which the tide of emigration sets. * * * * * If there was a bounty upon emigration, then those States would have no right to complain of the adoption of any measure which might counteract the effects of the bounty; but this is not the case. * * * * * It is true, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, in December, 1827, thinks the low price at which the public lands are sold, operates as a bounty; but I doubt much whether Government price is too low; were this the case, would not enterprising individuals, with large capitals, quickly buy Government out, in order that they might speculate on the lands, and thus raise them to their proper value? * * * * * One thing is certain, that the prevention of emigration to the Western country is injurious to the West."

Mr. B. agreed with the Virginia professor, that the prevention of emigration to the West was an injury to that quarter of the Union. He said farther, it was an injury to the people of the Northeast, who were to be prevented from bettering their condition by removal; and that it was an injury to the whole human race to undertake to preserve the vast and magnificent valley of the Mississippi for the haunts of beasts and savages, instead of making it the abode of liberty and civilization, and the asylum of the oppressed of all the States and nations. He inveighed against the horrid policy of making paupers by law—against the cruel legislation which would confine poor people in the Northeast to work as journeymen in the manufactories, instead of letting them go off to new countries, acquire land, become independent freeholders, and lay the foundation of comfort and independence for their children. Manufactories are now realizing what was said by Dr. Franklin forty-five years ago, that they need great numbers of poor people to do the work for small wages; that these poor people are easily got in Europe, where there was no land for them, but that they could not be got in America till the lands were taken up. These are the words of that wise man, near half a century ago. The experience of the present day is verifying them. The manufactories want poor people to do the work for small wages; these poor people wish to go to the West and get land; to have flocks and herds—to have their own fields, orchards, gardens, and meadows—their own cribs, barns, and dairies; and to start their children on a theatre where they can contend with equal chances with other people's children for the honors and dignities of the country. This is what the poor people wish to do. How to prevent it—how to keep them from straying off in this manner—is the question. The late Secretary of the Treasury could discover no better mode than in the idea of a bounty upon non-emigration, in the shape of protection to domestic manufactures! A most complex scheme of injustice, which taxes the South to injure the West, to pauperize the poor of the North! All this is bad enough, but it is a trifle, a lame, weak, and impotent contrivance, compared to the scheme which is now on the table. This resolution, which we are now considering, is the true measure for supplying the poor people which the manufactories need. It proposes to take away the inducement to emigration. It takes all the fresh lands out of market. It stops the surveys, abolishes the office of the Surveyor General, confines the settlements, limits the sales to the refuse of innumerable pickings; and thus annihilates the very object of attraction—breaks and destroys the magnet which was drawing the people of the Northeast to the blooming regions of the West.

Mr. B. said that he felt himself compelled, by these persevering measures, to stop emigration to the West, to recur to the early history of the confederation, to show the origin and policy of these measures, and to do justice to the patriots by whom they were then defeated. The first of these measures that he would bring to the notice of the Senate, was the famous attempt, about the year 1786, to surrender the navigation of the Mississippi to the King of Spain, for a period of twenty-five or thirty years. Seven States voted for the surrender; six, beginning at Maryland, and going South, voted against it. The articles of confederation required the consent of nine States to make a treaty, and therefore the surrender was not accomplished. The Spanish negotiator, Don Gardoqui, in his communications to his court, said that the object of this surrender was to prevent the growth of the West. But it is not necessary to have recourse to foreign testimony; we have that of our own countrymen, who were actors in the scene. The seal which covered all these doings in the old Congress, has since been broken; their journals are published; and besides the evidence of the journals, we have the testimony of the Virginia delegation, afterwards given in the convention of that State which ratified the constitution of the United States. The convention required them to report what they had witnessed on this subject, and they did so under all the responsibilities of so great and serious an occasion.

Mr. B. then read from Mr. Monroe's statement several passages, which showed that Spain viewed with jealousy our settlements in the Western country, and wished them checked, and had made communications to the old Congress, in secret session, to that effect; that the surrender of the navigation of the Mississippi to Spain, for twenty-five to thirty years, would have that effect; that this surrender was resisted by the Southern States, because it would depress the growth of the West, and advocated by the Northeastern States: that the pursuit of this object was animated, and met with a warm opposition from the southern members; that he believed the Mississippi safer under the articles of confederation, than under the new constitution; and that, as mankind in general, and States in particular, were governed by interest, the Northern States would not fail of availing themselves of the opportunity given them by the constitution of relinquishing that river, in order to depress the Western country, and prevent the southern interest from preponderating. Mr. B. also read, in support of Mr. Monroe's statement, as to the jealousy of Spain, the following curious passages from the Secret Journals of Congress for the year 1780, contained in a communication from the Spanish court:

"It is the idea of the cabinet of Madrid, that the United States extend to the westward no farther than settlements were permitted by the royal (British) proclamation of the 6th of October, 1763." * * * * * "That the lands lying on the east side of the Mississippi, whereon settlements were prohibited by the aforesaid proclamation, are possessions of the Crown of Great Britain, and proper objects against which the arms of Spain may be employed for the purpose of making a permanent conquest for the Crown of Spain. That, such conquest may probably be made during the present war. That, therefore, it would be advisable to restrain the Southern States from making any settlements or conquests in those territories."—Vol. 4, p. 310.

Having read these extracts, Mr. B. remarked that here was the germ of that policy, which, thirty years afterwards, ended in dismembering the valley of the Mississippi, amputating two of its noblest rivers, and surrendering two hundred thousand square miles of its finest territory to the Crown of Spain.

Mr. B. also read the following passages from Mr. Grayson's statement:

"Secrecy was required on this subject. I told Congress that imposing secrecy on such a great occasion was unwarrantable. * * * * *

* * Seven States were disposed to yield the navigation of the Mississippi. I speak not of any particular characters. I have the charity to suppose that all mankind act on the best motives. Suffice it for me to tell plain and direct facts, and leave the conclusion with this honorable House. * * * * *

* * They (the Northern States) looked at the true interests of nations. Their language has been 'Let us prevent any new States from rising in the Western world, or they will outvote us—we will lose our importance and become as nothing in the scale of nations. If we do not prevent it, our countrymen will remove to those places, instead of going to sea, and we will receive no particular tribute or advantage from them.' This, sir, has been the language and spirit of their policy, and I suppose ever will. * * * * * When the act of Congress was passed, respecting the settlement of the Western country, and establishing a State* there, it passed in a lucky moment. I was told that that State (Massachusetts) was extremely uneasy about it, and in order to retain her inhabitants, lands in the province of Maine were lowered to one dollar per acre."

Mr. B. here remarked that, since the introduction of his graduation bill in Congress, the price of land in Maine had been still further lowered. That he had seen advertisements offering fresh lands, the first time they were offered, at a minimum price of twenty-five cents per acre, and also at twenty cents per acre; and had been told that these minimums had been as low as ten and five cents an acre, and that fifty cents was above the average of the auction sales.

Mr. B. also read the following extracts from a letter contained in the fourth volume of the Secret Journals of Congress, written from the Falls of the Ohio, December 4th, 1786, and addressed to a gentleman in New England, and which showed the alarm which was created in the West at the news of what was going on in Congress. "Politics, which a few months ago were scarcely thought of, are now sounded aloud in this part of the world. The late treaty with Spain shutting up, as it is said, the navigation of the Mississippi for the term of twenty-five years, has given this Western country a universal shock, and struck its inhabitants with amazement. Our foundation is affected; it is therefore necessary that every individual apply himself to find a remedy. To sell us and make us vassals to the merciless Spaniards, is a grievance not to be borne. The parliamentary acts which occasioned our revolt from Great Britain were not so barefaced and intolerable. * * *

* * * * * What benefit can you, on the Atlantic shores, receive from this act? Though this country has been settling but six years, and that in the midst of an inveterate enemy, and most of the first adventurers fallen a prey to the savages; and although the emigration to this country is so very rapid that the internal market is very great, yet the quantities of produce now on hand are immense. Do you think to prevent emigration from a barren country, loaded with taxes, and impoverished with debts, to the most luxurious and fertile soil in the world? Vain is the thought, and presumptuous the supposition. You may as well endeavor to prevent the fishes from gathering on a bank in the sea, which affords them plenty of nourishment. Shall the best and largest part of the United States be uncultivated, a nest for savages and beasts of prey? Certainly not. Providence has designed it for some nobler purpose."

[Mr. B. has furnished for the press the following extracts from Mr. Madison's statement: "We will not differ as to facts; perhaps we may differ as to principles. * * * * *

From the best information it never was the sense of the people at large, or the prevailing character of the Eastern States, to approve of the measure, (surrender of the Mississippi.) If interest should continue to operate on them, I humbly conceive they will derive more advantage from holding the Mississippi than even the Southern States." Mr. Madison also said that the Southern States had been for giving up the navigation of the Mississippi to Spain. Patrick Henry powerfully replied that that was when they did not possess it—in the gloomiest period of the Revolution, and to purchase the aid of Spain in establishing our independence.]

Mr. B. said that he had now given one great instance of the attempts to prevent the growth and settlement of the West. It was a diplomatic instance. He would now give another instance of the same policy from the legislative department of the Government—from the Congress of 1785, which he must be permitted to consider as the origin and prototype of all succeeding measures for cramping, crippling, and stifling the West. It is in the ordinance for the sale and disposition of the Western lands; the first one that passed after the States had surrendered their claims to that territory for the payment of the public debt. This ordinance was reported by a committee of twelve members, eight of them from the north side, four from the south side of the Potomac. They were:

Messrs. Long, of New Hampshire, King, of Massachusetts, Howard, of Rhode Island, Johnson, of Connecticut, R. R. Livingston, of New York, Stewart, of New Jersey, Gardiner, of Pennsylvania, Henry, of Maryland, Grayson, of Virginia, Williamson, of North Carolina, Bull, of South Carolina, Houston, of Georgia.

The ordinance reported by the committee, contained the plan of surveying the public lands, which has since been followed. It adopted the scientific principle of ranges of townships, which has been continued ever since, and found so beneficial in a variety of ways to the country. The ranges began on the Pennsylvania line, and proceeded west to the Mississippi; and since the acquisition of Louisiana, they have proceeded west of that river; the townships began upon the Ohio river, and proceeded north to the Lakes. The townships were divided into sections of a mile square, six hundred and forty acres each, and the minimum price was fixed at one dollar per acre, and not less than a section to be sold together. This is the outline of the present plan of sales and surveys, and, with the modifications it has received, and may receive, in graduating the price of the land to the quality, the plan is excellent. But a principle was incorporated in the ordinance of the most fatal character. It was, that each township should be sold out complete before any land could be offered in the next one! This was tantamount to a law that the lands should not be sold; that the country should not be settled: for it is certain that every township, or almost every one, would contain land unfit for cultivation, and for which no person would give six hundred and forty dollars for six hundred and forty acres. The effect of such a provision may be judged by the fact that above one hundred thousand acres remain to this day unsold in the first land district; the district of Steubenville, in Ohio, which included the first range and first township. If that provision had remained in the ordinance, the settlements would not yet have got out of sight of the Pennsylvania line. It was a wicked and preposterous provision. It required the people to take the country clean before them; buy all as they went; mountains, hills, and swamps; rocks, glens, and prairies. They were to make clean work, as the giant Polyphemus did when he ate up the companions of Ulysses:

"Nor entrails, blood, nor solid bone remains."

Nothing could be more iniquitous than such a provision. It was like requiring your guest to eat all the bones on his plate before he should have more meat. To say that township No. 1 should be sold out complete before township No. 2 should be offered for sale, was like requiring the bones of the first turkey to be eat up before the breast of the second one should be touched. Yet such was the provision contained in the first ordinance for the sale of the public lands, reported by a committee of twelve, of which eight were from the north and four from the south side of the Potomac. How invincible must have been the determination of some politicians to prevent the settlement of the West, when they would thus counteract the sales of the lands which had just been obtained after years of importunity, for the payment of the public debt!

When this ordinance was put upon its passage in Congress, two Virginians, whose names, for that act alone, would deserve the lasting gratitude of the West, levelled their blows against the obnoxious provision. Mr. Grayson moved to strike it out, and Mr. Monroe seconded him; and, after an animated and arduous contest, they succeeded. The whole South supported them; not one recreant arm from the South; many scattering members from the North also voted with the South, and in favor of the infant West; proving then, as now, and as it always has been, that the West has true supporters of her rights and interests—unhappily not enough of them—in that quarter of the Union from which the measures have originated that several times threatened to be fatal to her.

Mr. B. here adverted to a statement made by Mr. Grayson, in the Virginia convention, and which he had read just before, declaring that the language of some Northern members had been, that they wanted no States in the West, &c. and ventured the assertion of the belief, that it was in this committee that reported this ordinance, that that language was used. The occasion was a natural one to produce such language, and there was a gentleman upon that committee known to entertain that opinion, and of a spirit too proud and lofty to dissemble his sentiments. The occasion was one which involved the direct question, whether there should be new States in the West? The provision which required all the land in one township to be sold out, before the next was offered, was tantamount to saying that the land should not be sold; the country should not be settled; that new States should not be formed. The part acted by Mr. Grayson, in the House, in expunging this obnoxious provision, authorizes the belief that he objected to it in the committee, and took the natural ground that it would prevent the formation of new States in the West. The character of Mr. King, of New York, who was one of the committee, authorizes the belief that he answered frankly, that it was his intention to prevent the formation of such States. Such an answer would naturally flow from the lofty spirit which, at a subsequent period, and upon the floor of this Senate, disdaining all disguise, and discarding all hypocrisy, openly proclaimed that the Missouri contest was a struggle for political power, and that he would sooner see Missouri remain forever a haunt for wild beasts, than come into the Union on the side of the slave States.

These are two great and signal attempts to prevent the settlement of the West. Other measures, tending to the same effect, fill up the long period of her history from that day to this. Refusals to vote money for raising troops to defend the early settlers on the Cumberland and Kentucky; refusals to vote money for holding treaties to extinguish Indian titles; and lately, during the last administration, the reservation of iron ore lands, and the withdrawal of a thousand square miles of territory from market, in the State of Missouri, by Presidential authority, and in violation of an act of Congress, down to the resolution now under consideration, are all measures of the same class, all tending to check the growth, and to injure the prosperity of the West, and all flowing from the same geographical quarter.

Mr. B. now spoke of the woful improvidence of the new States in parting with the right to tax the federal lands when they came into the Union, and obtaining no stipulation for the sale of the lands in a reasonable time, and for a fair price. Such improvidence placed them at the mercy of those who are not responsible to them for the votes they give, who are strangers, who live a thousand miles off, and may labor under the belief that they have an interest in checking their growth. This is the weak and dangerous part of our system. This is representation without responsibility. It is taxation without representation, and that in its direst form; not of a few pence on a pound of tea, or on a quire of stamped paper, but of land; power to tax it in the price, to demand double price; to do worse, to place it above all price, as this resolution proposes to do, withdraw it from market, and deliver it up to wild beasts!

Massachusetts acted wisely. She surrendered a barren sceptre in the West, where she owned nothing, and held fast to thirty thousand square miles of vacant territory which she did own in the Northeast. She nurtured her province of Maine upon this territory, and ripened her into a State. They divided the vacant lands between them, and are now selling them on easy and parental terms to their citizens. Twenty-five cents an acre, twenty cents, ten cents, five cents; such are their prices, and for fresh lands never before in the market! What a contrast to the price of public land in the new States of the West! One dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, the lowest price for the refuse of innumerable pickings and cullings! What a contrast, not only in the price of the land, but in the condition of Maine and the other new States! Her Legislature settles all questions of survey, sale, price, donation; all this done at home, by a Legislature elected by the people and responsible to them. For the new States in the West and South, Congress is the tribunal for the decision of these matters, and before her they must appear with petitions, memorials, entreaties, supplications, and prayers; and hear in return denials, rebukes, and reproaches! These humiliations, these injuries, go not to the new State of Maine; the wisdom of Massachusetts in holding fast her public land, while Virginia was throwing hers upon the public altar, has saved Maine from them; they are reserved for the new States of the West, and copious and bitter have been the draughts which these States have had to swallow; severe are the trials which they have yet to go through, before the census of 1840 shall enable them to vindicate their rights, by the tranquil exercise of superior power. In the mean time, the surveys may be stopped, the sales may be limited, two-thirds of their soil may be reserved from market, plans may be got up to divide the money which the lands sell for, by a rule of proportion which will give all the money to the populous States of the Northeast; then other plans may be invented to run up the prices to the highest point, and obtain every possible dollar from the new States, to be distributed among these new receivers. When this plan is screwed to the highest, it may give way to the natural conception, that it is better to divide the land before the sale, than to divide the money after it; and when the lands are so divided and distributed, the next conclusion will be as natural as irresistible, that it is better not to sell the lands at all, but to rent them, and derive that "tribute" from the West which Mr. Grayson tells of, and retain a body of tenantry in the new States to govern the elections. Is this fancy, or is it fact? It is fact, and the incipient steps for the consummation of all this are now in full progress. Where is the relief, where the defence of the new States, in this alarming conjuncture? Not in themselves. They are yet too weak; they must look abroad for help, and the history of the past tells them where; tells them to look to that solid phalanx in the South, and those scattering reinforcements of the Northeast, which, in 1787, saved the navigation of the Mississippi, and, in 1785, expunged the non-settlement clause from the ordinance for the sale of Western lands, and, in these two great acts, saved the infant West from being stifled in its birth.

[Here the debate closed for this day.]

TUESDAY, JANUARY 19, 1830.
THE DEBATE CONTINUED.

Mr. FOOT'S resolution for suspending the surveys of the public lands, &c. being again under consideration--

Mr. HOLMES rose, and said, if some stranger had happened to have been in the Senate when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] rose in the debate of yesterday, and had listened to him throughout, he would have been led to conclude that the thirteen United States were thirteen tyrants; that they had driven the emigrants to the West, exposed to savage beasts and savage men; that they had not only withheld population, but had extended to them the hand of oppression; that, in spite of the savages on the one hand, and our tyranny on the other, they had grown and flourished; that we had disregarded their complaints and remonstrances "as the capricious squalls of a child, which did not know whether it was aggrieved or not;" that this child had at length acquired the voice, vigor, and courage of a man; had risen up, and hurled defiance in the teeth of its unnatural parent; that insurrection prevailed; that discord was snapping her whip of scorpions; the torch of rebellion was lighted; the flames of civil war were kindled; and this resolution was to seal their subjugation. But when he came to learn that (lo! and behold!) nothing more was intended but to inquire whether a sufficient quantity of our land was ready for sale to supply the demand; and, if so, whether some of the officers employed in surveying them might not be dispensed with, he would be surprised, and suppose it was a dream. Thus, said Mr. H. does impassioned eloquence magnify a small affair into a fearful catastrophe. If there is danger of excitement, who has created that danger? Surely the Senators who have opposed the resolution. Had it passed sub silentio, as it was in the ordinary course of business, the rest would have thought nothing of it. This inquiry is demanded for the information of the Senate and the people. They want light. We ask an inquiry, and now, by this preliminary and premature discussion, the gentlemen have placed themselves in this dilemma—if we make the inquiry, we alarm the West; if we suppress it, the East will suspect you. In these days, when reform has been promised and is expected, we ask for information on a subject so important as our public domain, and this information is refused. What will be the inference? You raise every where suspicion and jealousy that something is wrong, which will not bear the light. Sir, it is not for us, who call for this inquiry, to give an accurate detail of the quantity, quality, and location of these lands, nor of the number, duties, and emoluments, of the officers employed. It would be admitting at once, that we have all the information the resolution seeks. These are the very objects of the inquiry. We may have some knowledge, but not enough. This is my case. We have five great land districts, viz: 1. Ohio and Indiana; 2. Illinois, Missouri, and Arkansas; 3. South of the Tennessee, including Mississippi and Louisiana; 4. Alabama; 5. Florida. In all these, we have surveyed one hundred and forty millions; sold and granted about thirty-nine millions; leaving more than one hundred millions of acres still for sale. The quantity reserved by, or ceded to the States, is probably not less than fifty millions; and what is in the hands of speculators, who purchased not to cultivate, but to sell, and other large claimants under foreign grants, &c. not less than fifty millions more; making a grand aggregate of two hundred millions of acres now ready for purchasers. Now, if one hundred acres is sufficient for a farm, which will sustain a family of six persons, there is already enough, from these different sources, to accommodate twelve millions of persons, equal to the whole population of the United States. But, suppose that one-half of this is unfit for cultivation, (a large deduction in a country described as a perfect paradise) then it would be only sufficient for six millions. If, then, you have enough already surveyed to supply only six millions, is it necessary to be at the expense of surveying more, or rather, is it dangerous to inquire into the expediency of doing it? This question is the more impressive, when we reflect that this West contains three millions of inhabitants; and only twenty millions of the public land have yet been sold. And I repeat, had this inquiry been permitted from the usual courtesy of the Senate, no excitement might have been apprehended from any quarter; all would have believed it was in the spirit of reform; and coming from the quarter it does, that there was some sincerity in it. Let us see, at least, whether we have not officers in this department who have nothing to do, or nothing which we may want done for many years. If so, instead of empty professions to amuse, if not deceive the people, let us set to work in earnest.

But, we are told that we need not direct the Committee to inquire, for gentlemen are able now to give us all necessary information. Now, two Senators have volunteered to inform us. We expected, and had a right to expect, a detailed statement, as explicit as the report of a committee: for nothing else would fairly and properly dispense with the inquiry. But, it was fairly predicted that, to give in a speech, a clear, precise, and accurate statement, in detail, of the quantity, value, and location of these lands, would be an attempt to which no man is equal; and if he was, it is not in the power of the human mind to comprehend it, merely by hearing it, and so it has turned out. The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. KANE] has attempted it in vain. Has any one obtained the information we ask, from what he has said? If he has developed the whole subject, I, for one, am so unfortunate as not to comprehend it. He did, to be sure, tell us that the whole system needed modification, the strongest argument for inquiry, and yet he was against it.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] has not even attempted it. His remarks, when they applied to the subject at all, were confined chiefly to his own State, only a small portion of one of the five great land districts. Is this giving us a full view of the whole subject? It is no compliment to our understandings to pretend it. The opposers of the inquiry are driven to one of two grounds; that they have already informed us, or that we have no right to know. But the information yet given is utterly defective, and consists in declamation on the sufferings of the West. Your hand of oppression rests heavy on her; so heavy, that you must not even inquire into her condition. And will it be pretended that the people of the United States have no right to understand the condition of their lands? Is information to be locked up, and is the West exclusively to keep the keys? Sir, if we refuse to open the doors, the people will break them. No secrets! No secrets! Let us know every thing which concerns our property or our liberty. But, says the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. B.] if you abolish the offices of surveyors, the records will be taken away, and the people will be deprived of their evidences of title. Indeed! How does this follow? It would be strange, indeed, if, in abolishing an office, it was beyond the power of legislation to provide for preserving the records, and authenticating copies. I believe, sir, that every Legislature has, in dispensing with an office, taken care to preserve the records, and to provide the means of using them. It is a perfect non sequitur, an utter inconsequence, that the records would share the fate of the office.

But, the resolution does not go far enough; it is confined to the surveyors. Now, sir, I should suppose, if I could look upon this subject with ordinary gravity, that, should the Committee report to abolish the principal offices, it would not be very far exceeding their authority to determine that the subordinate and dependent ones were also unnecessary. A resolution for inquiry, I should think, need not be quite so formal and technical as to stand the test of a "plea in abatement." If it presented a definite proposition which required the direct action of the Senate, it should be drawn with such special care as accurately to define the subject on which we were to act; but an inquiry gives a latitude to the Committee, as to subjects collateral.

The new States, we are told, have parted with the power of protecting themselves. Sir, I don't understand this. What power have they surrendered? What power have they not now, which they ever had before? Is it political power? The power granted them or their ancestors, by the ordinance of 1787? Did they surrender this or any other, on their admission into the Union? I was surprised at the remark; and I should wish to understand its import; and how, and in what this surrender had been made. Is it physical power which is surrendered? What can be meant? Has it come to this, that the people of the West are urged to resort to their native strength to take back what they have fairly and constitutionally conceded, or rather to exact more than we have conceded to them? I hope and trust that the time is far distant when any bold or ambitious aspirant will be able to seduce them from their allegiance to this Union. But we are told that, by a series of measures pursued by the East, we have evinced a settled and determined hostility to the West; and that too for the purpose of checking emigration. Sir, this is a heavy charge. For what purpose, or from what policy, could originate this hostility? Are they not our own brethren, "bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh?" Were not those lands ceded to us for the purpose of settlement? Of what value would the cession have been to us, had our policy been not to settle them? We know that these lands would not, and could not, pay any of our public debt unless they could be settled. It is preposterous, therefore, to suppose that any statesman would wish to throw a stumbling block in the way of the growth and prosperity of this immense and delightful country. But, if you insist that it is so, here is a paradox to be solved. How does it happen that, with the savages on one side, and our tyranny on the other, this country has increased and flourished beyond all parallel? At the time of the census of 1790, what is now Ohio had perhaps a population of ten thousand; at that of 1800, about forty thousand; in 1810, two hundred and thirty thousand; and in 1820, five hundred and eighty thousand, and now was probably a million! And all this, in spite of savage barbarities and domestic oppressions. All the West, in the space of forty years, has increased three millions. Sir, with facts like these, let an impartial world decide upon the cruelty and tyranny of the parent States.

Is the ordinance of the 13th July, 1787, a state paper which does us honor, and which was drawn by a citizen of Massachusetts, evidence of this hostility? Five States marked out and defined, to be admitted into the Union, when each or either should have a population of sixty thousand, and the pledge in this respect more than redeemed; religious freedom, trial by jury, habeas corpus, representation, common law, bail—all the securities of life, liberty, and property—guaranteed, and excessive fines, cruel punishments, and ex post facto and retrospective laws forbidden—all the essential rights for which our Revolution was achieved, and which raise the freemen above the slave, secured! Does this look like hostility to the West? Moreover, is the admission into the Union, before they had the requisite numbers, proof of this hostility? Does the admission of Missouri evince such hostility? Sir, this is an event which I shall long remember. But for Eastern members, Missouri would now be a province. That Senator would not be here. This Hall would never have witnessed the triumph of his eloquence, nor the ardor of his patriotism. Eastern members took their lives in their hands when they defended the cause of Missouri. They acted against the honest prejudices of their constituents. Prejudices did I say? No, principles which they deem correct, emanating from the best feelings of the human heart. I will appeal to both of these Senators for the truth of what I say. They were literally knocking at the door of the Senate, and Eastern men were exerting their powers to burst it open and let them in. It is illiberal to charge the East with hostility to Missouri.

But because it was proposed, by Eastern members of the old Congress, to provide, in the ordinance of '87, that every section in one township should be sold, before another should be offered for sale, (which proposition did not prevail) the Senator infers that this is evidence of hostility. Now it seems to me that this inference is, to say the least, a little uncharitable. I could easily perceive that a very patriotic and charitable motive might have induced this proposition. At that time the settlers would be opposed to numerous and powerful savage tribes. They would be obliged in some measure to defend themselves. It would be safest, therefore, to keep them as compact as possible: for the more they should scatter, the more would they be exposed. The members from the East had near and dear friends, who had emigrated to that country, and it might be their motive to protect them. When a good and a bad motive may be assigned to an act, it is the part of charity to assign the good, especially when the person implicated is dead, and cannot therefore defend his motives. The Senator from Missouri illustrates this case by a turkey. A man has two turkeys cooked and on the table, and he obliges his guests to eat one, bones and all, before he will carve the other. The analogy seems to be most unfortunate. We have sold but twenty millions of the public lands, and there are now two hundred millions to be sold. His turkey then has one tenth of flesh, and nine tenths of bones; a poor turkey truly. Is this a fair description of the paradise of the West? If it is, there is little need of checking emigration. But to carry his figure of the turkey a little further, and his case would be this: A man has twenty guests, and he serves up twenty turkeys, one for each, and each takes his dinner out of his turkey, and they are all left partially eaten and all mangled. Now this is exactly the case of bringing more land into the market than can possibly be wanted.

The Senator [Mr. B.] has read from the debates of the Virginia convention, to prove that the East were disposed to give to Spain our right of navigation of the Mississippi. It seems that this alienation came incidentally into discussion, and it was apprehended that, under the constitution which was to be adopted, the new Government would have more power to do this than would the old confederation. A Mr. Grayson had stated that this was the disposition of the East, and chiefly inferred it from the supposed fact that we had no interest in that navigation. If this same Mr. Grayson was an able statesman, he had not then learnt much of geography: for he stated that Massachusetts had no intercourse with the Mississippi, but by the St. Lawrence, or the Hudson! When the fact is, that Massachusetts, for half a century, has had a more intimate intercourse with the Mississippi than even the State of Maryland. A man who could deliberately advance such an opinion, can scarcely be considered very high authority on any subject. Mr. Madison, however, a real statesman, put it all right, showed the connexion of the East with the West, and denied that the Eastern people ever would be willing to make the concession. The next charge against the East is, that a distinguished citizen of Massachusetts had discovered hostility to the West, in giving up our claims upon Texas. The Florida treaty was negotiated when he was Secretary of State, and it was long in negotiation. I was then a member of the Committee of Foreign Relations in the other House; and, from the connexion of that Committee with the Executive, I had an opportunity of knowing something of that negotiation; and though I do not deem it proper to state particular conversations, I do know that the distinguished citizen was the last who gave up the Colorado for a boundary, and accepted of the Sabine.

Sir, I beg pardon of the Senate for thus detaining them. It was chiefly to resist the attempt to excite sectional jealousies that I rose. It has always been my course. When we were involved in war, and an attempt was made, as in New England, to do this, I resisted it. When now it is attempted in the West, I will resist it still. I will bear in mind—for it sunk deep into my heart—the legacy of the Father of his Country to his children. The sectional jealousies which have been excited in this debate have brought it fresh to my recollection. God grant that the good sense of the people of the West may spurn the infatuation!

Mr. WOODBURY said he rose, not with a view of entering at large into the debate, or of repeating any suggestions made by him on a former occasion; but he held in his hand a motion, which, he flattered himself, perhaps in vain, might meet the approbation of gentlemen on both sides. The resolution under consideration was, avowedly, one for mere inquiry, and not intended in any degree to alarm or injure the West. Every gentleman from the East, who had advocated its passage, indignantly repelled any other design. This was honorable and right. On the contrary, every gentleman who had opposed its passage, whether from the East or West, repelled, with equal indignation, any design to stifle inquiry, suppress information, or exclude light. Imputations of these kinds, come whence they may, were to be presumed alike groundless and unjust. What, then, is honestly wanted on both sides? An inquiry into the subject of the surveys and sales of public lands may be as thorough as gentlemen please; but an inquiry instituted in such form as not to create alarm; or, beforehand, to imply any opinion on the present system unfavorable to the interest and hopes of the new States in the West. He trusted, therefore, that the gentleman from Connecticut, who introduced this resolution, would consent to any modification likely to attain this object; as [Mr. W. presumed] that gentleman went for substance rather than form. It was doubtless more important to that gentleman, to have the subject of the surveys and sales inquired into by the Committee, than the particular manner in which the subject was referred.

He proposed, therefore, to alter only the manner of the inquiry. In this case of the West, as in some other cases, he might say with Mirabeau, that "words were things." He could easily see that one form of inquiry might excite fear and jealousy, which would be entirely removed by a different form, and still the investigations of the committee be equally full, and the result of their investigations the same. Let us bring the question a little closer home. Would it be equally agreeable to the Atlantic seaboard, to have passed a resolution of inquiry into the expediency of limiting the number of light houses, of stopping the improvement of harbors, or of abandoning the removal of obstructions in our rivers, as to have one pass for inquiring into the expediency of increasing the number of light houses, extending the improvement of our harbors, and of removing more generally the obstructions in our rivers? As a still stronger illustration, and as an illustration only, what gentleman, who had advocated this resolution, would like to vote for a mere inquiry into the expediency of dissolving the Union? But it would be a very different resolution in its acceptability and bearings, if the form was changed into an inquiry how the Union could be strengthened, or into the expediency of strengthening it by any system of roads and canals, any disposition of the public lands, or any regulation of commerce, that might come within the purview of the constitution, and, at the same time, not tend to alienate one portion of our political brotherhood from the other portion. Mr. W. forbore to enter into further illustration or detail; as enough had been said to indicate the importance, in such cases, of mere phraseology, and how easy it was to conciliate and soothe, where conciliation, and not irritation, was the real design.

If he were to glance at the state of the country now, and not go back to its condition and its policy on the public lands forty years ago, which, he agreed with the gentleman from Maine, might now be entirely inapplicable, he should say that the resolution, on that account also, ought to have a much wider scope than it now possessed. The more extended were our surveys and sales, the quicker would be the probable payment of our public debt, to which these lands stood firstly and sacredly pledged. The more extended were our surveys and sales, the better could we compete, for income and population, with the other great land owners on our north and southwest, and even with parts of Europe and Asia. We must take the world as it is, most of it at peace and cultivating the arts of peace, and throwing open its vacant spots of territory to the poor and oppressed from all regions. The institutions of the old world were becoming yearly more liberal, that their territories might not become deserts. Beside turning the tide of emigration that set to this country, by extraordinary advantages held out in Southern Africa, the whole continent of New Holland, and on the coast of the Black Sea—even Persia, within half a dozen years, had circulated her proclamations, in both London and Paris, promising to actual settlers, land, freedom from taxes, and liberty of conscience.

Our free institutions gave us, to be sure, great advantages over monarchies and despotisms, in attracting emigrants; but it must be recollected that other Governments are also becoming more free; that new and cheaper lands are flung open; and that most of the emigrants hither, of late, have consisted of artisans rather than agriculturists. But on our own immediate borders had arisen the greatest rivalry, and one which had begun to create a large drain even to our own native population. Settlers were systematically invited into Canada, by the most favorable terms as to land, and by almost an entire exemption from taxes; while on our southwest, under a Government free in form as our own, the largest tracts of the richest soil were bestowed with a most liberal hand. He had before him a letter, received from a friend since this resolution was offered, containing an account of grants by the Mexican Government, to a native of New Hampshire, among others, of lands larger in extent than the whole of that State, or the State which the honorable mover of this resolution represents; land, also, on the finest of rivers, and near our southwestern borders, on the simple condition of actual settlement to the small extent required by the laws of colonization in Mexico, passed in 1825. One other consideration on our own solemn engagements. How are we ever, in good faith, to permit the Northwestern Territory to become States, unless we permit the lands to be surveyed, and sold at a moderate price, so as to throw into that territory the requisite population for States? and how can the population there, deem it honorable or just for us to talk of liberality in admitting them to be States a little under the population required, if we stop the surveys and sales before they can approach near the requisition; or if we stop them after they become States, and reserve our lands for beasts of prey and savages to roam over, rather than permit them to be bought and cultivated by the thousands of civilized freemen, with small pecuniary means, who are now looking, in the pursuit of happiness and new homes, to Canada and Texas? To borrow a course of reasoning applied so often in regard to the tariff, he would ask if no counteracting regulations were necessary to meet the measures of other nations? Many who have sought, and many who would now seek, what once were called the Western wilds, look to us for a new policy, in accordance with the new condition of this country and the age in which we live. Public policy, forty years ago, might have been rather to contract the settlements, for increased security against the tomahawk and scalping knife. But no such motive now existed. Our own little world should all be open where to choose; to the young and enterprising of the East as well as the West. Compared with former years, they had no dangers nor difficulties there to fear, and their friends behind felt much less reluctance at parting with them in their removal to regions of improved and improving laws, institutions, and morals. Those behind, also, he trusted, felt neither jealousy nor distrust. Many of them had been reared under the same roof, taught in the same schools, had worshipped in the same temples.

He hoped that these and similar considerations, as well as those suggested by him on a former occasion, would vindicate him in the wish to have all the public lands surveyed as speedily as possible, and then sold on such terms, and with such despatch, as the present state of this country and of the world rendered proper, looking to our true and lasting interests, and exercising, in regard to the lands, a policy worthy the impartiality and liberality so often professed.

Mr. W. concluded by offering the following amendment: After the word "expediency," insert the words "of adopting measures to hasten the sales, and extend more rapidly the surveys of the public lands."

Mr. FOOT made a few observations in reply to Mr. WOODBURY. The amendment [he said] was opposed to the resolution he offered. It proposed an inquiry directly the opposite to his. He suggested whether the gentleman might not as well offer his amendment in the form of a distinct resolution, after the adoption of the resolution he offered, and then the whole subject would lie open to the Committee.

Mr. BARTON said he liked this amendment, and the remarks of the gentleman from New Hampshire. He believed the inquiry, in the form proposed by the amendment, would throw open precisely the same field of inquiry as that of the gentleman from Connecticut; and, as one member, he should take into view those topics suggested by the latter, if the resolution should assume the new form. This form of inquiry would also prevent the very excitements in the West deprecated by the gentleman from Maine. It was a great object to have free inquiry into our public concerns. It was, he said, also a great object to give public satisfaction, and to allay and prevent sectional jealousies and suspicions. He also accorded in opinion with the gentleman from New Hampshire in the propriety of counteracting measures against the bounties to emigrants held out in Canada by the British Government, and in Texas by that of Mexico. The Senate would recollect that, in 1828, in his opposition to the "Graduation Bill," his only objections were the encouragement it would give speculators, and its prostration of the actual cultivators under the weight of combination and wealth. But he had, at the same time, proposed a substitute, offering to give small estates in lands to those who would settle them. To give away lands to the citizens who needed them, as a countervailing measure to the policy of our surrounding neighbors, who tempt away some of our people, was his constant policy; but it had been smothered under the schemes of the day; and nothing had, as yet, been obtained, except a disposition to divide the lands among the States, according to present numbers. He was glad, he said, to find a measure proposed from the Northeast that would bring this identical plan into re-consideration before the Committee, supported by the arguments of the gentleman from New Hampshire; and should vote for his proposed amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said there was no necessity for the amendment, as the Committee had already the same powers it proposed to confer. Although he was opposed to the measure which the resolution of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Foot] purported to have in view, yet he should vote for the resolution. What would be said, if this resolution were rejected? That we were afraid of inquiry. At the first stage of the new administration he would wish to avoid the charge of being hostile to any investigation. If the resolution goes to a committee, they will make a report, and he said it was desirable to put down the jealousies which a contrary course would excite. The excitement of one part of the Union against the other was, if prevalent, extremely unfortunate. Mr. S. stated that the policy of the Government in all projects having reference to the Western States has been indulgent. He said he would vote against the amendment as being unnecessary, and in support of the resolution, for the reasons stated. A gentleman had been alluded to by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON] in the course of his remarks, of which he [Mr. S.] thought it necessary to take notice. That gentleman said, alluding to a distinguished character, that he had ceded by negotiation a fair portion of the land belonging to the United States. Mr. S. said that he had been an actor on that occasion, and was well acquainted with the subject; that he had been informed at the time that a quarrel had taken place between the gentleman alluded to and Don Onís, the minister on the part of Spain, and they had separated not to meet again on the subject; that a quarrel arose, as he was informed and believed, on the determination of the American negotiator that the Colorado must and should be the boundary line; that the negotiators met again at the request of mutual friends; what passed afterwards he did not know, further than that he could assure the Senator from Missouri that the gentleman alluded to by him was not the first to recede to the Sabine as the boundary of the United States.

Mr. LIVINGSTON said, in all deliberative assemblies with which I have been acquainted, there are two modes of deciding on a resolution requiring the opinion of a committee on the expediency of a proposed measure—one, the most ordinary and regular mode directing the reference as a matter of course, which mode gave rise to no presumption of the opinion of the House on the measure proposed by the resolution; the other mode is that of opposing the inquiry as useless, or by an investigation of the subject, showing that it would be improper to ground any measures on such a result of the inquiry as seemed to be expected by the resolution—I say seemed to be expected, because the mover certainly would not have wished for an inquiry merely to satisfy curiosity, and the phraseology of the resolution evidently shows the object to be, that the sales of lands shall be restricted to those already surveyed. The debate, then, not having turned on the necessity of an inquiry, but on the propriety of the measure itself, which was to be made the subject of inquiry, it was as competent to the Senate to decide now, whether such restriction of the sale of lands was an advisable measure, as it would be on the report of a committee: for such report could give us no facts that we were not in possession of; and, after the turn the debate had taken, a vote of reference to a committee would be considered as an acquiescence in the propriety of the measure contemplated by the resolution. Therefore, although I should have voted for the reference, if the measure had taken its usual course, I cannot do so under existing circumstances. The State whose interests I advocate and partly represent, has suffered too much from the delay in the sale of the public lands already, not to render this proposition of restraining them still further, a fatal one to her interest, with a population of one hundred and sixty thousand inhabitants, to bear all the charges of Government: her increase has been checked for twenty-five years; during which, according to the natural course of things, that population ought to have been at least doubled. The lands of the United States, amounting to thirty-one millions, are not only exempt from taxes, but the inhabitants are forced, if they wish to keep up a communication between themselves in some of the settlements, and to protect their property from inundations, to make roads, bridges, and embankments, on the public lands. A law to restrict the sales of public lands to those already surveyed, would be equivalent to a law to stop them altogether: for although, of the thirty-one millions of acres owned by the United States, two millions seven hundred thousand have been surveyed, yet not a tenth part of that quantity has been sold, and of what remains, not a tenth part will ever sell; it is morass or pine barren. Therefore, a law to stop the surveys would be equivalent to a law to put a stop to the further increase of the State, and entailing upon its present inhabitants and their descendants, the burthen of all the taxes and all the services required for defending and improving the lands of the United States. There are two views in which the subject may be considered; that in which the pecuniary interest of the United States is alone considered—the other, that in which the infinitely more important political interest of the new States is concerned.

In the first view, considering the United States simply as a great landholder, what are its interests? To sell as speedily and for as good a price as they can; but the greater choice you give to settlers, the more speedily it is evident; that you can sell; and the better land you throw into the market, as evidently the better price you can command. This can only be done by continuing your surveys. The political view of the question is one that would require an investigation not now necessary to be gone into. The strength of the Union depends on the population, wealth, resources, and industry, of the States, its component parts. Whatever cramps them, restrains the general welfare, and reduces its strength. The money to be drawn from the sale of the lands is but a feather in the scale of great national policy; and if the population of the States would be increased by disposing of them, even for nominal price, we ought not to hesitate. In another point of view, the surveys are highly important. They give us an accurate knowledge, not only of the situation, but the quality and value of our land. Its facilities for improvement by roads, canals, and proximity to market; and even if the sales were stopped, the surveys ought to go on. What great landed proprietor who does not begin by this operation? And shall the greatest of all landholders, from a fear of expense, neglect it? These are some of the advantages resulting from a perseverance in the judicious plan which has been adopted in relation to our public lands. These are some of the injurious effects which would result from abandoning it. What are the benefits expected from a change? I have not heard a single one suggested. My vote will be governed by these considerations.

Mr. SPRAGUE suggested the propriety of combining both the propositions before the Senate in one resolution. He said he was willing to vote for an inquiry, whether the surveys of the public lands ought, on the one hand, to be stopped, or on the other hand, whether they ought to be extended. If the gentleman would consent to adopt both propositions, he [Mr. S.] said he would support the resolution. Both objects contended for by gentlemen would be thus attained. He would therefore suggest a modification of the resolution, in the following form:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire whether it be expedient to limit for a certain period the sales of the public lands to such lands only as have heretofore been offered for sale, and are subject to entry at the minimum price. And also whether the office of Surveyor General may not be abolished without detriment to the public interest, or whether it be expedient to adopt measures to hasten the sales, and extend more rapidly the surveys of the public lands.

Mr. S. said, if the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. FOOT] and the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. WOODBURY] would consent to this modification, he would now, if in order, move it as an amendment. If it was not now in order, he said he would make the motion at another time.

The PRESIDENT said the motion was not in order.

Mr. FOOT made a few observations in reply to Mr. BENTON and Mr. WOODBURY. He repelled the imputation that it was through any hostile motives to the West he proposed the resolution. He said the question here involved was one of great and increasing importance and interest, and added, that if the resolution and amendment, in the modified form, were adopted, he should move to add to the whole, the words "propriety of making donations to actual settlers."

On the motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, a division of the question was ordered.

Mr. HAYNE said that, if the gentlemen who had discussed this proposition had confined themselves strictly to the resolution under consideration, he would have spared the Senate the trouble of listening to the few remarks he now proposed to offer. It has been said, and correctly said, by more than one gentleman, that resolutions of inquiry were usually suffered to pass without opposition. The parliamentary practice in this respect was certainly founded in good sense and sound policy, which regarded such resolutions as intended merely to elicit information, and therefore entitled to favor. But [said Mr. H.] I cannot give my assent to the proposition so broadly laid down by some gentlemen, that, because nobody stands committed by a vote for inquiry, that, therefore, every resolution proposing an inquiry, no matter on what subject, must pass almost as a matter of course, and that, to discuss or oppose such resolutions, is unparliamentary. The true distinction seems to be this: Where information is desired as the basis of legislation, or where the policy of any measure, or the principles it involves, are really questionable, it was always proper to send the subject to a committee for investigation; but where all the material facts are already known, and there is a fixed and settled opinion in respect to the policy to be pursued, inquiry was unnecessary, and ought to be refused. No one, he thought, could doubt the correctness of the position assumed by the gentleman from Missouri, that no inquiry ought ever to be instituted as to the expediency of doing "a great and acknowledged wrong." I do not mean, however, to intimate an opinion that such is the character of this resolution. The application of these rules to the case before us will decide my vote, and every Senator can apply them for himself to the decision of the question, whether the inquiry now called for should be granted or refused. With that decision, whatever it may be, I shall be content.

I have not risen, however, Mr. President, for the purpose of discussing the propriety of instituting the inquiry recommended by the resolution, but to offer a few remarks on another and much more important question, to which gentlemen have alluded in the course of this debate—I mean the policy which ought to be pursued in relation to the public lands. Every gentleman who has had a seat in Congress for the last two or three years, or even for the last two or three weeks, must be convinced of the great and growing importance of this question. More than half of our time has been taken up with the discussion of propositions connected with the public lands; more than half of our acts embrace provisions growing out of this fruitful source. Day after day the changes are rung on this topic, from the grave inquiry into the right of the new States to the absolute sovereignty and property in the soil, down to the grant of a pre-emption of a few quarter sections to actual settlers. In the language of a great orator in relation to another "vexed question," we may truly say, "that year after year we have been lashed round the miserable circle of occasional arguments and temporary expedients." No gentleman can fail to perceive that this is a question no longer to be evaded; it must be met—fairly and fearlessly met. A question that is pressed upon us in so many ways; that intrudes in such a variety of shapes; involving so deeply the feelings and interests of a large portion of the Union; insinuating itself into almost every question of public policy, and tinging the whole course of our legislation, cannot be put aside, or laid asleep. We cannot long avoid it; we must meet and overcome it, or it will overcome us. Let us, then, be prepared to encounter it in a spirit of wisdom and of justice, and endeavor to prepare our own minds and the minds of the people, for a just and enlightened decision. The object of the remarks I am about to offer is merely to call public attention to the question, to throw out a few crude and undigested thoughts, as food for reflection, in order to prepare the public mind for the adoption, at no distant day, of some fixed and settled policy in relation to the public lands. I believe that, out of the Western country, there is no subject in the whole range of our legislation less understood, and in relation to which there exists so many errors, and such unhappy prejudices and misconceptions.

There may be said to be two great parties in this country, who entertain very opposite opinions in relation to the character of the policy which the Government has heretofore pursued, in relation to the public lands, as well as to that which ought, hereafter, to be pursued. I propose, very briefly, to examine these opinions, and to throw out for consideration a few ideas in connexion with them. Adverting first, to the past policy of the Government, we find that one party, embracing a very large portion, perhaps at this time a majority of the people of the United States, in all quarters of the Union, entertain the opinion, that, in the settlement of the new States and the disposition of the public lands, Congress has pursued not only a highly just and liberal course, but one of extraordinary kindness and indulgence. We are regarded as having acted towards the new States in the spirit of parental weakness, granting to froward children, not only every thing that was reasonable and proper, but actually robbing ourselves of our property to gratify their insatiable desires. While the other party, embracing the entire West, insist that we have treated them, from the beginning, not like heirs of the estate, but in the spirit of a hard taskmaster, resolved to promote our selfish interests from the fruit of their labor. Now, sir, it is not my present purpose to investigate all the grounds on which these opposite opinions rest; I shall content myself with noticing one or two particulars, in relation to which it has long appeared to me, that the West have had some cause for complaint. I notice them now, not for the purpose of aggravating the spirit of discontent in relation to this subject, which is known to exist in that quarter—for I do not know that my voice will ever reach them—but to assist in bringing others to what I believe to be a just sense of the past policy of the Government in relation to this matter. In the creation and settlement of the new States, the plan has been invariably pursued, of selling out, from time to time, certain portions of the public lands, for the highest price that could possibly be obtained for them in open market, and, until a few years past, on long credits. In this respect, a marked difference is observable between our policy and that of every other nation that has ever attempted to establish colonies or create new States. Without pausing to examine the course pursued in this respect at earlier periods in the history of the world, I will come directly to the measures adopted in the first settlement of the new world, and will confine my observations entirely to North America. The English, the French, and the Spaniards, have successively planted their colonies here, and have all adopted the same policy, which, from the very beginning of the world, had always been found necessary in the settlement of new countries, viz: A free grant of lands, "without money and without price." We all know that the British colonies, at their first settlement here, (whether deriving title directly from the crown or the lords proprietors) received grants for considerations merely nominal.

The payment of "a penny," or a "pepper corn," was the stipulated price which our fathers along the whole Atlantic coast, now composing the old thirteen States, paid for their lands, and even when conditions, seemingly more substantial, were annexed to the grants; such for instance as "settlement and cultivation." These were considered as substantially complied with, by the cutting down a few trees and erecting a log cabin—the work of only a few days. Even these conditions very soon came to be considered as merely nominal, and were never required to be pursued, in order to vest in the grantee the fee simple of the soil. Such was the system under which this country was originally settled, and under which the thirteen colonies flourished and grew up to that early and vigorous manhood, which enabled them in a few years to achieve their independence; and I beg gentlemen to recollect, and note the fact, that, while they paid substantially nothing to the mother country, the whole profits of their industry were suffered to remain in their own hands. Now, what, let us inquire, was the reason which has induced all nations to adopt this system in the settlement of new countries? Can it be any other than this; that it affords the only certain means of building up in a wilderness, great and prosperous communities? Was not that policy founded on the universal belief, that the conquest of a new country, the driving out "the savage beasts and still more savage men," cutting down and subduing the forest, and encountering all the hardships and privations necessarily incident to the conversion of the wilderness into cultivated fields, was worth the fee simple of the soil? And was it not believed that the mother country found ample remuneration for the value of the land so granted in the additions to her power and the new sources of commerce and of wealth, furnished by prosperous and populous States? Now, sir, I submit to the candid consideration of gentlemen, whether the policy so diametrically opposite to this, which has been invariably pursued by the United States towards the new States in the West has been quite so just and liberal, as we have been accustomed to believe. Certain it is, that the British colonies to the north of us, and the Spanish and French to the south and west, have been fostered and reared up under a very different system. Lands, which had been for fifty or a hundred years open to every settler, without any charge beyond the expense of the survey, were, the moment they fell into the hands of the United States, held up for sale at the highest price that a public auction, at the most favorable seasons, and not unfrequently a spirit of the wildest competition, could produce, with a limitation that they should never be sold below a certain minimum price; thus making it, as it would seem, the cardinal point of our policy, not to settle the country, and facilitate the formation of new States, but to fill our coffers by coining our lands into gold.

Let us now consider for a moment, [said Mr. H.] the effect of these two opposite systems on the condition of a new State. I will take the State of Missouri, by way of example. Here is a large and fertile territory, coming into the possession of the United States without any inhabitants but Indians and wild beasts—a territory which is to be converted into a sovereign and independent State. You commence your operations by surveying and selling out a portion of the lands, on long credits, to actual settlers; and, as the population progresses, you go on, year after year, making additional sales on the same terms; and this operation is to be continued, as gentlemen tell us, for fifty or a hundred years at least, if not for all time to come. The inhabitants of this new State, under such a system, it is most obvious, must have commenced their operations under a load of debt, the annual payment of which must necessarily drain their country of the whole profits of their labor, just so long as this system shall last. This debt is due, not from some citizens of the State to others of the same State, (in which case the money would remain in the country) but it is due from the whole population of the State to the United States, by whom it is regularly drawn out, to be expended abroad. Sir, the amount of this debt has, in every one of the new States, actually constantly exceeded the ability of the people to pay, as is proved by the fact that you have been compelled, from time to time, in your great liberality, to extend the credits, and in some instances even to remit portions of the debt, in order to protect some land debtors from bankruptcy and total ruin. Now, I will submit the question to any candid man, whether, under this system, the people of a new State, so situated, could, by any industry or exertion, ever become rich and prosperous. What has been the consequence, sir? Almost universal poverty; no money; hardly a sufficient circulating medium for the ordinary exchanges of society; paper banks, relief laws, and the other innumerable evils, social, political, and moral, on which it is unnecessary for me to dwell. Sir, under a system by which a drain like this is constantly operating upon the wealth of the whole community, the country may be truly said to be afflicted with a curse which it has been well observed is more grievous to be borne “than the barrenness of the soil, and the inclemency of the seasons.” It is said, sir, that we learn from our own misfortunes how to feel for the sufferings of others; and perhaps the present condition of the Southern States has served to impress more deeply on my own mind, the grievous oppression of a system by which the wealth of a country is drained off to be expended elsewhere. In that devoted region, sir, in which my lot has been cast, it is our misfortune to stand in that relation to the Federal Government, which subjects us to a taxation which it requires the utmost efforts of our industry to meet. Nearly the whole amount of our contributions is expended abroad: we stand towards the United States in the relation of Ireland to England. The fruits of our labor are drawn from us to enrich other and more favored sections of the Union; while, with one of the finest climates and the richest products in the world, furnishing, with one-third of the population, two-thirds of the whole exports of the country, we exhibit the extraordinary, the wonderful, and painful spectacle of a country enriched by the bounty of God, but blasted by the cruel policy of man. The rank grass grows in our streets; our very fields are scathed by the hand of injustice and oppression. Such, sir, though probably in a less degree, must have been the effects of a kindred policy on the fortunes of the West. It is not in the nature of things that it should have been otherwise.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

Let gentlemen now pause and consider for a moment what would have been the probable effects of an opposite policy. Suppose, sir, a certain portion of the State of Missouri had been originally laid off and sold to actual settlers for the quit rent of a “peppercorn” or even for a small price to be paid down in cash. Then, sir, all the money that was made in the country would have remained in the country, and, passing from hand to hand, would, like rich and abundant streams flowing through the land, have adorned and fertilized the whole. Suppose, sir, that all the sales that have been effected had been made by the State, and that the proceeds had gone into the State treasury, to be returned back to the people in some of the various shapes in which a beneficent local government exerts its powers for the improvement of the condition of its citizens. Who can say how much of wealth and prosperity, how much of improvement in science and the arts, how much of individual and social happiness, would have been diffused throughout the land! But I have done with this topic.

In coming to the consideration of the next great question, What ought to be the future policy of the Government in relation to the Public Lands? we find the most opposite and irreconcilable opinions between the two parties which I have before described. On the one side it is contended that the public land ought to be reserved as a permanent fund for revenue, and future distribution among the States, while, on the other, it is insisted that the whole of these lands of right belong to, and ought to be relinquished to, the States in which they lie. I shall proceed to throw out some ideas in relation to the proposed policy, that the public lands ought to be reserved for these purposes. It may be a question, Mr. President, how far it is possible to convert the public lands into a great source of revenue. Certain it is, that all the efforts heretofore made for this purpose have most signally failed. The harshness, if not injustice of the proceeding, puts those upon whom it is to operate upon the alert, to contrive methods of evading and counteracting our policy, and hundreds of schemes, in the shape of appropriations of lands for Roads, Canals, and Schools, grants to actual settlers, &c. are resorted to for the purpose of controlling our operations. But, sir, let us take it for granted that we will be able, hereafter, to resist these applications, and to reserve the whole of your lands, for fifty or for a hundred years, or for all time to come, to furnish a great fund for permanent revenue, is it desirable that we should do so? Will it promote the welfare of the United States to have at our disposal a permanent treasury, not drawn from the pockets of the people, but to be derived from a source independent of them? Would it be safe to confide such a treasure to the keeping of our national rulers? to expose them to the temptations inseparable from the direction and control of a fund which might be enlarged or diminished almost at pleasure, without imposing burthens upon the people? Sir, I may be singular—perhaps I stand alone here in the opinion, but it is one I have long entertained, that one of the greatest safeguards of liberty is a jealous watchfulness on the part of the people, over the collection and expenditure of the public money—a watchfulness that can only be secured where the money is drawn by taxation directly from the pockets of the people. Every scheme or contrivance by which rulers are able to procure the command of money by means unknown to, unseen or unfelt by, the people, destroys this security. Even the revenue system of this country, by which the whole of our pecuniary resources are derived from indirect taxation, from duties upon imports, has done much to weaken the responsibility of our federal rulers to the people, and has made them, in some measure, careless of their rights, and regardless of the high trust committed to their care. Can any man believe, sir, that, if twenty-three millions per annum was now levied by direct taxation, or by an apportionment of the same among the States, instead of being raised by an indirect tax, of the severe effect of which few are aware, that the waste and extravagance, the unauthorized imposition of duties, and appropriations of money for unconstitutional objects, would have been tolerated for a single year? My life upon it, sir, they would not. I distrust, therefore, sir, the policy of creating a great permanent national treasury, whether to be derived from public lands or from any other source. If I had, sir, the powers of a magician, and could, by a wave of my hand, convert this capitol into gold for such a purpose, I would not do it. If I could, by a mere act of my will, put at the disposal of the Federal Government any amount of treasure which I might think proper to name, I should limit the amount to the means necessary for the legitimate purposes of the Government. Sir, an immense national treasury would be a fund for corruption. It would enable Congress and the Executive to exercise a control over States, as well as over great interests in the country, nay, even over corporations and individuals—utterly destructive of the purity, and fatal to the duration of our institutions. It would be equally fatal to the sovereignty and independence of the States. Sir, I am one of those who believe that the very life of our system is the independence of the States, and that there is no evil more to be deprecated than the consolidation of this Government. It is only by a strict adherence to the limitations imposed by the constitution on the Federal Government, that this system works well, and can answer the great ends for which it was instituted. I am opposed, therefore, in any shape, to all unnecessary extension of the powers, or the influence of the Legislature or Executive of the Union over the States, or the people of the States; and, most of all, I am opposed to those partial distributions of favors, whether by legislation or appropriation, which has a direct and powerful tendency to spread corruption through the land; to create an abject spirit of dependence; to sow the seeds of dissolution; to produce jealousy among the different portions of the Union, and finally to sap the very foundations of the Government itself.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

But, sir, there is another purpose to which it has been supposed the public lands can be applied, still more objectionable. I mean that suggested in a report from the Treasury Department, under the late administration, of so regulating the disposition of the public lands as to create and preserve, in certain quarters of the Union, a population suitable for conducting great manufacturing establishments. It is supposed, sir, by the advocates of the American System, that the great obstacle to the progress of manufactures in this country is the want of that low and degraded population which infest the cities and towns of Europe, who, having no other means of subsistence, will work for the lowest wages, and be satisfied with the smallest possible share of human enjoyment. And this difficulty it is proposed to overcome, by so regulating and limiting the sales of the public lands, as to prevent the drawing off this portion of the population from the manufacturing States. Sir, it is bad enough that Government should presume to regulate the industry of man; it is sufficiently monstrous that they should attempt, by arbitrary legislation, artificially to adjust and balance the various pursuits of society, and to “organize the whole labor and capital of the country.” But what shall we say of the resort to such means for these purposes! What! create a manufactory of paupers, in order to enable the rich proprietors of woollen and cotton factories to amass wealth? From the bottom of my soul do I abhor and detest the idea, that the powers of the Federal Government should ever be prostituted for such purpose. Sir, I hope we shall act on a more just and liberal system of policy. The people of America are, and ought to be for a century to come, essentially an agricultural people; and I can conceive of no policy that can possibly be pursued in relation to the public lands, none that would be more “for the common benefit of all the States,” than to use them as the means of furnishing a secure asylum to that class of our fellow-citizens, who in any portion of the country may find themselves unable to procure a comfortable subsistence by the means immediately within their reach. I would by a just and liberal system convert into great and flourishing communities, that entire class of persons, who would otherwise be paupers in your streets, and outcasts in society, and by so doing you will but fulfil the great trust which has been confided to your care.

Sir, there is another scheme in relation to the public lands, which, as it addresses itself to the interested and selfish feelings of our nature, will doubtless find many advocates. I mean the distribution of the public lands among the States, according to some ratio hereafter to be settled. Sir, this system of distribution is, in all its shapes, liable to many and powerful objections. I will not go into them at this time, because the subject has recently undergone a thorough discussion in the other House, and because, from present indications, we shall shortly have up the subject here. “Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.” I come now to the claims set up by the West to these lands. The first is, that they have a full and perfect legal and constitutional right to all the lands within their respective limits. This claim was set up for the first time only a few years ago, and has been advocated on this floor by the gentlemen from Alabama and Indiana, with great zeal and ability. Without having paid much attention to this point, it has appeared to me that this claim is untenable. I shall not stop to enter into the argument further than to say, that, by the very terms of the grants under which the United States have acquired these lands, the absolute property in the soil is vested in them, and must, it would seem, continue so until the lands shall be sold or otherwise disposed of. I can easily conceive that it may be extremely inconvenient, nay, highly injurious to a State, to have immense bodies of land within her chartered limits, locked up from sale and settlement, withdrawn from the power of taxation, and contributing in no respect to her wealth or prosperity. But though this state of things may present strong claims on the Federal Government for the adoption of a liberal policy towards the new States, it cannot affect the question of legal or constitutional right. Believing that this claim, on the part of the West, will never be recognized by the Federal Government, I must regret that it has been urged, as I think it will have no other effect than to create a prejudice against the claims of the new States.

But, sir, there has been another much more fruitful source of prejudice. I mean the demands constantly made from the West, for partial appropriations of the public lands for local objects. I am astonished that gentlemen from the Western country have not perceived the tendency of such a course to rivet upon them for ever the system which they consider so fatal to their interests. We have been told, sir, in the course of this debate, of the painful and degrading office which the gentlemen from that quarter are compelled to perform, in coming here, year after year, in the character of petitioners for these petty favors. The gentleman from Missouri tells us, “if they were not goaded on by their necessities, they would never consent to be beggars at our doors.” Sir, their course in this respect, let me say to those gentlemen, is greatly injurious to the West. While they shall continue to ask and gratefully to receive these petty and partial appropriations, they will be kept for ever in a state of dependence. Never will the Federal Government, or rather those who control its operations, consent to emancipate the West, by adopting a wise and just policy, looking to any final disposition of the public lands, while the people of the West can be kept in subjection and dependence, by occasional donations of those lands; and never will the Western States themselves assume their just and equal station among their sisters of the Union, while they are constantly looking up to Congress for favors and gratuities.

What, then, [asked Mr. H.] is our true policy on this important subject? I do not profess to have formed any fixed or settled opinions in relation to it. The time has not yet arrived when that question must be decided; and I must reserve for further lights, and more mature reflection, the formation of a final judgment. The public debt must be first paid. For this, these lands have been solemnly pledged to the public creditors. This done, which, if there be no interference with the Sinking Fund, will be effected in three or four years, the question will then be fairly open, to be disposed of as Congress and the country may think just and proper. Without attempting to indicate precisely what our policy ought then to be, I will, in the same spirit which has induced me to throw out the desultory thoughts which I have now presented to the Senate, suggest for consideration, whether it will not be sound policy, and true wisdom, to adopt a system of measures looking to the final relinquishment of these lands on the part of the United States, to the States in which they lie, on such terms and conditions as may fully indemnify us for the cost of the original purchase, and all the trouble and expense to which we may have been put on their account. Giving up the plan of using these lands forever as a fund either for revenue or distribution, ceasing to hug them as a great treasure, renouncing the idea of administering them with a view to regulate and control the industry and population of the States, or of keeping in subjection and dependence the States, or the people of any portion of the Union, the task will be comparatively easy of striking out a plan for the final adjustment of the land question on just and equitable principles. Perhaps, sir, the lands ought not to be entirely relinquished to any State until she shall have made considerable advances in population and settlement. Ohio has probably already reached that condition. The relinquishment may be made by a sale to the State, at a fixed price, which I will not say should be nominal; but certainly I should not be disposed to fix the amount so high as to keep the States for any length of time in debt to the United States. In short, our whole policy in relation to the public lands may perhaps be summed up in the declaration with which I set out, that they ought not to be kept and retained forever as a great treasure, but that they should be administered chiefly with a view to the creation, within reasonable periods, of great and flourishing communities, to be formed into free and independent States; to be invested in due season with the control of all the lands within their respective limits.

[Here the debate closed for this day.]

THE DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. FOOT, which was the subject of discussion yesterday.

Mr. F. rose and said, that, in conformity with the suggestion of Mr. SPRAGUE, made yesterday, for the purpose of meeting the views of Mr. WOODBURY, he would modify his motion to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire and report the quantity of the public lands remaining unsold within each State and Territory, and whether it be expedient to limit, for a certain period, the sales of the public lands to such lands only as have heretofore been offered for sale, and are now subject to entry at the minimum price; and also, whether the office of Surveyor General, and some of the Land Offices, may not be abolished without detriment to the public interest; or whether it be expedient to adopt measures to hasten the sales, and extend more rapidly the surveys of the public lands.

Mr. WEBSTER said, on rising, that nothing had been further from his intention than to take any part in the discussion of this resolution. It proposed only an inquiry, on a subject of much importance, and one in regard to which it might strike the mind of the mover, and of other gentlemen, that inquiry and investigation would be useful. Although [said Mr. W.] I am one of those who do not perceive any particular utility in instituting the inquiry, I have, nevertheless, not seen that harm would be likely to result from adopting the resolution. Indeed, it gives no new powers, and hardly imposes any new duty on the Committee. All that the resolution proposes should be done, the Committee is quite competent, without the resolution, to do, by virtue of its ordinary powers. But, sir, although I have felt quite indifferent about the passing of the resolution, yet opinions were expressed yesterday on the general subject of the public lands, and on some other subjects, by the gentleman from South Carolina, so widely different from my own, that I am not willing to let the occasion pass without some reply. If I deemed the resolution, as originally proposed, hardly necessary, still less do I think it either necessary or expedient to adopt it, since a second branch has been added to it to-day. By this second branch, the Committee is to be instructed to inquire whether it be expedient to adopt measures to hasten the sales, and extend more rapidly the surveys of the public lands. Now, it appears that, in forty years, we have sold no more than about twenty millions of acres of public lands. The annual sales do not now exceed, and never have exceeded, one million of acres. A million a year is, according to our experience, as much as the increase of population can bring into settlement. And it appears also, that we have, at this moment, sir, surveyed and in the market, ready for sale, two hundred and ten millions of acres, or thereabouts. All this vast mass, at this moment, lies on our hands, for mere want of purchasers. Can any man, looking to the real interests of the country and the people, seriously think of inquiring whether we ought not still faster to hasten the public surveys, and to bring, still more and more rapidly, other vast quantities into the market? The truth is, that, rapidly as population has increased, the surveys have, nevertheless, outran our wants. There are more lands than purchasers. They are now sold at low prices, and taken up as fast as the increase of people furnishes hands to take them up. It is obvious, that no artificial regulation, no forcing of sales, no giving away of the lands even, can produce any great and sudden augmentation of population. The ratio of increase, though great, has yet its bounds. Hands for labor are multiplied only at a certain rate. The lands cannot be settled but by settlers; nor faster than settlers can be found. A system, if now adopted, of forcing sales, at whatever prices, may have the effect of throwing large quantities into the hands of individuals, who would, in this way, in time, become themselves competitors with the Government in the sale of land. My own opinion has uniformly been, that the public lands should be offered freely, and at low prices; so as to encourage settlement and cultivation as rapidly as the increasing population of the country is competent to extend settlement and cultivation. Every actual settler should be able to buy good land, at a cheap rate; but, on the other hand, speculation by individuals, on a large scale, should not be encouraged, nor should the value of all lands, sold and unsold, be reduced to nothing, by throwing new and vast quantities into the market at prices merely nominal.

I now proceed, sir, to some of the opinions expressed by the gentleman from South Carolina. Two or three topics were touched by him, in regard to which he expressed sentiments in which I do not at all concur.

In the first place, sir, the honorable gentleman spoke of the whole course and policy of the Government towards those who have purchased and settled the public lands and seemed to think this policy wrong. He held it to have been, from the first, hard and rigorous; he was of opinion that the United States had acted towards those who had subdued the Western wilderness, in the spirit of a step-mother; that the public domain had been improperly regarded as a source of revenue; and that we had rigidly compelled payment for that which ought to have been given away. He said we ought to have followed the analogy of other Governments, which had acted on a much more liberal system than ours, in planting colonies. He dwelt particularly upon the settlement of America by colonists from Europe; and reminded us that their governments had not exacted from those colonists payment for the soil; with them, he said, it had been thought that the conquest of the wilderness was, itself, an equivalent for the soil; and he lamented that we had not followed the example, and pursued the same liberal course towards our own emigrants to the West.

Now, sir, I deny altogether, that there has been anything harsh or severe in the policy of the Government towards the new States of the West. On the contrary, I maintain that it has uniformly pursued towards those States, a liberal and enlightened system, such as its own duty allowed and required, and such as their interests and welfare demanded. The Government has been no step-mother to the new States; she has not been careless of their interests, nor deaf to their requests; but from the first moment, when the Territories which now form those States, were ceded to the Union, down to the time in which I am now speaking, it has been the invariable object of the Government to dispose of the soil, according to the true spirit of the obligation under which it received it; to hasten its settlement and cultivation, as far and as fast as practicable; and to rear the new communities into equal and independent States, at the earliest moment of their being able, by their numbers, to form a regular government.

I do not admit sir, that the analogy to which the gentleman refers is just, or that the cases are at all similar. There is no resemblance between the cases upon which a statesman can found an argument. The original North American colonists either fled from Europe, like our New England ancestors, to avoid persecution, or came hither at their own charges, and often at the ruin of their fortunes, as private adventurers. Generally speaking, they derived neither succor nor protection from their governments at home. Wide, indeed, is the difference between those cases and ours. From the very origin of the Government, these Western lands, and the just protection of those who had settled or should settle on them, have been the leading objects in our policy, and have led to expenditures, both of blood and treasure, not inconsiderable; not indeed exceeding the importance of the object, and not yielded grudgingly or reluctantly certainly; but yet not inconsiderable, though necessary sacrifices, made for high proper ends. The Indian title has been extinguished at the expense of many millions. Is that nothing? There is still a much more material consideration. These colonists, if we are to call them so, in passing the Alleghany, did not pass beyond the care and protection of their own Government. Wherever they went, the public arm was still stretched over them. A parental Government at home was still ever mindful of their condition, and their wants; and nothing was spared which a just sense of their necessities required. Is it forgotten that it was one of the most arduous duties of the Government, in its earliest years, to defend the frontiers against the Northwestern Indians? Are the sufferings and misfortunes under Har-mar and St. Clair not worthy to be remembered? Do the occurrences connected with these military efforts show an unfeeling neglect of Western interests? And here, sir, what becomes of the gentleman's analogy? What English armies accompanied our ancestors to clear the forests of a barbarous foe? What treasures of the exchequer were expended in buying up the original title to the soil? What governmental arm held its ægis over our fathers' heads, as they pioneered their way in the wilderness? Sir, it was not till General Wayne's victory, in 1794, that it could be said we had conquered the savages. It was not till that period that the Government could have considered itself as having established an entire ability to protect those who should undertake the conquest of the wilderness.

And here, sir, at the epoch of 1794, let us pause, and survey the scene. It is now thirty-five years since that scene actually existed. Let us, sir, look back, and behold it. Over all that is now Ohio, there then stretched one vast wilderness, unbroken, except by two small spots of civilized culture, the one at Marietta, and the other at Cincinnati. At these little openings, hardly each a pin's point upon the map, the arm of the frontiersman had levelled the forest, and let in the sun. These little patches of earth, and themselves almost shadowed by the over hanging boughs of that wilderness, which had stood and perpetuated itself, from century to century, ever since the creation, were all that had then been rendered verdant by the hand of man. In an extent of hundreds and thousands of square miles, no other surface of smiling green attested the presence of civilization. The hunter's path crossed mighty rivers, flowing in solitary grandeur, whose sources lay in remote and unknown regions of the wilderness. It struck, upon the North, on a vast inland sea, over which the wintry tempests raged as on the ocean; all around was bare creation. It was a fresh, untouched, unbounded, magnificent wilderness! And, sir, what is it now? Is it imagination only, or can it possibly be fact, that presents such a change, as surprises and astonishes us, when we turn our eyes to what Ohio now is? Is it reality, or a dream, that, in so short a period even as thirty-five years, there has sprung up, on the same surface, an independent State, with a million of people? A million of inhabitants! an amount of population greater than that of all the cantons of Switzerland; equal to one third of all the people of the United States, when they undertook to accomplish their independence. This new member of the republic has already left far behind her a majority of the old States. She is now by the side of Virginia and Pennsylvania; and in point of numbers, will shortly admit no equal but New York herself. If, sir, we may judge of measures by their results, what lessons do these facts read us upon the policy of the Government? What inferences do they authorize, upon the general question of kindness, or unkindness? What convictions do they enforce, as to the wisdom and ability, on the one hand, or the folly and incapacity, on the other, of our general administration of Western affairs? Sir, does it not require some portion of self-respect in us, to imagine that, if our light had shone on the path of government, if our wisdom could have been consulted in its measures, a more rapid advance to strength and prosperity would have been experienced? For my own part, while I am struck with wonder at the success, I also look with admiration at the wisdom and foresight which originally arranged and prescribed the system for the settlement of the public domain. Its operation has been, without a moment's interruption, to push the settlement of the Western country to the full extent of our utmost means.

But, sir, to return to the remarks of the honorable member from South Carolina. He says that Congress has sold these lands, and put the money into the treasury, while other Governments, acting in a more liberal spirit, gave away their lands; and that we ought, also, to have given ours away. I shall not stop to state an account between our revenues derived from land, and our expenditures in Indian treaties and Indian wars. But, I must refer the honorable gentleman to the origin of our own title to the soil of these territories, and remind him that we received them on conditions, and under trusts, which would have been violated by giving the soil away. For compliance with those conditions, and the just execution of those trusts, the public faith was solemnly pledged. The public lands of the United States have been derived from four principal sources. First, Cessions made to the United States by individual States, on the recommendation or request of the old Congress. Second, The compact with Georgia, in 1802. Third, The purchase of Louisiana, in 1802. Fourth, The purchase of Florida, in

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

1819. Of the first class, the most important was the cession by Virginia, of all her right and title, as well of soil as jurisdiction, to all the territory within the limits of her charter, lying to the Northwest of the river Ohio. It may not be ill-timed to recur to the causes and occasions of this and the other similar grants.

When the war of the Revolution broke out, a great difference existed in different States in the proportion between people and Territory. The Northern and Eastern States, with very small surfaces, contained comparatively a thick population, and there was generally within their limits, no great quantity of waste lands belonging to the Government, or the Crown of England. On the contrary, there were in the Southern States, in Virginia and in Georgia for example, extensive public domains, wholly unsettled and belonging to the Crown. As these possessions would necessarily fall from the crown, in the event of a prosperous issue of the war, it was insisted that they ought to devolve on the United States, for the good of the whole. The war, it was argued, was undertaken, and carried on, at the common expense of all the colonies; its benefits, if successful, ought also to be common; and the property of the common enemy, when vanquished, ought to be regarded as the general acquisition of all. While yet the war was raging, it was contended that Congress ought to have the power to dispose of vacant and unpatented lands commonly called Crown lands, for defraying the expenses of the war, and for other public and general purposes. "Reason and justice," said the Assembly of New Jersey, in 1778, "must decide, that the property which existed in the Crown of Great Britain, previous to the present Revolution, ought now to belong to Congress, in trust for the use and benefit of the United States. They have fought and bled for it, in proportion to their respective abilities, and therefore the reward ought not to be predilectionally distributed. Shall such States as are shut out, by situation, from availing themselves of the least advantage from this quarter, be left to sink under an enormous debt, whilst others are enabled, in a short period, to replace all their expenditures from the hard earnings of the whole confederacy?"

Moved by these considerations, and these addresses, Congress took up the subject, and in September, 1780, recommended to the several States in the Union, having claims to Western Territory, to make liberal cessions of a portion thereof to the United States; and on the 10th of October, 1780, Congress resolved, "That any lands, so ceded in pursuance of their preceding recommendation, should be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States; should be settled and formed into distinct republican States, to become members of the Federal Union, with the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States; and that the lands should be granted or settled, at such times, and under such regulations, as should be agreed on by Congress." Again, in September, 1783, Congress passed another resolution, expressing the conditions on which cessions from States should be received; and in October following, Virginia made her cession, reciting the resolution, or act, of September preceding, and then transferring her title to her Northwestern Territory to the United States, upon the express condition "that the lands, so ceded, should be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as had become or should become members of the confederation, Virginia inclusive, and should be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." The grants from other States were on similar conditions. Massachusetts and Connecticut both had claims to western lands, and both relinquished them to the United States in the same manner. These grants were all made on three substantial conditions or trusts: First, that the ceded territories should be formed into States, and admitted in due time into the Union, with all the rights belonging to other States. Second, that the lands should form a common fund, to be disposed of for the general benefit of all the States. Third, that they should be sold and settled, at such time and in such manner as Congress should direct.

Now, sir, it is plain that Congress never has been, and is not now, at liberty to disregard these solemn conditions. For the fulfilment of all these trusts, the public faith was, and is, fully pledged. How, then, would it have been possible for Congress, if it had been so disposed, to give away these public lands? How could they have followed the example of other Governments, if there had been such, and considered the conquest of the wilderness an equivalent compensation for the soil? The States had looked to this territory, perhaps too sanguinely, as a fund out of which means were to come to defray the expenses of the war. It had been received as a fund—as a fund Congress had bound itself to apply it. To have given it away, would have defeated all the objects which Congress, and particular States, had had in view, in asking and obtaining the cession, and would have plainly violated the conditions which the ceding States attached to their own grants.

The gentleman admits that the lands cannot be given away until the national debt is paid, because, to a part of that debt they stand pledged. But this is not the original pledge. There is, so to speak, an earlier mortgage. Before the debt was funded, at the moment of the cession of the lands, and by the very terms of that cession, every State in the Union obtained an interest in them, as in a common fund. Congress has uniformly adhered to this condition. It has proceeded to sell the lands, and to realize as much from them as was compatible with the other trusts created by the same deeds of cession. One of these deeds of trust, as I have already said, was, that the lands should be sold and settled, "at such time and manner as Congress shall direct." The Government has always felt itself bound, in regard to sale and settlement, to exercise its own best judgment, and not to transfer the discretion to others. It has not felt itself at liberty to dispose of the soil, therefore, in large masses, to individuals, thus leaving to them the time and manner of settlement. It had stipulated to use its own judgment. If, for instance, in order to rid itself of the trouble of forming a system for the sale of those lands, and going into detail, it had sold the whole of what is now Ohio, in one mass, to individuals, or companies, it would clearly have departed from its just obligations. And who can now tell, or conjecture, how great would have been the evil of such a course? Who can say what mischiefs would have ensued, if Congress had thrown these territories into the hands of private speculation? Or who, on the other hand, can now foresee what the event would be, should the Government depart from the same wise course hereafter, and, not content with such constant absorption of the public lands as the natural growth of our population may accomplish, should force great portions of them, at nominal or very low prices, into private hands, to be sold and settled, as and when such holders might think would be most for their own interest? Hitherto, sir, I maintain Congress has acted wisely, and done its duty on this subject. I hope it will continue to do it. Departing from the original idea, so soon as it was found practicable and convenient, of selling by townships, Congress has disposed of the soil in smaller and still smaller portions, till, at length, it sells in parcels of no more than eighty acres; thus putting it into the power of every man in the country, however poor, but who has health and strength, to become a freeholder if he desires, not of barren acres, but of rich and fertile soil. The Government has performed all the conditions of the grant. While it has regarded the public lands as a common fund, and has sought to make what reasonably could be made of them, as a source of revenue, it has also applied its best wisdom to sell and settle them, as fast and as happily as possible; and whensoever numbers would warrant it, each territory has been successively admitted into the Union, with all the rights of an independent State. Is there, then, sir, I ask, any well founded charge of hard dealing; any just accusation for negligence, indifference, or parsimony, which is capable of being sustained against the Government of the country, in its conduct towards the new States? Sir, I think there is not.

But there was another observation of the honorable member, which, I confess, did not a little surprise me. As a reason for wishing to get rid of the public lands as soon as we could, and as we might, the honorable gentleman said, he wanted no permanent sources of income. He wished to see the time when the Government should not possess a shilling of permanent revenue. If he could speak a magical word, and by that word convert the whole capitol into gold, the word should not be spoken. The administration of a fixed revenue, [he said] only consolidates the Government, and corrupts the people! Sir, I confess I heard these sentiments uttered on this floor not without deep regret and pain.

I am aware that these, and similar opinions, are espoused by certain persons out of the capitol, and out of this Government; but I did not expect so soon to find them here. Consolidation!—that perpetual cry, both of terror and delusion—consolidation! Sir, when gentlemen speak of the effects of a common fund, belonging to all the States, as having a tendency to consolidation, what do they mean? Do they mean, or can they mean, any thing more than that the Union of the States will be strengthened, by whatever continues or furnishes inducements to the people of the States to hold together? If they mean merely this, then, no doubt, the public lands as well as every thing else in which we have a common interest, tends to consolidation; and to this species of consolidation every true American ought to be attached; it is neither more nor less than strengthening the Union itself. This is the sense in which the framers of the constitution use the word consolidation; and in which sense I adopt and cherish it. They tell us, in the letter submitting the constitution to the consideration of the country, that, “in all our deliberations on this subject, we kept steadily in our view that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American—the consolidation of our Union—in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety; perhaps our national existence. This important consideration, seriously and deeply impressed on our minds, led each State in the Convention to be less rigid, on points of inferior magnitude, than might have been otherwise expected.”

This, sir, is General Washington's consolidation. This is the true constitutional consolidation. I wish to see no new powers drawn to the General Government; but I confess I rejoice in whatever tends to strengthen the bond that unites us, and encourages the hope that our Union may be perpetual. And, therefore, I cannot but feel regret at the expression of such opinions as the gentleman has avowed; because I think their obvious tendency is to weaken the bond of our connexion. I know that there are some persons in the part of the country from which the honorable member comes, who habitually speak of the Union in terms of indifference, or even of disparagement. The honorable member himself is not, I trust, and can never be, one of these. They significantly declare, that it is time to calculate the value of the Union; and their aim seems to be to enumerate, and to magnify all the evils, real and imaginary, which the Government under the Union produces.

The tendency of all these ideas and sentiments is obviously to bring the Union into discussion, as a mere question of present and temporary expediency; nothing more than a mere matter of profit and loss. The Union to be preserved, while it suits local and temporary purposes to preserve it; and to be sundered whenever it shall be found to thwart such purposes. Union, of itself, is considered by the disciples of this school as hardly a good. It is only regarded as a possible means of good; or on the other hand, as a possible means of evil. They cherish no deep and fixed regard for it, flowing from a thorough conviction of its absolute and vital necessity to our welfare. Sir, I deprecate and deplore this tone of thinking and acting. I deem far otherwise of the Union of the States; and so did the framers of the constitution themselves. What they said I believe; fully and sincerely believe, that the Union of the States is essential to the prosperity and safety of the States. I am a Unionist, and in this sense a National Republican. I would strengthen the ties that hold us together. Far, indeed, in my wishes, very far distant be the day, when our associated and fraternal stripes shall be severed asunder, and when that happy constellation under which we have risen to so much renown, shall be broken up, and be seen sinking, star after star, into obscurity and night!

Among other things, the honorable member spoke of the public debt. To that he holds the public lands pledged, and has expressed his usual earnestness for its total discharge. Sir, I have always voted for every measure for reducing the debt, since I have been in Congress. I wish it paid, because it is a debt; and, so far, is a charge upon the industry of the country, and the finances of the Government. But, sir, I have observed that, whenever the subject of the public debt is introduced into the Senate, a morbid sort of fervor is manifested in regard to it, which I have been sometimes at a loss to understand. The debt is not now large, and is in a course of most rapid reduction. A very few years will see it extinguished. Now I am not entirely able to persuade myself that it is not certain supposed incidental tendencies and effects of this debt, rather than its pressure and charge as a debt, that cause so much anxiety to get rid of it. Possibly it may be regarded as in some degree a tie, holding the different parts of the country together by considerations of mutual interest. If this be one of its effects, the effect itself is, in my opinion, not to be lamented. Let me not be misunderstood. I would not continue the debt for the sake of any collateral or consequential advantage, such as I have mentioned. I only mean to say, that that consequence itself is not one that I regret. At the same time, that if there are others who would, or who do regret it, I differ from them.

As I have already remarked, sir, it was one among the reasons assigned by the honorable member for his wish to be rid of the public lands altogether, that the public disposition of them, and the revenues derived from them, tends to corrupt the people. This, sir, I confess, passes my comprehension. These lands are sold at public auction, or taken up at fixed prices, to form farms and freeholds. Whom does this corrupt? According to the system of sales, a fixed proportion is every where reserved, as a fund for education. Does education corrupt? Is the schoolmaster a corrupter of youth? the spelling book, does it break down the morals of the rising generation? and the Holy Scriptures, are they fountains of corruption? or if, in the exercise of a provident liberality, in regard to its own property as a great landed proprietor, and to high purposes of utility towards others, the Government gives portions of these lands to the making of a canal, or the opening of a road, in the country where the lands themselves are situated, what alarming and overwhelming corruption follows from all this? Can there be nothing pure in government, except the exercise of mere control? Can nothing be done without corruption, but the imposition of penalty and restraint? Whatever is positively beneficent, whatever is actively good, whatever spreads abroad benefits and blessings which all can see, and all can feel, whatever opens intercourse, augments population, enhances the value of property, and diffuses knowledge—must all this be rejected and reprobated as a dangerous and obnoxious policy, hurrying us to the double ruin of a Government, turned into despotism by the mere exercise of acts of beneficence, and of a people, corrupted, beyond hope of rescue, by the improvement of their condition?

The gentleman proceeded, sir, to draw a frightful picture of the future. He spoke of the centuries that must elapse, before all the lands could be sold, and the great hardships that the States must suffer while the United States reserved to itself, within their limits, such large portions of soil, not liable to taxation. Sir, this is all, or mostly, imagination. If these lands were leasehold property, if they were held by the United States on rent, there would be much in the idea. But they are wild lands, held only till they can be sold; reserved no longer than till somebody will take them up, at low prices. As to their not being taxed, I would ask whether the States themselves, if they owned them, would tax them before sale? Sir, if in any case any State can show that the policy of the United States retards her settlement, or prevents her from cultivating the lands within her limits, she shall have my vote to alter that policy. But I look upon the public lands as a public fund, and that we are no more authorized to give them away gratuitously than to give away gratuitously the money in the treasury. I am quite aware that the sums drawn annually from the Western States make a heavy drain upon them, but that is unavoidable. For that very reason, among others, I have always been inclined to pursue towards them a kind and most liberal policy; but I am not at liberty to forget, at the same time, what is due to others, and to the solemn engagements under which the Government rests.

I come now to that part of the gentleman's speech which has been the main occasion of my addressing the Senate. The East! the obnoxious, the rebuked, the always reproached East! We have come in, sir, on this debate, for even more than a common share of accusation and attack. If the honorable member from South Carolina was not our original accuser, he has yet recited the indictment against us, with the air and tone of a public prosecutor. He has summoned us to plead on our arraignment; and he tells us we are charged with the crime of a narrow and selfish policy; of endeavoring to restrain emigration to the West, and, having that object in view, of maintaining a steady opposition to Western measures and Western interests. And the cause of all this narrow and selfish policy, the gentleman finds in the tariff. I think he called it the accursed policy of the tariff. This policy, the gentleman tells us, requires multitudes of dependent laborers, a population of paupers, and that it is to secure these at home that the East opposes whatever may induce to Western emigration. Sir, I rise to defend the East. I rise to repel, both the charge itself, and the cause assigned for it. I deny that the East has, at any time, shown an illiberal policy towards the West. I pronounce the whole accusation to be without the least foundation in any facts, existing either now, or at any previous time. I deny it in the general, and I deny each and all its particulars. I deny the sum total, and I deny the detail. I deny that the East has ever manifested hostility to the West, and I deny that she has adopted any policy that would naturally have led her in such a course. But the tariff! the tariff!! Sir, I beg to say, in regard to the East, that the original policy of the tariff is not hers, whether it be wise or unwise. New England is not its author. If gentlemen will recur to the tariff of 1816, they will find that that was not carried by New England votes. It was truly more a Southern than an Eastern measure. And what votes carried the tariff of 1824? Certainly, not those of New England. It is known to have been made matter of reproach, especially against Massachusetts, that she would not aid the tariff of 1824; and a selfish motive was imputed to her for that also. In point of fact, it is true that she did, indeed, oppose the tariff of 1824. There were more votes in favor of that law in the House of Representatives, not only in each of a majority of the Western States, but even in Virginia herself also, than in Massachusetts. It was literally forced upon New England; and this shows how groundless, how void of all probability any charge must be, which imputes to her hostility to the growth of the Western States, as naturally flowing from a cherished policy of her own. But leaving all conjectures about causes and motives, I go at once to the fact, and I meet it with one broad, comprehensive, and emphatic negative. I deny that, in any part of her history, at any period of the Government, or in relation to any leading subject, New England has manifested such hostility as is charged upon her. On the contrary, I maintain that, from the day of the cession of the territories by the States to Congress, no portion of the country has acted, either with more liberality or more intelligence, on the subject of the Western lands in the new States, than New England. This statement, though strong, is no stronger than the strictest truth will warrant. Let us look at the historical facts. So soon as the cessions were obtained, it became necessary to make provision for the government and disposition of the territory—the country was to be governed. This, for the present, it was obvious, must be by some territorial system of administration. But the soil, also, was to be granted and settled. Those immense regions, large enough almost for an empire, were to be appropriated to private ownership. How was this best to be done? What system for sale and disposition should be adopted? Two modes for conducting the sales presented themselves; the one a Southern, and the other a Northern mode. It would be tedious, sir, here, to run out these different systems into all their distinctions, and to contrast their opposite results. That which was adopted was the Northern system, and is that which we now see in successful operation in all the new States. That which was rejected, was the system of warrants, surveys, entry, and location; such as prevails South of the Ohio. It is not necessary to extend these remarks into invidious comparisons. This last system is that which, as has been emphatically said, has slunged over the country to which it was applied with so many conflicting titles and claims. Every body acquainted with the subject knows how easily it leads to speculation and litigation—two great calamities in a new country. From the system actually established, these evils are banished. Now, sir, in effecting this great measure, the first important measure on the whole subject, New England acted with vigor and effect, and the latest posterity of those who settled Northwest of the Ohio, will have reason to remember, with gratitude, her patriotism and her wisdom. The system adopted was her own system. She knew, for she had tried and proved its value. It was the old fashioned way of surveying lands, before the issuing of any title papers, and then of inserting accurate and precise descriptions in the patents or grants, and proceeding with regular reference to metes and bounds. This gives to original titles, derived from Government, a certain and fixed character; it cuts up litigation by the roots, and the settler commences his labors with the assurance that he has a clear title. It is easy to perceive, but not easy to measure, the importance of this in a new country. New England gave this system to the West; and while it remains, there will be spread over all the West one monument of her intelligence in matters of government, and her practical good sense.

At the foundation of the constitution of these new Northwestern States, we are accustomed, sir, to praise the lawgivers of antiquity; we help to perpetuate the fame of Solon and Lycurgus; but I doubt whether one single law of any lawgiver, ancient or modern, has produced effects of more distinct, marked, and lasting character, than the ordinance of '87. That instrument was drawn by Nathan Dane, then, and now, a citizen of Massachusetts. It was adopted, as I think I have understood, without the slightest alteration; and certainly it has happened to few men, to be the authors of a political measure of more large and enduring consequence. It fixed, forever, the character of the population in the vast regions Northwest of the Ohio, by excluding from them involuntary servitude. It impressed on the soil itself, while it was yet a wilderness, an incapacity to bear up any other than free men. It laid the interdict against personal servitude, in original compact, not only deeper than all local law, but deeper, also, than all local constitutions. Under the circumstances then existing, I look upon this original and seasonable provision, as a real good attained. We see its consequences at this moment, and we shall never cease to see them, perhaps, while the Ohio shall flow. It was a great and salutary measure of prevention. Sir, I should fear the rebuke of no intelligent gentleman of Kentucky, were I to ask whether, if such an ordinance could have been applied to his own State, while it yet was a wilderness, and before Boone had passed the gap of the Alleghany, he does not suppose it would have contributed to the ultimate greatness of that Commonwealth? It is, at any rate, not to be doubted, that, where it did apply, it has produced an effect not easily to be described, or measured in the growth of the States, and the extent and increase of their population. Now, sir, this great measure again was carried by the North, and by the North alone. There were, indeed, individuals elsewhere favorable to it; but it was supported, as a measure, entirely by the votes of the Northern States. If New England had been governed by the narrow and selfish views now ascribed to her, this very measure was, of all others, the best calculated to thwart her purposes. It was, of all things, the very means of rendering certain a vast emigration from her own population to the West. She looked to that consequence only to disregard it. She deemed the regulation a most useful one to the States that would spring up on the territory, and advantageous to the country at large. She adhered to the principle of it perseveringly, year after year, until it was finally accomplished.

Leaving, then, sir, these two great and leading measures, and coming down to our own times, what is there in the history of recent measures of Government that exposes New England to this accusation of hostility to Western interests? I assert, boldly, that in all measures conducive to the welfare of the West, since my acquaintance here, no part of the country has manifested a more liberal policy. I beg to say, sir, that I do not state this with a view of claiming for her any special regard on that account. Not at all. She does not place her support of measures on the ground of favor conferred; far otherwise. What she has done has been consonant to her view of the general good, and, therefore, she has done it. She has sought to make no gain of it; on the contrary, individuals may have felt, undoubtedly, some natural regret at finding the relative importance of their own States diminished by the growth of the West. But New England has regarded that as in the natural course of things, and has never complained of it. Let me see, sir, any one measure favorable to the West which has been opposed by New England, since the Government bestowed its attention to these Western improvements. Select what you will, if it be a measure of acknowledged utility, I answer for it, it will be found that not only were New England votes for it, but that New England votes carried it. Will you take the Cumberland Road? Who has made that? Will you take the Portland Canal? Whose support carried that bill? Sir, at what period beyond the Greek kalends could these measures, or measures like these, have been accomplished, had they depended on the votes of Southern gentlemen? Why, sir, we know that we must have waited till the constitutional notions of those gentlemen had undergone an entire change. Generally speaking, they have done nothing, and can do nothing. All that has been effected has been done by the votes of reproached New England. I undertake to say, sir, that if you look to the votes on any one of these measures, and strike out from the list of ayes the names of New England members, it will be found that in every case the South would then have voted down the West, and the measure would have failed. I do not believe that any one instance can be found where this is not strictly true: I do not believe that one dollar has been expended for these purposes beyond the mountains, which could have been obtained without cordial co-operation and support from New England. Sir, I put the gentleman to the West itself. Let gentlemen who have sat here ten years, come forth and declare by what aids, and by whose votes, they have succeeded in measures deemed of essential importance to their part of the country. To all men of sense and candor; in or out of Congress, who have any knowledge on the subject, New England may appeal, for refutation of the reproach now attempted to be cast upon her in this respect. I take liberty to repeat that I make no claim, on behalf of New England, or on account of that which I have not stated. She does not profess to have acted out of favor: for it would not have become her so to have acted. She solicits for no especial thanks; but, in the consciousness of having done her duty in these things, uprightly and honestly, and with a fair and liberal spirit, be assured she will repel, whenever she thinks the occasion calls for it, an unjust and groundless imputation of partiality and selfishness.

The gentleman alluded to a report of the late Secretary of the Treasury, which, according to his reading or construction of it, recommended what he called the tariff policy, or a branch of that policy; that is, the restraining of emigration to the West, for the purpose of keeping hands at home to carry on the manufactures. I think, sir, that the gentleman misapprehended the meaning of the Secretary, in the interpretation given to his remarks. I understand him only as saying, that, since the low price of lands at the West acts as a constant and standing bounty to agriculture, it is, on that account, the more reasonable to provide encouragement for manufactures. But, sir, even if the Secretary's observation were to be understood as the gentleman understands it, it would not be a sentiment borrowed from any New England source. Whether it be right or wrong, it does not originate in that quarter.

In the course of these remarks, I have spoken of the supposed desire, on the part of the Atlantic States, to check, or at least not to hasten, Western emigration, as a narrow policy. Perhaps I ought to have qualified the expression; because, sir, I am now about to quote the opinions of one to whom I would impute nothing narrow. I am now about to refer you to the language of a gentleman of much and deserved distinction, now a member of the other House, and occupying a prominent situation there. The gentleman, sir, is from South Carolina. In 1825, a debate arose, in the House of Representatives, on the subject of the Western road. It happened to me to take some part in that debate. I was answered by the honorable gentleman to whom I have alluded; and I replied. May I be pardoned, sir, if I read a part of this debate?

"The gentleman from Massachusetts has urged, [said Mr. McDuffie] as one leading reason why the Government should make roads to the West, that these roads have a tendency to settle the public lands; that they increase the inducements to settlement; and that this is a national object. Sir, I differ entirely from his views on the subject. I think that the public lands are settling quite fast enough; that our people need want no stimulus to urge them thither; but want rather a check, at least on that artificial tendency to Western settlement which we have created by our own laws.

"The gentleman says that the great object of Government, with respect to those lands, is not to make them a source of revenue, but to get them settled. What would have been thought of this argument in the old thirteen States? It amounts to this, that those States are to offer a bonus for their own impoverishment—to create a vortex to swallow up our floating population. Look, sir, at the present aspect of the Southern States. In no part of Europe will you see the same indications of decay. Deserted villages, houses falling into ruin, impoverished lands thrown out of cultivation. Sir, I believe that, if the public lands had never been sold, the aggregate amount of the national wealth would have been greater at this moment. Our population, if concentrated in the old States, and not ground down by tariffs, would have been more prosperous and more wealthy. But every inducement has been held out to them to settle in the West, until our population has become sparse; and then the effects of this sparseness are now to be counteracted by another artificial system. Sir, I say if there is any object worthy the attention of this Government, it is a plan which shall limit the sale of the public lands. If those lands were sold according to their real value, be it so. But while the Government continues, as it now does, to give them away, they will draw the population of the older States, and still farther increase the effect which is already distressingly felt, and which must go to diminish the value of all those States possess. And this, sir, is held out to us as a motive for granting the present appropriation. I would not, indeed, prevent the formation of roads on these considerations, but I certainly would not encourage it. Sir, there is an additional item in the account of the benefits which this Government has conferred on the Western States. It is the sale of the public lands at the minimum price. At this moment we are selling to the people of the West, lands at one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre, which are fairly worth fifteen, and which would sell at that price if the markets were not glutted."

"Mr. W. observed, in reply, that the gentleman from South Carolina had mistaken him if he supposed that it was his wish so to hasten the sales of the public lands, as to throw them into the hands of purchasers who would sell again. His idea only went as far as this: that the price should be fixed as low as not to prevent the settlement of the lands, yet not so low as to tempt speculators to purchase. Mr. W. observed that he could not at all concur with the gentleman from South Carolina, in wishing to restrain the laboring classes of population in the Eastern States from going to any part of our territory, where they could better their condition; nor did he suppose that such an idea was anywhere entertained. The observations of the gentleman had opened to him new views of policy on this subject, and he thought he now could perceive why some of our States continued to have such bad roads; it must be for the purpose of preventing people from going out of them. The gentleman from South Carolina supposes that, if our population had been confined to the old thirteen States, the aggregate wealth of the country would have been greater than it now is. But, sir, it is an error that the increase of the aggregate of the national wealth is the object chiefly to be pursued by Government. The distribution of the national wealth is an object quite as important as its increase. He was not surprised that the old States not increasing in population so fast as was expected (for he believed nothing like a decrease was pretended) should be an idea by no means agreeable to gentlemen from those States; we are all reluctant in submitting to the loss of relative importance: but this was nothing more than the natural condition of a country densely populated in one part, and possessing, in another, a vast tract of unsettled lands. The plan of the gentleman went to reverse the order of nature, vainly expecting to retain men within a small and comparatively unproductive territory, "who have all the world before them where to choose." For his own part, he was in favor of letting population take its own course; he should experience no feeling of mortification if any of his constituents liked better to settle on the Kansas, or the Arkansas, or the Lord knows where, within our territory; let them go, and be happier, if they could. The gentleman says our aggregate of wealth would have been greater, if our population had been restrained within the limits of the old States; but does he not consider population to be wealth? And has not this been increased by the settlement of a new and fertile country? Such a country presents the most alluring of all prospects to a young and laboring man; it gives him a freehold; it offers to him weight and respectability in society; and, above all, it presents to him a prospect of a permanent provision for his children. Sir, these are inducements which never were resisted, and never will be; and, were the whole extent of country filled with population up to the Rocky Mountains, these inducements would carry that population forward to the shores of the Pacific Ocean. Sir, it is in vain to talk; individuals will seek their own good, and not any artificial aggregate of the national wealth. A young, enterprising, and hardy agriculturist can conceive of nothing better to him than plenty of good, cheap land."

Sir, with the reading of these extracts, I leave the subject. The Senate will bear me witness that I am not accustomed to allude to local opinions, nor to compare nor contrast different portions of the country. I have often suffered things to pass which I might, properly enough, have considered as deserving a remark, without any observation. But I have felt it my duty, on this occasion, to vindicate the State I represent from charges and imputations on her public character and conduct, which I know to be undeserved and unfounded. If advanced elsewhere, they might be passed, perhaps, without notice. But whatever is said here, is supposed to be entitled to public regard, and to deserve public attention; it derives importance and dignity from the place where it is uttered. As a true Representative of the State which has sent me here, it is my duty, and a duty which I shall fulfil, to place her history and her conduct, her honor and her character, in their just and proper light, so often as I think an attack is made upon her so respectable as to deserve to be repelled.

[Mr. W. concluded by moving the indefinite postponement of the resolution.]

Mr. BENTON followed, and spoke in reply to Mr. W. His remarks will be found consolidated in the succeeding pages.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 21, 1830.

The Senate again resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. FOOT, relative to the Public Lands.

Mr. CHAMBERS hoped that the Senate would consent to postpone the resolution till Monday next, as Mr. WEBSTER, who had engaged in, and wished to be present at, the discussion of the resolution, when it should be resumed, had some unavoidable engagements out of the Senate, and could not conveniently give his attendance before Monday.

Mr. HAYNE said he saw the gentleman from Massachusetts in his seat, and presumed he could make an arrangement which would enable him to be present here during the discussion to-day. He was unwilling that this subject should be postponed, until he had an opportunity of replying to some of the observations which had fallen from the gentleman yesterday. He would not deny that some things had fallen from that gentleman which rankled here, [touching his breast] from which he would desire, at once, to relieve himself. The gentleman had discharged his fire in the face of the Senate. He hoped he would now afford him the opportunity of returning the shot.

Mr. WEBSTER. I am ready to receive it. Let the discussion proceed.

Mr. BENTON then rose, and addressed the Senate about an hour in continuation of the speech which he commenced yesterday, in reply to Mr. WEBSTER, (for which see the consolidated report.)

Mr. BELL now moved that the further consideration of the resolution be postponed to Monday, but the motion was negatived: ayes 13, noes 18.

Mr. HAYNE then took the floor, and spoke about an hour in reply to Mr. WEBSTER's remarks of yesterday; when

The Senate adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 25, 1830.

THE INDIANS.

The following resolution, which was submitted on Thursday, by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, was taken up for consideration:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish to the Senate any information in the possession of his Department, respecting the progress of civilization, for the last eight years, among the Cherokee, Creek, and Choctaw nations of Indians, east of the Mississippi, and the present state of education, civil government, agriculture, and the mechanic arts, among those nations."

Mr. FORSYTH said he could have no objections to the inquiry which the resolution proposed, but he desired that it should be more comprehensive in the information which it was the object of the gentleman to procure. If the gentleman is of a different opinion, I hope [said Mr. F.] he will show the reasons he had for confining the resolution to the three nations of Indians east of the Mississippi, the Cherokee, the Creek, and the Choctaw. I would be glad if the resolution was more extensive; so extensive as to embrace all the Indians in the United States. I do not intend to propose an amendment to the resolution, to the effect I have stated, without first giving the gentleman an opportunity to explain his reasons for limiting the inquiry. If no objection, satisfactory to me, is stated, why the inquiry should not be extended as I have suggested, then I shall move to amend the resolution.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said he had strong reasons why he did not wish to extend the inquiry to other Indians than those mentioned in the resolution, and stronger reasons why it should not be extended to all other Indians. The Senate will perceive [said Mr. F.] that the resolution proposes an inquiry into the progress which these tribes of Indians have made in improvement and civilization, and an investigation into the present state of their civil government, education, agriculture, and the mechanic arts. One of the prominent reasons he said he had for employing this phraseology in the resolution, was, that it is the emphatic terms in which our treaties with these tribes are couched. With respect to agriculture, we have encouraged these free tribes in the pursuit of it. We have agreed, by our solemn treaty, to afford them every facility, by extending to them our patronage; and giving them the countenance of the Government. By our pledges to them, we have guaranteed (and under our solemn faith and obligations are bound to fulfil the pledges we have made to them) the undisturbed, the uninterrupted possession of their territory. It is in vain, said Mr. F. to disguise that an attempt is now made to interrupt that possession; and what were the reasons, he asked, which were urged for the removal of these Indians from the country they now inhabit? Humanity, it is said, requires their removal, and this is the only reason assigned, as appears from the resolutions of the State Legislature, from the public prints of the country; nay, this is the reason given in the very message of the Executive of the Government. Humanity, it is said, calls for our interference, because, while the Indians remain in the neighborhood of the white people, their situation is daily deteriorating, and their population decreasing. Justice calls for a correct statement respecting the condition of these tribes. I want, said Mr. F. to meet the reasons which have been urged for the removal of these people. I want it to be shown to the Senate how true these representations are with regard to these same Indians. With regard to them, and especially to the Cherokees, we are bound to afford every possible encouragement in their improvement. They are rising every day in moral elevation; they are leaving behind them the habits of the savage life; and have established for themselves a civil government; they are entering upon the arts of peace, agriculture, commerce, and mechanics; they know the obligations of law; and in regard to population, instead of its approaching to annihilation or melting away, they have outstripped the whites in any section of country.

I have proposed this resolution, therefore, because I wish to be able to meet the reasons which now assail us, that unless we remove these people, their population will soon melt away. It is in vain we attempt to disguise the tendency of such proceedings. It is my wish, then, said Mr. F. to obtain such information as will enable me to meet those reasons fairly, fully, and fearlessly; and on the faith of treaties, to show that we are pledged to encourage and protect these people. I want to be enabled to prove that they need no such assistance as that proffered to prevent their annihilation. If we only leave them where the faith of treaties renders it obligatory on us to leave them, they will raise themselves to a high moral elevation; they will secure for themselves a strength and stability of civil government, and will make a rapid progress in the cultivation of the arts.

Another reason which justifies the adoption of this resolution is, that, as we have bound ourselves to protect and patronize them in the cultivation of the arts, as independent, sovereign people, it is a duty we owe to ourselves, to them, to this country, and the world at large, which is looking on us, to see that we have fulfilled this obligation, and to ascertain, by a reference to the proper department, what progress they have made in these arts. I therefore apprehend that, if the resolution proposed is adopted, I shall be enabled, when the discussion of this question comes on, to meet, by official documents, the reasons assigned for the removal of these Indians. We shall also be informed what progress they have made in civilization, or, if they have retrograded, what has been the cause of it. If the reasons which he alluded to would be removed by this information, then the reasons to interfere with these people would be also removed.

Mr. FORSYTH replied, that the gentleman from New Jersey had misapprehended him in the observations he had made. I had no objection, Mr. F. said, to the inquiry which the resolution proposed, but I objected to confining the investigation to three sections of the Indians only. I wish that it should embrace all the Indians in the United States. The resolution does not even embrace all the Indians in the part of the country in which the others it mentions inhabit. The Chickasaws are as numerous as any other tribe mentioned; and the same promises, the same pledges, were given to them as to the others. Why then are they excluded? Besides, there are in other parts of the United States Indians residing, to whom the same pledges were given. It was obvious to the Senate that this important question would agitate us in all our relations with the Indians. Like the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] I desire that the question should be presented so as to receive a full discussion; but I have no idea that persons, either in this House or out of it, shall narrow the discussion down to a local or sectional question. For the purpose, then, of applying the inquiry to the condition of all the Indians in the United States, and that those who hold different sentiments from the gentleman from New Jersey, on this subject, may have ground to stand upon, as well as he, I move to strike out of the resolution, the words "in the possession," and to insert, in lieu thereof, the words "within the reach;" and to strike out the words, "the Cherokee, Creek, and Choctaw nations of Indians, east of the Mississippi," and to insert, in lieu thereof, the words, "the Indian nations within the United States;" and also, to erase the two last words of the resolution, (those nations) and in their stead to insert the word "them."

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

Mr. F. proceeded to state that he wanted all the information which could be procured respecting the condition of all the Indians, and that he wished to do justice not only to those who dwell in the southwest part of the United States, but to all those residing in any part of the country. So far as he, (who was unfortunately the only representative of Georgia now in the Senate) could undertake to say, we seek to do nothing which has not been already exercised by the majority of the States of the Union. Mr. F. concluded by saying, if the gentleman from New Jersey wished to take time for the consideration of his amendment, he would move to lay both the resolution and amendment, for the present, on the table.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN did not assent to this course, but suggested to the gentleman from Georgia to propose his amendment in the form of a new resolution. He repeated what his object was in proposing the resolution, and said, if the gentleman from Georgia would consent to the adoption of his resolution, he would not object to the adoption of a resolution embracing the same matter as the present amendment.

Mr. FORSYTH made no reply; and

The question on amending the resolution was then put, and carried in the affirmative, by the casting vote of the President, the ayes and noes being equal.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish to the Senate any information within the reach of his Department, respecting the progress of civilization, for the last eight years, among the Indian nations within the United States, and the present state of education, civil government, agriculture, and the mechanic arts, among them.

MR. FOOT'S RESOLUTION.

The unfinished business of Thursday, being the order of the day, was then resumed; and the question being on the motion of Mr. WEBSTER to postpone, indefinitely, the resolution proposed by Mr. FOOT, concerning the public lands,

Mr. HAYNE rose, and, in continuation of his reply to Mr. WEBSTER, addressed the Senate for two hours and a half.

[The following are the remarks of Mr. H. as delivered on Thursday and to-day.]

Mr. HAYNE began by saying that when he took occasion, two days ago, to throw out some ideas with respect to the policy of the Government in relation to the public lands, nothing certainly could have been further from his thoughts than that he should be compelled again to throw himself upon the indulgence of the Senate. Little did I expect [said Mr. H.] to be called upon to meet such an argument as was yesterday urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER.] Sir, I questioned no man's opinions; I impeached no man's motives; I charged no party, or State, or section of country, with hostility to any other; but ventured, I thought in a becoming spirit, to put forth my own sentiments in relation to a great national question of public policy. Such was my course. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON] it is true, had charged upon the Eastern States an early and continued hostility towards the West, and referred to a number of historical facts and documents in support of that charge. Now, sir, how have these different arguments been met? The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, after deliberating a whole night upon his course, comes into this chamber to vindicate New England, and, instead of making up his issue with the gentleman from Missouri, on the charges which he had preferred, chooses to consider me as the author of those charges, and, losing sight entirely of that gentleman, selects me as his adversary, and pours out all the vials of his mighty wrath upon my devoted head. Nor is he willing to stop there. He goes on to assail the institutions and policy of the South, and calls in question the principles and conduct of the State which I have the honor to represent. When I find a gentleman of mature age and experience, of acknowledged talents and profound sagacity, pursuing a course, like this, declining the contest offered from the West, and making war upon the unoffending South, I must believe, I am bound to believe, he has some object in view that he has not ventured to disclose. Why is this? [asked Mr. H.] Has the gentleman discovered in former controversies with the gentleman from Missouri, that he is overmatched by that Senator? And does he hope for an easy victory over a more feeble adversary? Has the gentleman's distempered fancy been disturbed by gloomy forebodings of "new alliances to be formed," at which he hinted? Has the ghost of the murdered Coalition come back, like the ghost of Banquo, to "sear the eye-balls" of the gentleman, and will it not "down at his bidding?" Are dark visions of broken hopes, and honors lost forever, still floating before his heated imagination? Sir, if it be his object to thrust me between the gentleman from Missouri and himself, in order to rescue the East from the contest it has provoked with the West, he shall not be gratified. Sir, I will not be dragged into the defence of my friend from Missouri. The South shall not be forced into a conflict not its own. The gentleman from Missouri is able to fight his own battles. The gallant West needs no aid from the South to repel any attack which may be made on them from any quarter. Let the gentleman from Massachusetts convert the facts and arguments of the gentleman from Missouri—if he can; and if he win the victory, let him wear its honors: I shall not deprive him of his laurels.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, in reply to my remarks on the injurious operation of our land system on the prosperity of the West, pronounced an extravagant eulogium on the paternal care which the Government had extended towards the West, to which he attributed all that was great and excellent in the present condition of the new States. The language of the gentleman on this topic fell upon my ears like the almost forgotten tones of the tory leaders of the British Parliament, at the commencement of the American Revolution. They, too, discovered, that the colonies had grown great under the fostering care of the mother country; and, I must confess, while listening to the gentleman, I thought the appropriate reply to his argument was to be found in the remark of a celebrated orator, made on that occasion: "They have grown great in spite of your protection."

The gentleman, in commenting on the policy of the Government, in relation to the new States, has introduced to our notice a certain Nathan Dane, of Massachusetts, to whom he attributes the celebrated ordinance of '87, by which he tells us, "slavery was forever excluded from the new States north of the Ohio." After eulogizing the wisdom of this provision, in terms of the most extravagant praise, he breaks forth in admiration of the greatness of Nathan Dane—and great, indeed, he must be, if it be true, as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, that "he was greater than Solon and Lycurgus, Minos, Numa Pompilius, and all the legislators and philosophers of the world," ancient and modern. Sir, to such high authority it is certainly my duty, in a becoming spirit of humility, to submit. And yet, the gentleman will pardon me when I say, that it is a little unfortunate for the fame of this great legislator, that the gentleman from Missouri should have proved that he was not the author of the ordinance of '87, on which the Senator from Massachusetts has reared so glorious a monument to his name. Sir, I doubt not the Senator will feel some compassion for our ignorance, when I tell him, that so little are we acquainted with the modern great men of New England, that, until he informed us yesterday, that we possessed a Solon and a Lycurgus in the person of Nathan Dane, he was only known to the South as a member of a celebrated assembly called and known by the name of "the Hartford Convention." In the proceedings of that assembly, which I hold in my hand, (at page 19) will be found, in a few lines, the history of Nathan Dane; and a little further on, there is conclusive evidence of that ardent devotion to the interests of the new States, which, it seems, has given him a just claim to the title of "Father of the West." By the 2d resolution of the "Hartford Convention," it is declared, "that it is expedient to attempt to make provision for restraining Congress in the exercise of an unlimited power to make new States, and admitting them into the Union." So much for Nathan Dane, of Beverly, Massachusetts.

In commenting upon my views in relation to the public lands, the gentleman insists that it being one of the conditions of the grants, that these lands should be applied to "the common benefit of all the States, they must always remain a fund for revenue," and adds, "they must be treated as so much treasure." Sir, the gentleman could hardly find language strong enough to convey his disapprobation of the policy which I had ventured to recommend to the favorable consideration of the country. And what, sir, was that policy, and what is the difference between that gentleman and myself, on this subject? I threw out the idea, that the public lands ought not to be reserved forever as "a great fund for revenue," that they ought not to be "treated as a great treasure," but that the course of our policy should rather be directed towards the creation of new States, and building up great and flourishing communities.

Now, Sir, will it be believed, by those who now hear me, and who listened to the gentleman's denunciation of my doctrines yesterday, that a book then lay open before him, nay, that he held it in his hand, and read from it certain passages of his own speech, delivered to the House of Representatives, in 1825, in which speech he himself contended for the very doctrines I had advocated, and almost in the same terms. Here is the speech of the Hon. Daniel Webster, contained in the first volume of Gales and Seaton's Register of Debates, (p. 251) delivered in the House of Representatives, on the 18th January, 1825, in a debate on the Cumberland Road—the very debate from which the Senator read yesterday. I shall read from this celebrated speech two passages, from which it will appear that, both as to the past and the future policy of the Government in relation to the public lands, the gentleman from Massachusetts maintained, in 1825, substantially the same opinions which I have advanced, but which he now so strongly reprobates. I said, sir, that the system of credit sales, by which the West had been kept constantly in debt to the United States, and by which their wealth was drained off to be expended elsewhere, had operated injuriously on their prosperity. On this point the gentleman from Massachusetts, in January, 1825, expressed himself thus: "There could be no doubt, if gentlemen looked at the money received into the treasury from the sale of the public lands to the West, and then looked to the whole amount expended by Government, (even including the whole of what was laid out for the army) the latter must be allowed to be very inconsiderable, and there must be a constant drain of money from the West to pay for the public lands. It might, indeed, be said that this was no more than the refluxence of capital which had previously gone over the mountains. Be it so. Still its practical effect was to produce inconvenience, if not distress, by absorbing the money of the people."

I contended that the public lands ought not to be treated merely as "a fund for revenue," that they ought not to be hoarded "as a great treasure." On this point the Senator expressed himself thus: "Government, he believed, had received eighteen or twenty millions of dollars from the public lands, and it was with the greatest satisfaction he adverted to the change which had been introduced in the mode of paying for them; yet he could never think the national domain was to be regarded as any great source of revenue. The great object of the Government in respect to those lands, was not so much the money derived from their sale, as it was the getting of them settled. What he meant to say was, that he did not think they ought to hug that domain as a great treasure, which was to enrich the exchequer."

Now, Mr. President, it will be seen that the very doctrines which the gentleman so indignantly abandons, were urged by him in 1825; and if I had actually borrowed my sentiments from those which he then avowed, I could not have followed more closely in his footsteps. Sir, it is only since the gentleman quoted this book, yesterday, that my attention has been turned to the sentiments he expressed in 1825, and, if I had remembered them, I might possibly have been deterred from uttering sentiments here which, it might well be supposed, I had borrowed from that gentleman.

In 1825, the gentleman told the world, that the public lands "ought not to be treated as a treasure." He now tells us, that "they must be treated as so much treasure." What the deliberate opinion of the gentleman on this subject may be, belongs not to me to determine; but, I do not think he can, with the shadow of justice or propriety, impugn my sentiments, while his own recorded opinions are identical with my own. When the gentleman refers to the conditions of the grants under which the United States have acquired these lands, and insists that, as they are declared to be "for the common benefit of all the States," they can only be treated as so much treasure, I think he has applied a rule of construction too narrow for the case. If, in the deeds of cession, it has been declared that the grants were intended for "the common benefit of all the States," it is clear, from other provisions, that they were not intended merely as so much property: for, it is expressly declared that the object of the grants is the erection of new States; and the United States, in accepting the trust, bind themselves to facilitate the foundation of these States, to be admitted into the Union with all the rights and privileges of the original States. This, sir, was the great end to which all parties looked, and it is by the fulfilment of this high trust, that "the common benefit of all the States" is to be best promoted. Sir, let me tell the gentleman, that, in the part of the country in which I live, we do not measure political benefits by the money standard. We consider as more valuable than gold—liberty, principle, and justice. But, sir, if we are bound to act on the narrow principles contended for by the gentleman, I am wholly at a loss to conceive how he can reconcile his principles with his own practice. The lands are, it seems, to be treated "as so much treasure," and must be applied to the "common benefit of all the States." Now, if this be so, whence does he derive the right to appropriate them for partial and local objects? How can the gentleman consent to vote away immense bodies of these lands—for canals in Indiana and Illinois, to the Louisville and Portland Canal, to Kenyon College in Ohio, to Schools for the Deaf and Dumb, and other objects of a similar description? If grants of this character can fairly be considered as made "for the common benefit of all the States," it can only be because all the States are interested in the welfare of each—a principle which, carried to the full extent, destroys all distinction between local and national objects, and is certainly broad enough to embrace the principle for which I have ventured to contend. Sir, the true difference between us, I take to be this: the gentleman wishes to treat the public lands as a great treasure, just as so much money in the treasury, to be applied to all objects, constitutional and unconstitutional, to which the public money is now constantly applied. I consider it as a sacred trust, which we ought to fulfil, on the principles for which I have contended.

The Senator from Massachusetts has thought proper to present in strong contrast the friendly feelings of the East towards the West, with sentiments of an opposite character displayed by the South in relation to appropriations for internal improvement. Now, sir, let it be recollected that the South have made no professions; I have certainly made none in their behalf, of regard for the West. It has been reserved to the gentleman from Massachusetts, while he vaunts his own personal devotion to Western interests, to claim for the entire section of country to which he belongs, an ardent friendship for the West, as manifested by their support of the system of Internal Improvement, while he casts in our teeth the reproach that the South has manifested hostility to Western interests in opposing appropriations for such objects. That gentleman, at the same time, acknowledged that the South entertains constitutional scruples on this subject. Are we then, sir, to understand, that the gentleman considers it a just subject of reproach, that we respect our oaths, by which we are bound "to preserve, protect, and defend, the constitution of the United States?" Would the gentleman have us manifest our love to the West by trampling under foot our constitutional scruples? Does he not perceive, if the South is to be reproached with unkindness to the West, in voting against appropriations, which the gentleman admits, they could not vote for without doing violence to their constitutional opinions, that he exposes himself to the question, whether, if he was in our situation, he could vote for these appropriations, regardless of his scruples? No, sir, I will not do the gentleman so great injustice. He has fallen into this error from not having duly weighed the force and effect of the reproach which he was endeavoring to cast upon the South. In relation to the other point, the friendship manifested by New England towards the West in their support of the system of internal improvement, the gentleman will pardon me for saying that I think he is equally unfortunate in having introduced that topic. As that gentleman has forced it upon us, however, I cannot suffer it to pass unnoticed. When the gentleman tells us that the appropriations for Internal Improvement in the West would, in almost every instance, have failed, but for New England votes, he has forgotten to tell us the when, the how, and the wherefore, this new-born zeal for the West sprung up in the bosom of New England. If we look back only a few years, we will find, in both Houses of Congress, an uniform and steady opposition, on the part of the members from the Eastern States, generally, to all appropriations of this character. At the time I became a member of this House, and for some time afterwards, a decided majority of the New England Senators were opposed to the very measures which the Senator from Massachusetts tells us they now cordially support. Sir, the journals are before me, and an examination of them will satisfy every gentleman of that fact.

It must be well known to every one whose experience dates back as far as 1825, that, up to a certain period, New England was generally opposed to appropriations for internal improvements in the West. The gentleman from Massachusetts may be himself an exception, but if he went for the system before 1825, it is certain that his colleagues did not go with him. In the session of 1824 and 1825, however, (a memorable era in the history of this country) a wonderful change took place in New England, in relation to the Western interests. Sir, an extraordinary union of sympathies and of interests was then effected, which brought the East and the West into close alliance. The book from which I have before read contains the first public announcement of that happy reconciliation of conflicting interests, personal and political, which brought the East and West together, and locked in a fraternal embrace the two great orators of the East and West. Sir, it was on the 18th January, 1825, while the result of the Presidential election, in the House of Representatives, was still doubtful, while the whole country was looking with intense anxiety to that Legislative hall where the mighty drama was so soon to be acted, that we saw the leaders of two great parties in the House and in the nation "taking sweet counsel together," and in a celebrated debate on the Cumberland Road fighting side by side for Western interests. It was on that memorable occasion that the Senator from Massachusetts held out the white flag to the West, and uttered those liberal sentiments, which he, yesterday, so indignantly repudiated. Then it was that that happy union between the members of the celebrated coalition was consummated, whose immediate issue was a President from one quarter of the Union, with the succession (as it was supposed) secured to another. The "American System," before, a rude, disjointed, and misshapen mass, now assumed form and consistency; then it was, that it became "the settled policy of the Government" that this system should be so administered as to create a reciprocity of interests, and a reciprocal distribution of Government favors—East and West, (the Tariff and Internal Improvements)—while the South—yes, sir, the impracticable South, was to be "out of your protection." The gentleman may boast as much as he pleases of the friendship of New England for the West, as displayed in their support of Internal Improvement; but, when he next introduces that topic, I trust that he will tell us when that friendship commenced, how it was brought about, and why it was established. Before I leave this topic, I must be permitted to say, that the true character of the policy now pursued by the gentleman from Massachusetts and his friends, in relation to appropriations of land and money, for the benefit of the West, is, in my estimation, very similar to that pursued by Jacob of old towards his brother Esau; "it robs them of their birthright for a mess of pottage."

The gentleman from Massachusetts, in alluding to a remark of mine, that, before any disposition could be made of the public lands, the national debt (for which they stand pledged) must be first paid, took occasion to intimate "that the extraordinary fervor which seems to exist in a certain quarter [meaning the South, sir] for the payment of the debt, arises from a disposition to weaken the ties which bind the people to the Union." While the gentleman deals us this blow, he professes an ardent desire to see the debt speedily extinguished. He must excuse me, however, for feeling some distrust on that subject until I find this disposition manifested by something stronger than professions. I shall look for acts, decided and unequivocal acts: for the performance of which an opportunity will very soon (if I am not greatly mistaken) be afforded. Sir, if I were at liberty to judge of the course which that gentleman would pursue, from the principles which he has laid down in relation to this matter, I should be bound to conclude that he will be found acting with those with whom it is a darling object to prevent the payment of the public debt. He tells us he is desirous of paying the debt, "because we are under an obligation to discharge it." Now, sir, suppose it should happen that the public creditors, with whom we have contracted the obligation, should release us from it, so far as to declare their willingness to wait for payment for fifty years to come, provided only the interest shall be punctually discharged. The gentleman from Massachusetts will then be released from the obligation which now makes him desirous of paying the debt; and, let me tell the gentleman, the holders of the stock will not only release us from this obligation, but they will implore, nay, they will even pay us not to pay them. But, adds the gentleman, "so far as the debt may have an effect in binding the debtors to the country, and thereby serving as a link to hold the States together, he would be glad that it should exist forever." Surely then, sir, on the gentleman's own principles, he must be opposed to the payment of the debt.

Sir, let me tell that gentleman that the South repudiates the idea that a pecuniary dependence on the Federal Government is one of the legitimate means of holding the States together. A moneyed interest in the Government is essentially a base interest; and just so far as it operates to bind the feelings of those who are subjected to it to the Government; just so far as it operates in creating sympathies and interests that would not otherwise exist; is it opposed to all the principles of free government, and at war with virtue and patriotism. Sir, the link which binds the public creditors, as such, to their country, binds them equally to all governments, whether arbitrary or free. In a free government, this principle of abject dependence, if extended through all the ramifications of society, must be fatal to liberty. Already have we made alarming strides in that direction. The entire class of manufacturers, the holders of stocks, with their hundreds of millions of capital, are held to the Government by the strong link of pecuniary interests; millions of people, entire sections of country, interested, or believing themselves to be so, in the public lands, and the public treasure, are bound to the Government by the expectation of pecuniary favors. If this system is carried much further, no man can fail to see that every generous motive of attachment to the country will be destroyed, and in its place will spring up those low, grovelling, base, and selfish feelings which bind men to the footstool of a despot by bonds as strong and as enduring as those which attach them to free institutions. Sir, I would lay the foundation of this Government in the affections of the People; I would teach them to cling to it by dispensing equal justice, and, above all, by securing the "blessings of liberty to themselves and to their posterity."

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts has gone out of his way to pass a high eulogium on the State of Ohio. In the most impassioned tones of eloquence, he described her majestic march to greatness. He told us that, having already left all the other States far behind, she was now passing by Virginia, and Pennsylvania, and about to take her station by the side of New York. To all this, sir, I was disposed most cordially to respond. When, however, the gentleman proceeded to contrast the State of Ohio with Kentucky, to the disadvantage of the latter, I listened to him with regret; and when he proceeded further to attribute the great, and, as he supposed, acknowledged superiority of the former in population, wealth, and general prosperity, to the policy of Nathan Dane, of Massachusetts, which had secured to the people of Ohio (by the ordinance of '87) a population of freemen, I will confess that my feelings suffered a revulsion, which I am now unable to describe in any language sufficiently respectful towards the gentleman from Massachusetts. In contrasting the State of Ohio with Kentucky, for the purpose of pointing out the superiority of the former, and of attributing that superiority to the existence of slavery, in the one State, and its absence in the other, I thought I could discern the very spirit of the Missouri question intruded into this debate, for objects best known to the gentleman himself. Did that gentleman, sir, when he formed the determination to cross the southern border, in order to invade the State of South Carolina, deem it prudent, or necessary, to enlist under his banners the prejudices of the world, which, like Swiss troops, may be engaged in any cause, and are prepared to serve under any leader? Did he desire to avail himself of those remorseless allies, the passions of mankind, of which it may be more truly said, than of the savage tribes of the wilderness, "that their known rule of warfare is an indiscriminate slaughter of all ages, sexes, and conditions?" Or was it supposed, sir, that, in a premeditated and unprovoked attack upon the South, it was advisable to begin by a gentle admonition of our supposed weakness, in order to prevent us from making that firm and manly resistance, due to our own character, and our dearest interest? Was the significant hint of the weakness of slave-holding States, when contrasted with the superior strength of free States—like the glare of the weapon half drawn from its scabbard—intended to enforce the lessons of prudence and of patriotism, which the gentleman had resolved, out of his abundant generosity, gratuitously to bestow upon us? [said Mr. H.] The impression which has gone abroad, of the weakness of the South, as connected with the slave question, exposes us to such constant attacks, has done us so much injury, and is calculated to produce such infinite mischiefs, that I embrace the occasion presented by the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to declare that we are ready to meet the question promptly and fearlessly. It is one from which we are not disposed to shrink, in whatever form or under whatever circumstances it may be pressed upon us. We are ready to make up the issue with the gentleman, as to the influence of slavery on individual and national character—on the prosperity and greatness, either of the United States, or of particular States. Sir, when arraigned before the bar of public opinion, on this charge of slavery, we can stand up with conscious rectitude, plead not guilty, and put ourselves upon God and our country. Sir, we will not consent to look at slavery in the abstract. We will not stop to inquire whether the black man, as some philosophers have contended, is of an inferior race, nor whether his color and condition are the effects of a curse inflicted for the offences of his ancestors. We deal in no abstractions. We will not look back to inquire whether our fathers were guiltless in introducing slaves into this country. If an inquiry should ever be instituted in these matters, however, it will be found that the profits of the slave trade were not confined to the South. Southern ships and Southern sailors were not the instruments of bringing slaves to the shores of America, nor did our merchants reap the profits of that "accursed traffic." But, sir, we will pass over all this. If slavery, as it now exists in this country, be an evil, we of the present day found it ready made to our hands. Finding our lot cast among a people, whom God had manifestly committed to our care, we did not sit down to speculate on abstract questions of theoretical liberty. We met it as a practical question of obligation and duty. We resolved to make the best of the situation in which Providence had placed us, and to fulfil the high trust which had devolved upon us as the owners of slaves, in the only way in which such a trust could be fulfilled, without spreading misery and ruin throughout the land. We found that we had to deal with a people whose physical, moral, and intellectual habits and character, totally disqualified them from the enjoyment of the blessings of freedom. We could not send them back to the shores from whence their fathers had been taken; their numbers forbade the thought, even if we did not know that their condition here is infinitely preferable to what it possibly could be among the barren sands and savage tribes of Africa; and it was wholly irreconcilable with all our notions of humanity to tear asunder the tender ties which they had formed among us, to gratify the feelings of a false philanthropy. What a commentary on the wisdom, justice, and humanity, of the Southern slave owner is presented by the example of certain benevolent associations and charitable individuals elsewhere. Shedding weak tears over sufferings which had existence only in their own sickly imaginations, these "friends of humanity" set themselves systematically to work to seduce the slaves of the South from their masters. By means of missionaries and political tracts, the scheme was in a great measure successful. Thousands of these deluded victims of fanaticism were seduced into the enjoyment of freedom in our Northern cities. And what has been the consequence? Go to these cities now, and ask the question. Visit the dark and narrow lanes, and obscure recesses, which have been assigned by common consent as the abodes of those outcasts of the world—the free people of color. Sir, there does not exist, on the face of the whole earth, a population so poor, so wretched, so vile, so loathsome, so utterly destitute of all the comforts, conveniences, and decencies of life, as the unfortunate blacks of Philadelphia, and New York, and Boston. Liberty has been to them the greatest of calamities, the heaviest of curses. Sir, I have had some opportunities of making comparisons between the condition of the free negroes of the North and the slaves of the South, and the comparison has left not only an indelible impression of the superior advantages of the latter, but has gone far to reconcile me to slavery itself. Never have I felt so forcibly that touching description, "the foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the son of man hath not where to lay his head," as when I have seen this unhappy race, naked and houseless, almost starving in the streets, and abandoned by all the world. Sir, I have seen in the neighborhood of one of the most moral, religious, and refined cities of the North, a family of free blacks, driven to the caves of the rock, and there obtaining a precarious subsistence from charity and plunder.

When the gentleman from Massachusetts adopts and reiterates the old charge of weakness as resulting from slavery, I must be permitted to call for the proof of those blighting effects which he ascribes to its influence. I suspect that when the subject is closely examined, it will be found that there is not much force even in the plausible objection of the want of physical power in slave holding States. The power of a country is compounded of its population and its wealth; and, in modern times, where, from the very form and structure of society, by far the greater portion of the people must, even during the continuance of the most desolating wars, be employed in the cultivation of the soil, and other peaceful pursuits, it may be well doubted whether slave holding States, by reason of the superior value of their productions, are not able to maintain a number of troops in the field, fully equal to what could be supported by States with a larger white population, but not possessed of equal resources.

It is a popular error to suppose, that, in any possible state of things, the people of a country could ever be called out en masse, or that a half, or a third, or even a fifth part of the physical force of any country could ever be brought into the field. The difficulty is not to procure men, but to provide the means of maintaining them; and in this view of the subject, it may be asked whether the Southern States are not a source of strength and power, and not of weakness, to the country? whether they have not contributed, and are not now contributing, largely, to the wealth and prosperity of every State in this Union? From a statement which I hold in my hand, it appears that, in ten years (from 1818 to 1827 inclusive) the whole amount of the domestic exports of the United States was five hundred and twenty-one millions eight hundred and eleven thousand and forty-five dollars. Of which, three articles, the product of slave labor, namely, cotton, rice, and tobacco, amounted to three hundred and thirty-nine millions two hundred and three thousand two hundred and thirty-two dollars, equal to about two-thirds of the whole. It is not true, as has been supposed, that the advantages of this labor is confined almost exclusively to the Southern States. Sir, I am thoroughly convinced that, at this time, the States North of the Potomac actually derive greater profits from the labor of our slaves, than we do ourselves. It appears, from our public documents, that, in seven years, (from 1821 to 1827 inclusive) the six Southern States exported to the amount of one hundred and ninety millions three hundred and thirty-seven thousand two hundred and eighty-one dollars; and imported to the value of fifty-five millions six hundred and forty-six thousand three hundred and one dollars. Now, the difference between these two sums, near one hundred and forty millions of dollars, passed through the hands of the Northern merchants, and enabled them to carry on their commercial operations with all the world. Such part of these goods as found its way back to our hands, came charged with the duties, as well as the profits of the merchant, the ship owner, and a host of others, who found employment in carrying on these immense exchanges; and, for such part as was consumed at the North, we received in exchange Northern manufactures, charged with an increased price, to cover all the taxes which the Northern consumer had been compelled to pay on the imported article. It will be seen, therefore, at a glance, how much slave labor has contributed to the wealth and prosperity of the United States; and how largely our Northern brethren have participated in the profits of that labor. Sir, on this subject I will quote an authority which will, I doubt not, be considered by the Senator from Massachusetts as entitled to high respect. It is from the great father of the American System—honest Mathew Carey; no great friend, it is true, at this time, to Southern rights and Southern interests, but not the worst authority, on that account, on the point in question.

Speaking of the relative importance to the Union of the Southern and the Eastern States, Mathew Carey, in the sixth edition of his "Olive Branch," page 278, after exhibiting a number of statistical tables, to show the decided superiority, of the former, thus proceeds:

"But I am tired of this investigation. I sickened for the honor of the human species. What idea must the world form of the arrogance of the pretensions on the one side, [the East] and of the folly and weakness of the rest of the Union, to have so long suffered them to pass without exposure and detection? The naked fact is, that the demagogues in the Eastern States, not satisfied with deriving all the benefit from the Southern section of the Union that they would from so many wealthy colonies; with making princely fortunes by the carriage and exportation of its bulky and valuable productions, and supplying it with their own manufactures, and the productions of Europe, and the East and West Indies, to an enormous amount, and at an immense profit, have uniformly treated it with outrage, insult, and injury. And, regardless of their vital interests, the Eastern States were lately courting their own destruction, by allowing a few restless, turbulent men, to lead them blindfold to a separation, which was pregnant with their certain ruin. Whenever that event takes place they sink into insignificance. If a separation were desirable to any part of the Union, it would be to the Middle and Southern States, particularly the latter, who have been so long harassed with the complaints, the restlessness, the turbulence, and the ingratitude, of the Eastern States, that their patience has been tried almost beyond endurance. 'Jeshurun waxed fat and kicked'; and he will be severely punished for his kicking, in the event of a dissolution of the Union."

Sir, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I do not adopt these sentiments as my own. I quote them to show that very different sentiments have prevailed in former times, as to the weakness of the slave holding States, from those which now seem to have become fashionable in certain quarters. I know it has been supposed, by certain ill informed persons, that the South exists only by the countenance and protection of the North. Sir, this is the idlest of all idle and ridiculous fancies that ever entered into the mind of man. In every State of this Union, except one, the free white population actually preponderates; while in the British West India Islands, where the average white population is less than ten per cent. of the whole, the slaves are kept in entire subjection. It is preposterous to suppose that the Southern States could ever find the smallest difficulty in this respect. On this subject, as in all others, we ask nothing of our Northern brethren but to "let us alone;" leave us to the undisturbed management of our domestic concerns, and the direction of our own industry, and we will ask no more. Sir, all our difficulties on this subject have arisen from interference from abroad, which has disturbed, and may again disturb, our domestic tranquillity, just so far as to bring down punishment upon the heads of the unfortunate victims of a fanatical and mistaken humanity.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

There is a spirit, which, like the father of evil, is constantly "walking to and fro about the earth, seeking whom it may devour." It is the spirit of false philanthropy. The persons whom it possesses do not indeed throw themselves into the flames, but they are employed in lighting up the torches of discord throughout the community. Their first principle of action is to leave their own affairs, and neglect their own duties, to regulate the affairs and the duties of others. Theirs is the task to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, of other lands, whilst they thrust the naked, famished, and shivering beggar from their own doors; to instruct the heathen, while their own children want the bread of life. When this spirit infuses itself into the bosom of a statesman, (if one so possessed can be called a statesman) it converts him at once into a visionary enthusiast. Then it is that he indulges in golden dreams of national greatness and prosperity. He discovers that "liberty is power;" and not content with vast schemes of improvement at home, which it would bankrupt the treasury of the world to execute, he flies to foreign lands, to fulfil obligations to "the human race," by inculcating the principles of "political and religious liberty," and promoting the "general welfare" of the whole human race. It is a spirit which has long been busy with the slaves of the South, and is even now displaying itself in vain efforts to drive the Government from its wise policy in relation to the Indians. It is this spirit which has filled the land with thousands of wild and visionary projects, which can have no effect but to waste the energies and dissipate the resources of the country. It is the spirit, of which the aspiring politician dexterously avails himself, when, by inscribing on his banner the magical words "liberty and philanthropy," he draws to his support that entire class of persons who are ready to bow down at the very names of their idols.

But, sir, whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the effect of slavery on national wealth and prosperity, if we may trust to experience, there can be no doubt that it has never yet produced any injurious effect on individual or national character. Look through the whole history of the country, from the commencement of the Revolution down to the present hour; where are there to be found brighter examples of intellectual and moral greatness, than have been exhibited by the sons of the South? From the Father of his Country, down to the distinguished chieftain who has been elevated, by a grateful people, to the highest office in their gift, the interval is filled up by a long line of orators, of statesmen, and of heroes, justly entitled to rank among the ornaments of their country, and the benefactors of mankind. Look at "the Old Dominion," great and magnanimous Virginia, "whose jewels are her sons." Is there any State in this Union which has contributed so much to the honor and welfare of the country? Sir, I will yield the whole question; I will acknowledge the fatal effects of slavery upon character; if any one can say that, for noble disinterestedness, ardent love of country, exalted virtue, and a pure and holy devotion to liberty, the people of the Southern States have ever been surpassed by any in the world. I know, sir, that this devotion to liberty has sometimes been supposed to be at war with our institutions; but it is in some degree the result of those very institutions. Burke, the most philosophical of statesmen, as he was the most accomplished of orators, well understood the operation of this principle, in elevating the sentiments and exalting the principles of the people in slaveholding States. I will conclude my remarks on this branch of the subject, by reading a few passages from his speech "on moving his resolutions for conciliation with the colonies, the 22d of March, 1775."

"There is a circumstance attending the Southern colonies, which makes the spirit of liberty still more high and haughty than in those to the Northward. It is, that in Virginia and the Carolinas they have a vast multitude of slaves. Where this is the case, in any part of the world, those who are free are by far the most proud and jealous of their freedom. Freedom is to them not only an enjoyment, but a kind of rank and privilege. Not seeing there, as in countries where it is a common blessing, and as broad and general as the air, that it may be united with much abject toil, with great misery, with all the exterior of servitude, liberty looks among them like something more noble and liberal. I do not mean, sir, to commend the superior morality of this sentiment, which has, at least, as much of pride as virtue in it; but I cannot alter the nature of man. The fact is so, and these people of the Southern colonies are much more strongly, and with a higher and more stubborn spirit, attached to liberty, than those to the Northward. Such were all the ancient commonwealths; such were our Gothic ancestors; such, in our days, were the Poles; and such will be all masters of slaves who are not slaves themselves. In such a people, the haughtiness of domination, combined with the spirit of freedom, fortifies it, and renders it invincible."

In the course of my former remarks, I took occasion to deprecate, as one of the greatest of evils, the consolidation of this Government. The gentleman takes alarm at the sound. "Consolidation," like the "tariff," grates upon his ear. He tells us, "we have heard much, of late, about consolidation; that it is the rallying word for all who are endeavoring to weaken the Union by adding to the power of the States." But consolidation, says the gentleman, was the very object for which the Union was formed; and in support of that opinion, he read a passage from the address of the President of the Convention to Congress (which he assumes to be authority on his side of the question.) But, sir, the gentleman is mistaken. The object of the framers of the constitution, as disclosed in that address, was not the consolidation of the Government, but "the consolidation of the Union." It was not to draw power from the States, in order to transfer it to a great National Government, but, in the language of the constitution itself, "to form a more perfect union;" and by what means? By "establishing justice," "promoting domestic tranquillity," and "securing the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." This is the true reading of the constitution. But, according to the gentleman's reading, the object of the constitution was to consolidate the Government, and the means would seem to be, the promotion of injustice, causing domestic discord, and depriving the States and the people "of the blessings of liberty" forever. The gentleman boasts of belonging to the party of national republicans. National republicans! a new name, sir, for a very old thing. The national republicans of the present day were the federalists of '98, who became federal republicans during the war of 1812, and were manufactured into national republicans somewhere about the year 1825. As a party, (by whatever name distinguished) they have always been animated by the same principles, and have kept steadily in view a common object—the consolidation of the Government.

Sir, the party to which I am proud of having belonged from the very commencement of my political life to the present day, were the democrats of '98. Anarchists, anti-federalists, revolutionists, I think they were sometimes called. They assumed the name of democratic republicans in 1812, and have retained their name and their principles up to the present hour. True to their political faith, they have always, as a party, been in favor of limitations of power; they have insisted that all powers not delegated to the Federal Government are reserved, and have been constantly struggling, as they are now struggling, to preserve the rights of the States, and prevent them from being drawn into the vortex, and swallowed up by one great consolidated Government. Sir, any one acquainted with the history of parties in this country will recognize in the points now in dispute between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself, the very grounds which have, from the beginning, divided the two great parties in this country, and which (call these parties by what names you will, and amalgamate them as you may) will divide them forever. The true distinction between those parties is laid down in a celebrated manifesto issued by the convention of the federalists of Massachusetts, assembled in Boston, in February, 1824, on the occasion of organizing a party opposition to the re-election of Governor Eustis. The gentleman will recognize this as "the canonical book of political scripture," and it instructs us, that "when the American colonies redeemed themselves from British bondage, and became so many independent nations, they proposed to form a national union." (Not a federal union, sir, but a national union.) "Those who were in favor of a union of the States in this form became known by the name of federalists; those who wanted no union of the States, or disliked the proposed form of union, became known by the name of anti-federalists. By means which need not be enumerated, the anti-federalists became, after the expiration of twelve years, our national rulers; and, for a period of sixteen years, until the close of Mr. Madison's administration in 1817, continued to exercise the exclusive direction of our public affairs." Here, sir, is the true history of the origin, rise, and progress, of the party of national republicans, who date back to the very origin of the Government, and who, then, as now, chose to consider the constitution as having created not a federal but a national union; who regarded "consolidation" as no evil, and who doubtless consider it "a consummation devoutly to be wished," to build up a great "central Government," "one and indivisible." Sir, there have existed, in every age and every country, two distinct orders of men—the lovers of freedom, and the devoted advocates of power. The same great leading principles, modified only by peculiarities of manners, habits, and institutions, divided parties in the ancient republics, animated the whigs and tories of Great Britain, distinguished in our own times the liberals and ultras of France, and may be traced even in the bloody struggles of unhappy Spain. Sir, when the gallant Riego, who devoted himself, and all that he possessed, to the liberties of his country, was dragged to the scaffold, followed by the tears and lamentations of every lover of freedom throughout the world, he perished amidst the deafening cries of "Long live the absolute King!" The people whom I represent are the descendants of those who brought with them to this country, as the most precious of their possessions, "an ardent love of liberty;" and while that shall be preserved, they will always be found manfully struggling against the consolidation of the Government, as the worst of evils.

The Senator from Massachusetts, in alluding to the tariff, becomes quite facetious. He tells us that "he hears of nothing but tariff! tariff! tariff!" and if a word could be found to rhyme with it, he presumes it would be celebrated in verse, and set to music." Sir, perhaps the gentleman, in mockery of our complaints, may be himself disposed to sing the praises of the tariff in doggerel verse to the tune of "Old Hundred." I am not at all surprised, however, at the aversion of the gentleman to the very name of tariff. I doubt not that it must always bring up some very unpleasant recollections to his mind. If I am not greatly mistaken, the Senator from Massachusetts was a leading actor at a great meeting got up in Boston in 1820, against the tariff. It has generally been supposed that he drew up the resolutions adopted by that meeting, denouncing the tariff system as unequal, oppressive, and unjust; and, if I am not much mistaken, denying its constitutionality. Certain it is that the gentleman made a speech on that occasion in support of those resolutions, denouncing the system in no very measured terms; and if my memory serves me, calling its constitutionality in question. I regret that I have not been able to lay my hands on those proceedings, but I have seen them, and I cannot be mistaken in their character. At that time, sir, the Senator from Massachusetts entertained the very sentiments in relation to the tariff which the South now entertains. We next find the Senator from Massachusetts expressing his opinion on the tariff as a member of the House of Representatives from the city of Boston in 1824. On that occasion, sir, the gentleman assumed a position which commanded the respect and admiration of his country. He stood forth the powerful and fearless champion of free trade. He met, in that conflict, the advocates of restriction and monopoly, and they "fled from before his face." With a profound sagacity, a fulness of knowledge, and a richness of illustration that has never been surpassed, he maintained and established the principles of commercial freedom on a foundation never to be shaken. Great indeed was the victory achieved by the gentleman on that occasion; most striking the contrast between the clear, forcible, and convincing arguments by which he carried away the understandings of his hearers, and the narrow views and wretched sophistry of another distinguished orator, who may be truly said to have "held up his farthing candle to the sun." Sir, the Senator from Massachusetts, on that, (the proudest day of his life) like a mighty giant bore away upon his shoulders the pillars of the temple of error and delusion, escaping himself unhurt, and leaving its adversaries overwhelmed in its ruins. Then it was that he erected to free trade a beautiful and enduring monument, and "inscribed the marble with his name." It is with pain and regret that I now go forward to the next great era in the political life of that gentleman, when he was found upon this floor, supporting, advocating, and finally voting for the tariff of 1828—that "bill of abominations." By that act, sir, the Senator from Massachusetts has destroyed the labors of his whole life, and given a wound to the cause of free trade, never to be healed. Sir, when I recollect the position which that gentleman once occupied, and that which he now holds in public estimation, in relation to this subject, it is not at all surprising that the tariff should be hateful to his ears. Sir, if I had erected to my own fame so proud a monument as that which the gentleman built up in 1824, and I could have been tempted to destroy it with my own hands, I should hate the voice that should ring "the accursed tariff" in my ears. I doubt not the gentleman feels very much in relation to the tariff as a certain knight did to "instinct," and with him would be disposed to exclaim—

"Ah! no more of that Hal, an thou lo'v'st me."

But, to be serious, what are we, of the South, to think of what we have heard this day? The Senator from Massachusetts tells us that the tariff is not an Eastern measure, and treats it as if the East had no interest in it. The Senator from Missouri insists it is not a Western measure, and that it has done no good to the West. The South comes in, and in the most earnest manner represents to you, that this measure, which we are told "is of no value to the East or the West," is "utterly destructive of our interests." We represent to you, that it has spread ruin and devastation through the land, and prostrated our hopes in the dust. We solemnly declare that we believe the system to be wholly unconstitutional, and a violation of the compact between the States and the Union, and our brethren turn a deaf ear to our complaints, and refuse to relieve us from a system "which not enriches them, but makes us poor indeed." Good God! has it come to this? Do gentlemen hold the feelings and wishes of their brethren at so cheap a rate, that they refuse to gratify them at so small a price? Do gentlemen value so lightly the peace and harmony of the country, that they will not yield a measure of this description to the affectionate entreaties and earnest remonstrances of their friends? Do gentlemen estimate the value of the Union at so low a price, that they will not even make one effort to bind the States together with the cords of affection? And has it come to this? Is this the spirit in which this Government is to be administered? If so, let me tell gentlemen the seeds of dissolution are already sown, and our children will reap the bitter fruit.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] while he exonerates me personally from the charge, intimates that there is a party in the country who are looking to disunion. Sir, if the gentleman had stopped there, the accusation would "have passed by me as the idle wind which I regard not." But, when he goes on to give to his accusation a local habitation and a name, by quoting the expression of a distinguished citizen of South Carolina, [Dr. Cooper] "that it was time for the South to calculate the value of the Union," and, in the language of the bitterest sarcasm, adds, "surely then the Union cannot last longer than July, 1831," it is impossible to mistake either the allusion or the object of the gentleman. Now I call upon every one who hears me to bear witness that this controversy is not of my seeking. The Senate will do me the justice to remember, that, at the time this unprovoked and uncalled for attack was made upon the South, not one word had been uttered by me in disparagement of New England, nor had I made the most distant allusion, either to the Senator from Massachusetts, or the State he represents. But, sir, that gentleman has thought proper, for purposes best known to himself, to strike the South through me, the most unworthy of her servants. He has crossed the border, he has invaded the State of South Carolina, is making war upon her citizens, and endeavoring to overthrow her principles and her institutions. Sir, when the gentleman provokes me to such a conflict, I meet him at the threshold. I will struggle while I have life, for our altars and our fire sides, and if God gives me strength, I will drive back the invader discomfited. Nor shall I stop there. If the gentleman provokes the war, he shall have war. Sir, I will not stop at the border; I will carry the war into the enemy's territory, and not consent to lay down my arms, until I shall have obtained "indemnity for the past, and security for the future." It is with unfeigned reluctance that I enter upon the performance of this part of my duty. I shrink almost instinctively from a course, however necessary, which may have a tendency to excite sectional feelings, and sectional jealousies. But, sir, the task has been forced upon me, and I proceed right onward to the performance of my duty; be the consequences what they may, the responsibility is with those who have imposed upon me this necessity. The Senator from Massachusetts has thought proper to cast the first stone, and if he shall find, according to a homely adage, "that he lives in a glass house," on his head be the consequences. The gentleman has made a great flourish about his fidelity to Massachusetts. I shall make no professions of zeal for the interests and honor of South Carolina—of that my constituents shall judge. If there be one State in this Union (and I say it not in a boastful spirit) that may challenge comparison with any other for an uniform, zealous, ardent, and uncalculating devotion to the Union, that State is South Carolina. Sir, from the very commencement of the Revolution, up to this hour, there is no sacrifice, however great, she has not cheerfully made; no service she has ever hesitated to perform. She has adhered to you in your prosperity, but in your adversity she has clung to you with more than filial affection. No matter what was the condition of her domestic affairs, though deprived of her resources, divided by parties, or surrounded by difficulties, the call of the country has been to her as the voice of God. Domestic discord ceased at the sound—every man became at once reconciled to his brethren, and the sons of Carolina were all seen crowding together to the temple, bringing their gifts to the altar of their common country. What, sir, was the conduct of the South during the Revolution? Sir, I honor New England for her conduct in that glorious struggle. But great as is the praise which belongs to her, I think at least equal honor is due to the South. They espoused the quarrel of their brethren with a generous zeal, which did not suffer them to stop to calculate their interest in the dispute. Favorites of the mother country, possessed of neither ships nor seamen to create commercial rivalry, they might have found in their situation a guarantee that their trade would be forever fostered and protected by Great Britain. But trampling on all considerations, either of interest or of safety, they rushed into the conflict, and, fighting for principle, periled all in the sacred cause of freedom. Never was there exhibited, in the history of the world, higher examples of noble daring, dreadful suffering, and heroic endurance, than by the whigs of Carolina, during that Revolution. The whole State, from the mountains to the sea, was overrun by an overwhelming force of the enemy. The fruits of industry perished on the spot where they were produced, or were consumed by the foe. The "plains of Carolina" drank up the most precious blood of her citizens! Black and smoking ruins marked the places which had been the habitations of her children! Driven from their homes, into the gloomy and almost impenetrable swamps, even there the spirit of liberty survived, and South Carolina (sustained by the example of her Sumpters and her Marions) proved by her conduct, that, though her soil might be overrun, the spirit of her people was invincible.

But, sir, our country was soon called upon to engage in another revolutionary struggle, and that too was as struggle for principle—I mean the political revolution which dates back to '98, and which, if it had not been successfully achieved, would have left us none of the fruits of the Revolution of '76. The revolution of '98 restored the constitution, rescued the liberty of the citizen from the grasp of those who were aiming at its life, and in the emphatic language of Mr. Jefferson, "saved the constitution at its last gasp." And by whom was it achieved? By the South, sir, aided only by the democracy of the North and West.

I come now to the war of 1812—a war which I well remember was called, in derision, (while its event was doubtful) the Southern war, and sometimes the Carolina war; but which is now universally acknowledged to have done more for the honor and prosperity of the country, than all other events in our history put together. What, sir, were the objects of that war? "Free trade and sailors' rights!" It was for the protection of Northern shipping and New England seamen that the country flew to arms. What interest had the South in that contest? If they had sat down coldly to calculate the value of their interests involved in it, they would have found that they had every thing to lose and nothing to gain. But, sir, with that generous devotion to country so characteristic of the South, they only asked if the rights of any portion of their fellow-citizens had been invaded; and when told that Northern ships and New England seamen had been arrested on the common highway of nations, they felt that the honor of their country was assailed; and, acting on that exalted sentiment, "which feels a stain like a wound," they resolved to seek, in open war, for redress of those injuries which it did not become freemen to endure. Sir, the whole South, animated as by a common impulse, cordially united in declaring and promoting that war. South Carolina sent to your councils, as the advocates and supporters of that war, the noblest of persons. How they fulfilled that trust let a grateful country tell. Not a measure was adopted, not a battle fought, not a victory won, which contributed in any degree to the success of that war, to which Southern councils and Southern valor did not largely contribute. Sir, since South Carolina is assailed, I must be suffered to speak it to her praise, that, at the very moment when, in one quarter, we heard it solemnly proclaimed, "that it did not become a religious and moral people to rejoice at the victories of our army or our navy," her Legislature unanimously

[SENATE.]

"Resolved, That we will cordially support the Government in the vigorous prosecution of the war, until a peace can be obtained on honorable terms; and we will cheerfully submit to every privation that may be required of us, by our Government, for the accomplishment of this object."

South Carolina redeemed that pledge. She threw open her treasury to the Government. She put at the absolute disposal of the officers of the United States all that she possessed—her men, her money, and her arms. She appropriated half a million of dollars, on her own account, in defence of her maritime frontier; ordered a brigade of State troops to be raised; and when left to protect herself by her own means, never suffered the enemy to touch her soil, without being instantly driven off or captured. Such, sir, was the conduct of the South—such the conduct of my own State in that dark hour—"which tried men's souls."

When I look back and contemplate the spectacle exhibited, at that time, in another quarter of the Union, when I think of the conduct of certain portions of New England, and remember the part which was acted on that memorable occasion by the political associates of the gentleman from Massachusetts—nay, when I follow that gentleman into the councils of the nation, and listen to his voice during the darkest period of the war, I am indeed astonished that he should venture to touch upon the topics which he has introduced into this debate. South Carolina reproached by Massachusetts! And from whom does the accusation come? Not from the democracy of New England: for they have been, in times past, as they are now, the friends and allies of the South. No, sir, the accusation comes from that party whose acts, during the most trying and eventful period of our national history, were of such a character, that their own Legislature, but a few years ago, actually blotted them out from their records, as a stain upon the honor of the country. But how can they ever be blotted out from the recollections of any one who had a heart to feel, a mind to comprehend, and a memory to retain, the events of that day! Sir, I shall not attempt to write the history of the party in New England, to which I have alluded—the war party in peace, and the peace party in war. That task I shall leave to some future biographer of Nathan Dane, and I doubt not it will be found quite easy to prove that the peace party of Massachusetts were the only defenders of their country, during the war, and actually achieved all our victories by land and sea.

In the mean time, sir, and until that history shall be written, I propose, with the feeble and glimmering lights which I possess, to review the conduct of this party, in connexion with the war, and the events which immediately preceded it. It will be recollected, sir, that our great causes of quarrel with Great Britain were her depredations on Northern commerce, and the impressment of New England seamen. From every quarter we were called upon for protection. Importunate as the West is now represented to be, on another subject, the importunity of the East on that occasion was far greater. I hold in my hands the evidence of the fact. Here are petitions, memorials, and remonstrances, from all parts of New England, setting forth the injustice, the oppressions, the depredations, the insults, the outrages, committed by Great Britain against the unoffending commerce and seamen of New England, and calling upon Congress for redress. Sir, I cannot stop to read these memorials. In that from Boston, after stating the alarming and extensive condemnation of our vessels by Great Britain, which threatened "to sweep our commerce from the face of the ocean," and "to involve our merchants in bankruptcy," they called upon the Government "to assert our rights and to adopt such measures as will support the dignity and honor of the United States."

From Salem, we heard a language still more decisive; they call explicitly for "an appeal to arms," and pledge their lives and property in support of any measures which Congress might adopt. From Newburyport, an appeal was made "to the firmness and justice of the Government to obtain compensation and protection." It was here, I think, that, when the war was declared, it was resolved "to resist our own Government, even unto blood!"

In other quarters, the common language of that day was, that our commerce and our seamen were entitled to protection, and that it was the duty of the Government to afford it at every hazard. The conduct of Great Britain, we were then told, was "an outrage upon our national independence." These clamors, which commenced as early as January, 1806, were continued up to 1812. In a message from the Governor of one of the New England States, as late as the 10th October, 1811, this language is held: "A manly and decisive course has become indispensable—a course to satisfy foreign nations that, while we desire peace, we have the means and the spirit to repel aggression. We are false to ourselves, when our commerce or our territory is invaded with impunity."

About this time, however, a remarkable change was observable in the tone and temper of those who had been endeavoring to force the country into a war. The language of complaint was changed into that of insult, and calls for protection, converted into reproaches. "Smoke, smoke," (says one writer) "my life on it our Executive have no more idea of declaring war, than my grandmother." "The Committee of Ways and Means" (says another) "have come out with their Pandora's Box of taxes, and yet nobody dreams of war." "Congress do not mean to declare war; they dare not." But why multiply examples? An honorable member of the other House, from the city of Boston, [Mr. Quincy] in a speech delivered on the 3d April, 1812, says, "neither promises, nor threats, nor asseverations, nor oaths, will make me believe that you will go to war. The navigation States are sacrificed, and the spirit and character of the country prostrated by fear and avarice;" "you cannot," said the same gentleman on another occasion, "be kicked into a war."

Well, sir, the war at length came, and what did we behold! The very men who had been for six years clamorous for war, and for whose protection it was waged, became at once equally clamorous against it. They had received a miraculous visitation; a new light suddenly beamed upon their minds; the scales fell from their eyes, and it was discovered that the war was declared from "subserviency to France;" and that Congress and the Executive "had sold themselves to Napoleon;" that Great Britain had, in fact, done us no essential injury," that she was "the bulwark of our religion;" that where "she took one of our ships, she protected twenty;" and that, if Great Britain had impressed a few of our seamen, it was because "she could not distinguish them from her own." And so far did this spirit extend, that a committee of the Massachusetts Legislature actually fell to calculation, and discovered, to their infinite satisfaction, but to the astonishment of all the world beside, that only eleven Massachusetts sailors had ever been impressed. Never shall I forget the appeals that had been made to the sympathies of the South, in behalf of the "thousands of impressed Americans" who had been torn from their families and friends, and "immured in the floating dungeons of Britain." The most touching pictures were drawn of the hard condition of the American sailor, "treated like a slave," forced to fight the battles of his enemies, "lashed to the mast to be shot at like a dog." But, sir, the very moment we had taken up arms in their defence, it was discovered that all these were mere "fictions of the brain," and that the whole number of the State of Massachusetts was but eleven; and that even these had been "taken by mistake." Wonderful discovery! The Secretary of State had collected authentic lists of no less than six thousand impressed Americans. Lord Castlereagh himself acknowledged sixteen hundred. Calculations on the basis of the number found on board of the Guerriere, the Macedonian, the Java, and other British ships, (captured by the skill and gallantry of those heroes whose achievements are the treasured monuments of their country's glory) fixed the number at seven thousand; and yet, it seems, Massachusetts had lost but eleven! Eleven Massachusetts sailors taken by mistake! A cause of war, indeed! Their ships, too, the capture of which had threatened "universal bankruptcy," it was discovered that Great Britain was their friend and protector; "where she had taken one, she had protected twenty." Then was the discovery made, that subservience to France, hostility to commerce, "a determination on the part of the South and the West to break down the Eastern States," and especially, (as reported by a committee of the Massachusetts Legislature,) "to force the sons of commerce to populate the wilderness," were the true causes of the war.* But let us look a little further into the conduct of the peace party of New England, at that important crisis. Whatever difference of opinion might have existed as to the causes of the war, the country had a right to expect that, when once involved in the contest, all America would have cordially united in its support. Sir, the war effected, in its progress, a union of all parties at the South. But not so in New England; there, great efforts were made to stir up the minds of the people to oppose it. Nothing was left undone to embarrass the financial operations of the Government, to prevent the enlistment of troops, to keep back the men and money of New England from the service of the Union, to force the President from his seat. Yes, sir, "the Island of Elba! or a halter!" were the alternatives they presented to the excellent and venerable James Madison. Sir, the war was further opposed by openly carrying on illicit trade with the enemy, by permitting that enemy to establish herself on the very soil of Massachusetts, and by opening a free trade between Great Britain and America, with a separate custom house. Yes, sir, those who cannot endure the thought that we should insist on a free trade in time of profound peace, could without scruple claim and exercise the right of carrying on a free trade with the enemy in a time of war; and, finally, by getting up the renowned "Hartford Convention," and preparing the way for an open resistance to the Government, and a separation of the States. Sir, if I am asked for the proof of those things, I fearlessly appeal to cotemporary history, to the public documents of the country, to the recorded opinions and acts of public assemblies, to the declaration and acknowledgments, since made, of the Executive and Legislature of Massachusetts hers-^{lf}.*

Sir, the time has not been allowed me to trace this subject through, even if I had been disposed to do so. But I cannot refrain from referring to one or two documents which have fallen in my way since this debate began. I read, sir, from the Olive Branch of Mathew Carey, in which are collected "the actings and doings" of the peace party of New England, during the continuance of the embargo and the war. I know the Senator from Massachusetts will respect the high authority of his political friend and fellow laborer in the great cause of "domestic industry."

In page 301, et seq. 9 of this work, is a detailed account of the measures adopted in Massachusetts during the war, for the express purpose of embarrassing the financial operations of the Government, by preventing loans, and thereby driving our rulers from their seats, and forcing the country into a dishonorable peace. It appears that the Boston banks commenced an operation by which a run was to be made upon all the banks to the South; at the same time stopping their own discounts, the effect of which was to produce a sudden and most alarming diminution of the circulating medium, and universal distress over the whole country—a distress which they failed not to attribute to the "unholy war."

To such an extent was this system carried, that it appears from a statement of the condition of the Boston banks, made up in January, 1814, that with nearly five millions dollars of specie in their vaults, they had but two millions of dollars of bills in circulation. It is added by Carey, that at this very time an extensive trade was carried on in British Government bills, for which specie was sent to Canada, for the payment of the British troops then laying waste our Northern frontier, and this too at the very moment when New England ships, sailing under British licences, (a trade declared to be lawful by the courts both of Great Britain and Massachusetts†) were supplying with provisions those very armies destined for the invasion of our own shores. Sir, the author of the Olive Branch, with a holy indignation, denounces these acts as "treasonable!" "giving aid and comfort to the enemy." I shall not follow his example. But I will ask with what justice or propriety can the South be accused of disloyalty from that quarter. If we had any evidence that the Senator from Massachusetts had admonished his brethren then, he might with a better grace assume the office of admonishing us now.

When I look at the measures adopted in Boston at that day, to deprive the Government of the necessary means for carrying on the war, and think of the success and the consequences of these measures, I feel my pride as an

*In answer to an address of Governor Eustis, denouncing the conduct of the peace party, during the war, the House of Representatives of Massachusetts, in June, 1823, says: "The change of the political sentiment evinced in the late elections forms indeed a new era in the history of our Commonwealth. It is the triumph of reason over passion, of patriotism over party spirit. Massachusetts has returned to her first love, and is no longer a stranger in the Union. We rejoice that, though, during the last war, such measures were adopted in this State, as occasioned double sacrifice of treasure and of life; covered the friends of the nation with humiliation and mourning, and fixed a stain on the page of our history; a redeeming spirit has at length arisen to take away our reproach, and restore to us our good name, our rank among our sister States, and our just influence in the Union."

†Though we would not renew contentions, or irritate wantonly, we believe that there are cases, when it is necessary we should wound to heal. And we consider it among the first duties of the friends of our National Government, on this return of power, to disavow the unwarrantable course pursued by this State during the late war; and to hold up the measures of that period as base, and the present and succeeding generations may shun that career which must inevitably terminate in the destruction of the individual, or the party who pursues it; and may learn the important lesson that, in all cases, the path of duty is the path of safety; and that it is never dangerous to rally around the standard of our country."—Note by Mr. H.

[SENATE.]

American humbled in the dust. Hear, sir, the language of that day; I read from pages 301 and 302 of the Olive Branch: "Let no man who wishes to continue the war, by active means, by vote or lending money, dare to prostrate himself at the altar on the fast day." "Will federalists subscribe to the loan? Will they lend money to our national rulers? It is impossible. First, because of the principle, and secondly, because of principal and interest." "Do not prevent the abusers of their trust from becoming bankrupt. Do not prevent them from becoming odious to the public, and being replaced by better men." "Any federalist who lends money to Government, must go and shake hands with James Madison, and claim fellowship with Felix Grundy. [I beg pardon of my honorable friend from Tennessee; but he is in good company. I had thought it was 'James Madison, Felix Grundy, and the Devil.'] Let him no more call himself a federalist, and a friend to his country; he will be called by others, infamous," &c.

Sir, the spirit of the people sunk under these appeals. Such was the effect produced by them on the public mind, that the very agents of the Government (as appears from their public advertisements, now before me) could not obtain loans, without a pledge that "the names of the subscribers should not be known." Here are the advertisements: "The names of all subscribers (say Gilbert and Dean, the brokers employed by Government) shall be known only to the undersigned." As if those who came forward to aid their country in the hour of her utmost need, were engaged in some dark and foul conspiracy, they were assured "that their names should not be known." Can any thing show more conclusively the unhappy state of public feeling which prevailed at that day, than this single fact? Of the same character with these measures was the conduct of Massachusetts, in withholding her militia from the service of the United States, and devising measures for withdrawing her quota of the taxes, thereby attempting, not merely to cripple the resources of the country, but actually depriving the Government (as far as depended upon her) of all the means of carrying on the war: of the bone, and muscle, and sinews of war—"of man and steel—the soldier and his sword." But it seems Massachusetts was to reserve her resources for herself; she was to defend and protect her own shores. And how was that duty performed? In some places on the coast neutrality was declared, and the enemy was suffered to invade the soil of Massachusetts, and allowed to occupy her territory, until the peace, without one effort to rescue it from his grasp. Nay, more, while our own Government and our rulers were considered as enemies, the troops of the enemy were treated like friends; the most intimate commercial relations were established with them, and maintained up to the peace. At this dark period of our national affairs, where was the Senator from Massachusetts? How were his political associates employed? "Calculating the value of the Union?" Yes, sir, that was the propitious moment, when our country stood alone, the last hope of the world, struggling for her existence against the colossal power of Great Britain, "concentrated in one mighty effort to crush us at a blow"—that was the chosen hour to revive the grand scheme of building up "a great Northern Confederacy"—a scheme, which, it is stated in the work before me, had its origin as far back as the year 1796, and which appears never to have been entirely abandoned. In the language of the writers of that day, (1796) "rather than have a constitution such as the anti-Federalists were contending for, [such as we now are contending for] the Union ought to be dissolved;" and to prepare the way for that measure, the same methods were resorted to then, that have always been relied on for that purpose—exciting prejudice against the South. Yes, sir, our Northern brethren were then told "that, if the negroes were good for food, their Southern masters would claim the right to destroy them at pleasure."* Sir, in 1814, all these topics were revived. Again we heard of "a Northern Confederacy." "The slave States by themselves;" "the mountains are the natural boundary;" we want neither "the counsels nor the power of the West," &c. &c. The papers teemed with accusations against the South and the West, and the calls for a dissolution of all connexion with them were loud and strong. I cannot consent to go through the disgusting details. But to show the height to which the spirit of disaffection was carried, I will take you to the temple of the living God, and show you that sacred place (which should be devoted to the extension of "peace on earth and good will towards men," where "one day's truce ought surely to be allowed to the dissensions and animosities of mankind") converted into a fierce arena of political strife, where, from the lips of the priest standing between the horns of the altar, there went forth the most terrible denunciations against all who should be true to their country, in the hour of her utmost need.

"If you do not wish," said a reverend clergyman, in a sermon preached in Boston, on the 23d July, 1812, "to become the slaves of those who own slaves, and who are themselves the slaves of French slaves, you must either, in the language of the day, cut the connexion, or so far alter the national compact as to ensure to yourselves a due share in the Government." (Olive Branch, page 319.) "The Union," says the same writer, (page 320) "has been long since virtually dissolved, and it is full time that this part of the disunited States should take care of itself."

Another reverend gentleman, pastor of a church at Medford, (page 321) issues his anathema—"let him stand accursed"—against all, all, who by their "personal services," or "loans of money," "conversation," or "writing," or "influence," give countenance or support to the unrighteous war, in the following terms: "that man is an accomplice in the wickedness; he loads his conscience with the blackest crimes; he brings the guilt of blood upon his soul, and in the sight of God and his law he is a murderer!"

One or two more quotations, sir, and I shall have done. A reverend doctor of divinity, the pastor of a church at Byfield, Massachusetts, on the 7th of April, 1814, thus addresses his flock [321.] "The Israelites became weary of yielding the fruit of their labor to pamper their splendid tyrants. They left their political woes. They separated; where is our Moses? Where the rod of his miracles? Where is our Aaron? Alas! no voice from the burning bush has directed them here."

"We must trample on the mandates of despotism, or remain slaves forever." [P. 322.] "You must drag the chains of Virginian despotism, unless you discover some other mode of escape." "Those Western States, which have been violent for this abominable war, those States which have thirsted for blood—God has given them blood to drink." [323.]—Sir, I can go no further. The records of the day are full of such sentiments, issued from the press, spoken in public assemblies, poured out from the sacred desk! God forbid, sir, that I should charge the people of Massachusetts with participating in these sentiments. The South and the West had there, their friends—men who stood by their country, though encompassed all around by their enemies. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SIMMONS] was one of them, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. FOSTER] was another; and there are others now on this floor. The sentiments I have read were the sentiments of a party embracing the political associates of the gentleman from Massachusetts. If they could only be found in the columns of a newspaper, in a few occasional pamphlets, issued by men of intemperate feeling, I should not consider them as affording any evidence of the opinions even of the peace party of New England. But, sir, they were the common language of that day; they pervaded the whole land; they were issued from the legislative hall, from the pulpit, and the press. Our books are full of them; and there is no man who now hears me, but knows, that they were the sentiments of a party, by whose members they were promulgated. Indeed, no evidence of this would seem to be required, beyond the fact that such sentiments found their way even into the pulpits of New England. What must be the state of public opinion, where any respectable clergyman would venture to preach and to print sermons containing the sentiments I have quoted? I doubt not the piety or moral worth of these gentlemen. I am told they were respectable and pious men. But they were men, and they "kindled in a common blaze." And now, sir, I must be suffered to remark, that, at this awful and melancholy period of our national history, the gentleman from Massachusetts, who now manifests so great a devotion to the Union, and so much anxiety lest it should be endangered from the South, was "with his brethren in Israel." He saw all these things passing before his eyes—he heard these sentiments uttered all around him. I do not charge that gentleman with any participation in these acts, or with approving of these sentiments; but I will ask why, if he was animated by the same sentiments then, which he now professes, if he can "augur disunion at a distance, and snuff up rebellion in every tainted breeze," why he did not, at that day, exert his great talents and acknowledged influence with the political associates by whom he was surrounded, (and who then, as now, looked up to him for guidance and direction) in allaying this general excitement, in pointing out to his deluded friends the value of the Union, in instructing them, that, instead of looking "to some prophet to lead them out from the land of Egypt," they should become reconciled to their brethren, and unite with them in the support of a just and necessary war? Sir, the gentleman must excuse me for saying, that, if the records of our country afforded any evidence that he had pursued such a course, then, if we could find it recorded in the history of those times, that, like the immortal Dexter, he had breast-ed that mighty torrent which was sweeping before it all that was great and valuable in our political institutions; if like him he had stood by his country in opposition to his party; sir, we would, like little children, listen to his precepts and abide by his counsels.

As soon as the public mind was sufficiently prepared for the measure, the celebrated Hartford Convention was got up; not as the act of a few unauthorized individuals, but by authority of the Legislature of Massachusetts; and, as has been shown by the able historian of that convention, in accordance with the views and wishes of the party, of which it was the organ. Now, sir, I do not desire to call in question the motives of the gentlemen who composed that assembly: I know many of them to be in private life accomplished and honorable men, and I doubt not there were some among them who did not perceive the dangerous tendency of their proceedings. I will even go further, and say, that, if the authors of the Hartford Convention believed that "gross, deliberate, and palpable violations of the constitution" had taken place, utterly destructive of their rights and interests, I should be the last man to deny their right to resort to any constitutional measures for redress. But, sir, in any view of the case, the time when, and the circumstances under which, that convention assembled, as well as the measures recommended, render their conduct, in my opinion, wholly indefensible. Let us contemplate, for a moment, the spectacle then exhibited to the view of the world. I will not go over the disasters of the war, nor describe the difficulties in which the Government was involved. It will be recollected that its credit was nearly gone; Washington had fallen; the whole coast was blockaded; and an immense force, collected in the West Indies, was about to make a descent, which it was supposed we had no means of resisting. In this awful state of our public affairs, when the Government seemed almost to be tottering on its base, when Great Britain, relieved from all her other enemies, had proclaimed her purpose of "reducing us to unconditional submission," we beheld the peace party of New England (in the language of the work before us) "pursuing a course calculated to do more injury to their country, and to render England more effective service, than all her armies." Those who could not find it in their hearts to rejoice at our victories, sang to deum at the King's Chapel in Boston, for the restoration of the Bourbons. Those who could not consent to illuminate their dwellings for the capture of the Guerriere, could give visible tokens of their joy at the fall of Detroit. The "beacon fires" of their hills were lighted up, not for the encouragement of their friends, but as signals to the enemy; and in the gloomy hours of midnight, the very lights burned blue. Such were the dark and portentous signs of the times, which ushered into being the renowned Hartford Convention. That convention met, and from their proceedings it appears that their chief object was to keep back the men and money of New England from the service of the Union, and to effect radical changes in the Government; changes that can never be effected without a dissolution of the Union.

Let us now, sir, look at their proceedings. I read from "A short account of the Hartford Convention," (written by one of its members) a very rare book, of which I was fortunate enough a few years ago to obtain a copy. [Here Mr. H. read from the proceedings.*]

It is unnecessary to trace the matter farther, or to ask

* It appears at p. 6, of "The Account," that by a vote of the House of Representatives of Massachusetts [260 to 90] delegates to this convention were ordered to be appointed to consult upon the subject "of their public grievances and concerns," and upon "the best means of preserving their resources," and for procuring a revision of the constitution of the United States, "more effectually to secure the support and attachment of all the people, by placing all upon the basis of fair representation."

The convention assembled at Hartford, on the 15th December, 1814. On the next day it was Resolved, That the most inviolable secrecy shall be observed by each member of this convention, including the Secretary, as to all propositions, debates, and proceedings thereof, until this injunction shall be suspended or altered.

On the 24th December, the committee appointed to prepare and report a general project of such measures as may be proper for the convention to adopt, reported, among other things:

"1. That it was expedient to recommend to the Legislatures of the States, the adoption of the most effectual and decisive measures to protect the militia and the States from the usurpations contained in these proceedings." [The proceedings of Congress and the Executive in relation to the Militia and the War.]

"2. That it was expedient also to prepare a statement exhibiting the necessity which the impotence and inability of the General Government have imposed upon the States of providing for their own defence, and the impossibility of their discharging this duty, and at the same time fulfilling the requisitions of the General Government, and also to recommend to the Legislatures of the several States to make provision for mutual defence, and to make an earnest application to the Government of the United States, with a view to some arrangement whereby the States may be enabled to retain a portion of the taxes levied by Congress, for the purposes of self-defence, and for the reimbursement of expenses already incurred on account of the United States."

"3. That it is expedient to recommend to the several State Legislatures certain amendments to the constitution, viz:

That the power to declare or make war by the Congress of the United States be restricted.

That it is expedient to attempt to make provision for restraining Congress in the exercise of an unlimited power to make new States and admit them into the Union.

That an amendment be proposed respecting slave representation and slave taxation."

On the 19th December, 1814, it was proposed "that the capacity of naturalized citizens to hold offices of trust, honor, or profit, ought to be restrained," &c.

The subsequent proceedings are not given at large. But it seems that the report of the committee was adopted, and also a recommendation of certain measures (of the character of which we are not informed) to the States for their mutual defence, and having voted that the injunction of secrecy, in regard to all the debates and proceedings of the convention (except so far as relates to the report finally adopted) be continued, the convention adjourned sine die, but (as it was supposed) to meet again when circumstances should require it.—Noted by Mr. H.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

what would have been the next chapter in this history, if the measures recommended had been carried into effect; and if, with the men and money of New England withheld from the Government of the United States, she had been withdrawn from the war; if New Orleans had fallen into the hands of the enemy; and if, without troops, and almost destitute of money, the Southern and the Western States had been thrown upon their own resources for the prosecution of the war, and the recovery of New Orleans? Sir, whatever may have been the issue of the contest, the Union must have been dissolved. But a wise and just Providence, which "shapes our ends, rough-hew them as we will," gave us the victory, and crowned our efforts with a glorious peace. The ambassadors of Hartford were seen retracing their steps from Washington, "the bearers of the glad tidings of great joy." Courage and patriotism triumphed; the country was saved; the Union was preserved. And are we, who stood by our country then; who threw open our coffers; who bared our bosoms; who freely periled all in that conflict, to be reproached with want of attachment to the Union? If, sir, we are to have lessons of patriotism read to us, they must come from a different quarter. The Senator from Massachusetts, who is now so sensitive on all subjects connected with the Union, seems to have a memory forgetful of the political events that have passed away. I must, therefore, refresh his recollection a little farther on these subjects. The history of disunion has been written by one, whose authority stands too high with the American people to be questioned—I mean Thomas Jefferson. I know not how the gentleman may receive this authority. When that great and good man occupied the presidential chair, I believe he commanded no portion of that gentleman's respect.

I hold in my hand a celebrated pamphlet on the embargo, in which language is held in relation to Mr. Jefferson, which my respect for his memory will prevent me from reading, unless any gentleman should call for it. But the Senator from Massachusetts has since joined in singing hosannas to his name; he has assisted at his apotheosis, and has fixed him as "a brilliant star in the clear upper sky;" I hope, therefore, he is now prepared to receive with deference and respect the high authority of Mr. Jefferson. In the fourth volume of his memoirs, which has just issued from the press, we have the following history of disunion, from the pen of that illustrious statesman: "Mr. Adams called on me pending the embargo, and while endeavors were making to obtain its repeal; he spoke of the dissatisfaction of the Eastern portion of our confederacy with the restraints of the embargo then existing, and their restlessness under it. That there was nothing which might not be attempted to rid themselves of it. That he had information of the most unquestionable certainty, that certain citizens of the Eastern States, (I think he named Massachusetts particularly) were in negotiation with agents of the British Government, the object of which was an agreement that the New England States should take no further part in the war, [the commercial war, the "war of restrictions," as it was called] then going on, and that, without formally declaring their separation from the Union, they should withdraw from all aid and obedience to them, &c. From that moment [says Mr. J.] I saw the necessity of abandoning it, [the embargo] and, instead of effecting our purpose by this peaceful weapon, we must fight it out, or break the Union." In another letter Mr. Jefferson adds: "I doubt whether a single fact known to the world will carry as clear conviction to it of the correctness of our knowledge of the treasonable views of the federal party of that day, as that disclosed by this the most nefarious and daring attempt to dissolve the Union, of which the Hartford Convention was a subsequent chapter; and both of these having failed, consolidation becomes the fourth chapter of the next book of their history. But this opens with a vast accession of strength from their younger recruits, who having nothing in them of the feelings and principles of '76, now look to a single and splendid Government, &c., riding and ruling over the plundered ploughman and beggared yeomanry."—(4 vol. 419, 422.)

The last chapter, says Mr. Jefferson, of that history, is to be found in the conduct of those who are endeavoring to bring about consolidation: ay, sir, that very consolidation for which the gentleman from Massachusetts is contending—the exercise, by the Federal Government, of powers not delegated in relation to "internal improvements," and "the protection of manufactures." And why, sir, does Mr. Jefferson consider consolidation as leading directly to disunion? Because he knew that the exercise by the Federal Government, of the powers contended for, would make this "a Government without limitation of powers," the submission to which he considered as a greater evil than disunion itself. There is one chapter in this history, however, which Mr. Jefferson has not filled up, and I must therefore supply the deficiency. It is to be found in the protest made by New England against the acquisition of Louisiana. In relation to that subject the New England doctrine is thus laid down by one of her learned political doctors of that day, now a doctor of laws, at the head of the great literary institution of the East—I mean Josiah Quincy, President of Harvard College. I quote from the speech delivered by that gentleman on the floor of Congress, on the occasion of the admission of Louisiana into the Union.

"Mr. Quincy repeated and justified a remark he had made, which, to save all misapprehension, he had committed to writing, in the following words: If this bill passes, it is my deliberate opinion that it is virtually a dissolution of the Union; that it will free the States from their moral obligation; and as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, to prepare for a separation, amicably if they can, violently if they must."

I wish it to be distinctly understood [said Mr. H.] that all the remarks I have made on this subject, are intended to be exclusively applied to a party, which I have described as "the peace party of New England"—embracing the political associates of the Senator from Massachusetts—a party which controlled the operations of that State during the embargo and the war, and who are justly chargeable with all the measures I have reprobated. Sir, nothing has been further from my thoughts than to impeach the character or conduct of the people of New England. For their steady habits and hardy virtues, I trust I entertain a becoming respect. I fully subscribe to the truth of the description given before the Revolution, by one whose praise is the highest eulogy, "that the perseverance of Holland, the activity of France, and the dexterity and firm sagacity of English enterprise, have been more than equalled by this 'recent people.'" Hardy, enterprising, sagacious, industrious, and moral, the people of New England of the present day, are worthy of their ancestors. Still less has it been my intention to say any thing that could be construed into a want of respect for that party, who, trampling on all narrow, sectional feelings, have been true to their principles in the worst of times—I mean the democracy of New England.

Sir, I will declare that, highly as I appreciate the democracy of the South, I consider even higher praise to be due to the democracy of New England—who have maintained their principles "through good and through evil report," who at every period of our national history have stood up manfully for "their country, their whole country, and nothing but their country." In the great political revolution of '98, they were found united with the democracy of the South, marching under the banner of the constitution, led on by the patriarch of liberty, in search of the land of political promise, which they lived not only to behold, but to possess and to enjoy. Again, sir, in the darkest and most gloomy period of the war, when our country stood single handed, against "the conqueror of the conquerors of the world," when all about and around them was dark, and dreary, disastrous and discouraging, they stood a Spartan band in that narrow pass, where the honor of their country was to be defended, or to find its grave. And in the last great struggle, involving, as we believe, the very existence of the principle of popular sovereignty, where were the democracy of New England? Where they always have been found, sir, struggling side by side with their brethren of the South and the West for popular rights, and assisting in that glorious triumph by which the man of the people was elevated to the highest office in their gift.

Mr. Foote's Resolution.

Who, then, are the friends of the Union? [asked Mr. H.] Those who would confine the Federal Government strictly within the limits prescribed by the constitution; who would preserve to the States and the People all powers not expressly delegated; who would make this a Federal and not a National Union, and who, administering the Government in a spirit of equal justice, would make it a blessing, and not a curse. And who are its enemies? Those who are in favor of consolidation; who are constantly stealing power from the States, and adding strength to the Federal Government. Who, assuming an unwarrantable jurisdiction over the States and the People, undertake to regulate the whole industry and capital of the country. But, sir, of all description of men I consider those as the worst enemies of the Union, who sacrifice the equal rights which belong to every member of the Confederacy to combinations of interested majorities, for personal or political objects. But the gentleman apprehends no evil from the dependence of the States on the Federal Government; he can see no danger of corruption from the influence of money or of patronage. Sir, I know that it is supposed to be a wise saying "that patronage is a source of weakness," and in support of that maxim, it has been said, that "every ten appointments make a hundred enemies." But I am rather inclined to think, with the eloquent and sagacious orator now reposing on his laurels on the banks of the Roanoke, that "the power of conferring favors creates a crowd of dependents;" he gave a forcible illustration of the truth of the remark, when he told us of the effect of holding up the savory morsel to the eager eyes of the hungry hounds gathered around his door. It mattered not whether the gift was bestowed on Towzer or Sweetlips, "Tray, Blanche, or Sweetheart;" while held in suspense, they were all governed by a nod, and when the morsel was bestowed, the expectation of the favors of to-morrow kept up the subjection of to-day.

The Senator from Massachusetts, in denouncing what he is pleased to call the Carolina doctrine, has attempted to throw ridicule upon the idea that a State has any constitutional remedy, by the exercise of its sovereign authority, against "a gross, palpable, and deliberate violation of the constitution." He calls it "an idle" or "a ridiculous notion," or something to that effect, and added, it would make the Union "a mere rope of sand." Now, sir, as the gentleman has not condescended to enter into any examination of the question, and has been satisfied with throwing the weight of his authority into the scale, I do not deem it necessary to do more than to throw into the opposite scale the authority on which South Carolina relies, and there, for the present, I am perfectly willing to leave the controversy. The South Carolina doctrine, that is to say, the doctrine contained in an exposition reported by a Committee of the Legislature in December, 1828, and published by their authority, is the good old Republican doctrine of '98; the doctrine of the celebrated "Virginia Resolutions" of that year, and of "Madison's

Report of '99. It will be recollected that the Legislature of Virginia, in December, '98, took into consideration the alien and sedition laws, then considered by all Republicans as a gross violation of the constitution of the United States, and on that day passed, among others, the following resolution:

"The General Assembly doth explicitly and peremptorily declare, that it views the powers of the Federal Government, as resulting from the compact to which the States are parties, as limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, as no further valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that compact; and that, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the States who are parties thereto have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them."

In addition to these resolutions, the General Assembly of Virginia "appealed to the other States, in the confidence that they would concur with that Commonwealth that the acts aforesaid [the alien and sedition laws] are unconstitutional, and that the necessary and proper measures would be taken by each for co-operating with Virginia in maintaining unimpaired the authorities, rights, and liberties, reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people."

The Legislatures of several of the New England States having, contrary to the expectation of the Legislature of Virginia, expressed their dissent from these doctrines, the subject came up again for consideration, during the session of 1799, 1800, when it was referred to a Select Committee, by whom was made that celebrated report which is familiarly known as "Madison's Report," and which deserves to last as long as the constitution itself. In that report, which was subsequently adopted by the Legislature, the whole subject was deliberately re-examined, and the objections urged against the Virginia doctrines carefully considered. The result was, that the Legislature of Virginia re-affirmed all the principles laid down in the resolutions of 1798, and issued to the world that admirable report which has stamped the character of Mr. Madison as the preserver of that constitution which he had contributed so largely to create and establish. I will here quote, from Mr. Madison's report, one or two passages which bear more immediately on the point in controversy. "The resolution, having taken this view of the federal compact, proceeds to infer 'that, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the States, who are parties thereto, have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them.'

"It appears to your Committee to be a plain principle, founded on common sense, illustrated by common practice, and essential to the nature of compacts, that, where resort can be had to no tribunal superior to the authority of the parties, the parties themselves must be the rightful judges, in the last resort, whether the bargain made has been pursued or violated. The constitution of the United States was formed by the sanction of the States, given by each, in its sovereign capacity. It adds to the stability and dignity, as well as to the authority of the constitution, that it rests on this legitimate and solid foundation. The States, then, being the parties to the constitutional compact, and in their sovereign capacity, it follows, of necessity, that there can be no tribunal, above their authority, to decide, in the last resort, whether the compact made by them be violated; and, consequently, that, as the parties to it, they must, themselves, decide, in the last resort, such questions as may be of sufficient magnitude to require their interposition."

JAN. 25, 1830.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

"The resolution has guarded against any misapprehension of its object, by expressly requiring, for such an interposition, 'the case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous breach of the constitution, by the exercise of powers not granted by it.' It must be a case, not of a light and transient nature, but of a nature dangerous to the great purposes for which the constitution was established."

"But the resolution has done more than guard against misconstruction, by expressly referring to cases of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous nature. It specifies the object of the interposition, which it contemplates to be, solely, that of arresting the progress of the evil of usurpation, and of maintaining the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to the States, as parties to the constitution."

"From this view of the resolution, it would seem inconceivable that it can incur any just disapprobation from those who, laying aside all momentary impressions, and recollecting the genuine source and object of the federal constitution, shall candidly and accurately interpret the meaning of the General Assembly. If the deliberate exercise of dangerous powers, palpably withheld by the constitution, could not justify the parties to it in interposing, even so far as to arrest the progress of the evil, and thereby to preserve the constitution itself, as well as to provide for the safety of the parties to it, there would be an end to all relief from usurped power, and a direct subversion of the rights specified or recognized under all the State constitutions, as well as a plain denial of the fundamental principles on which our independence itself was declared."

But, sir, our authorities do not stop here. The State of Kentucky responded to Virginia, and, on the 10th of November, 1798, adopted those celebrated resolutions, well known to have been penned by the author of the Declaration of American Independence. In those resolutions, the Legislature of Kentucky declare "that the Government created by this compact was not made the exclusive or final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself, since that would have made its discretion, and not the constitution, the measure of its powers; but that, as in all other cases of compact among parties having no common judge, each party has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of infractions, as of the mode and measure of redress."

At the ensuing session of the Legislature, the subject was re-examined, and, on the 14th of November, 1799, the resolutions of the preceding year were deliberately re-affirmed, and it was, among other things, solemnly declared, "that, if those who administer the General Government be permitted to transgress the limits fixed by that compact, by a total disregard to the special delegations of power therein contained, an annihilation of the State Governments, and the erection, upon their ruins, of a General consolidated Government, will be the inevitable consequence. That the principle and construction contended for, by several of the State Legislatures, that the General Government is the exclusive judge of the extent of the powers delegated to it, stop nothing short of despotism; since the discretion of those who administer the Government, and not the constitution, would be the measure of their powers. That the several States who formed that instrument, being sovereign and independent, have the unquestionable right to judge of its infraction; and, that a nullification, by those sovereignties, of all unauthorized acts, done under color of that instrument, is the rightful remedy."

Time and experience confirmed Mr. Jefferson's opinion on this all-important point. In the year 1821, he expressed himself in this emphatic manner: "It is a fatal heresy to suppose that either our State Governments are superior to the Federal, or the Federal to the State; neither is authorized literally to decide which belongs to itself or its co-partner in Government; in differences of opinion, between their different sets of public servants, the appeal is to neither, but to their employers, peaceably assembled by their representatives in convention." The opinions of Mr. Jefferson, on this subject, have been so repeatedly and so solemnly expressed, that they may be said to have been the most fixed and settled convictions of his mind.

In the protest prepared by him for the Legislature of Virginia, in December, 1825, in respect to the powers exercised by the Federal Government in relation to the Tariff and Internal Improvements, which he declares to be "usurpations of the powers retained by the States, mere interpolations into the compact, and direct infractions of it," he solemnly re-asserts all the principles of the Virginia resolutions of '98, protests against "these acts of the Federal branch of the Government as null and void, and declares that, although Virginia would consider a dissolution of the Union as among the greatest calamities that could befall them, yet it is not the greatest. There is one yet greater: submission to a Government of unlimited powers. It is only when the hope of this shall become absolutely desperate, that further forbearance could not be indulged."

In his letter to Mr. Giles, written about the same time, he says:

"I see as you do, and with the deepest affliction, the rapid strides with which the Federal branch [of our Government] is advancing towards the usurpation of all the rights reserved to the States, and the consolidation in itself of all powers, foreign and domestic, and that, too, by constructions which leave no limits to their powers, &c. Under the power to regulate commerce, they assume indefinitely that also over agriculture and manufactures, &c. Under the authority to establish post roads, they claim that of cutting down mountains for the construction of roads and digging canals, &c. And what is our resource for the preservation of the constitution? Reason and argument? You might as well reason and argue with the marble columns encircling them, &c. Are we then to stand to our arms, with the hot-headed Georgian? No—[and I say no, and South Carolina has said no]—that must be the last resource. We must have patience and long endurance with our brethren, &c. and separate from our companions only when the sole alternatives left are a dissolution of our Union with them, or submission to a Government without limitation of powers. Between these two evils, when we must make a choice, there can be no hesitation."

Such, sir, are the high and imposing authorities in support of the "Carolina doctrine," which is, in fact, the doctrine of the Virginia resolutions of 1798.

Sir, at that day the whole country was divided on this very question. It formed the line of demarcation between the federal and republican parties, and the great political revolution which then took place turned upon the very question involved in these resolutions. That question was decided by the people, and by that decision the constitution was, in the emphatic language of Mr. Jefferson, "saved at its last gasp." I should suppose, sir, it would require more self-respect than any gentleman here would be willing to assume, to treat lightly doctrines derived from such high sources. Resting on authority like this, I will ask gentlemen whether South Carolina has not manifested a high regard for the Union, when, under a tyranny ten times more grievous than the alien and sedition laws, she has, hitherto, gone no further than to petition, remonstrate, and solemnly to protest against a series of measures which she believes to be wholly unconstitutional, and utterly destructive of her interests? Sir, South Carolina has not gone one step further than Mr. Jefferson himself was disposed to go, in relation to the very subject of our present complaints; not a step further than

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[JAN. 26, 27, 1830.]

the statesmen from New England were disposed to go under similar circumstances; no further than the Senator from Massachusetts himself once considered as within "the limits of a constitutional opposition." The doctrine that it is the right of a State to judge of the violations of the constitution on the part of the Federal Government, and to protect her citizens from the operation of unconstitutional laws, was held by the enlightened citizens of Boston, who assembled in Faneuil Hall, on the 25th January, 1809. They state, in that celebrated memorial, that "they looked only to the State Legislature, who were competent to devise relief against the unconstitutional acts of the General Government. That your power [say they] is adequate to that object is evident from the organization of the confederacy."

A distinguished Senator from one of the New England States, [Mr. Hillhouse] in a speech delivered here, on a bill for enforcing the embargo, declared: "I feel myself bound in conscience to declare, lest the blood of those who shall fall in the execution of this measure shall be on my head, that I consider this to be an act which directs a mortal blow at the liberties of my country; an act containing unconstitutional provisions, to which the people are not bound to submit, and to which, in my opinion, they will not submit."

And the Senator from Massachusetts, himself, in a speech delivered on the same subject, in the other House, said, "This opposition is constitutional and legal; it is, also, conscientious. It rests on settled and sober conviction, that such policy is destructive to the interests of the people, and dangerous to the being of the Government. The experience of every day confirms these sentiments. Men who act from such motives are not to be discouraged by trifling obstacles nor awed by any dangers. They know the limit of constitutional opposition; up to that limit, at their own discretion, they will walk, and walk fearlessly." How "the being of the Government" was to be endangered by "constitutional opposition to the embargo," I leave to the gentleman to explain.

Thus, it will be seen, [said Mr. H.] that the South Carolina doctrine is the republican doctrine of '98; that it was first promulgated by the fathers of the faith; that it was maintained by Virginia and Kentucky in the worst of times; that it constituted the very pivot on which the political revolution of that day turned; that it embraces the very principles the triumph of which, at that time, saved the constitution at its last gasp, and which New England statesmen were not unwilling to adopt, when they believed themselves to be the victims of unconstitutional legislation. Sir, as to the doctrine that the Federal Government is the exclusive judge of the extent, as well as the limitations of its powers, it seems to me to be utterly subversive of the sovereignty and independence of the States. It makes but little difference, in my estimation, whether Congress or the Supreme Court are invested with this power. If the Federal Government, in all or any of its departments, are to prescribe the limits of its own authority, and the States are bound to submit to the decision, and are not to be allowed to examine and decide for themselves, when the barriers of the constitution shall be overleaped, this is practically "a government without limitation of powers." The States are at once reduced to mere petty corporations, and the people are entirely at your mercy. I have but one word more to add. In all the efforts that have been made by South Carolina to resist the unconstitutional laws which Congress has extended over them, she has kept steadily in view the preservation of the Union, by the only means by which she believes it can be long preserved—a firm, manly, and steady resistance against usurpation. The measures of the Federal Government have, it is true, prostrated her interests, and will soon involve the whole South in irretrievable ruin. But even this evil, great as it is, is not the chief ground of our complaints. It is the principle involved in the contest—a principle which, substituting the discretion of Congress for the limitations of the constitution, brings the States and the people to the feet of the Federal Government, and leaves them nothing they can call their own. Sir, if, the measures of the Federal Government were less oppressive, we should still strive against this usurpation. The South is acting on a principle she has always held sacred—resistance to unauthorized taxation. These, sir, are the principles which induced the immortal Hampden to resist the payment of a tax of twenty shillings. Would twenty shillings have ruined his fortune? No; but the payment of half twenty shillings, on the principle on which it was demanded, would have made him a slave. Sir, if, in acting on these high motives, if, animated by that ardent love of liberty which has always been the most prominent trait in the Southern character, we should be hurried beyond the bounds of a cold and calculating prudence, who is there, with one noble and generous sentiment in his bosom, that would not be disposed, in the language of Burke, to exclaim, "You must pardon something to the spirit of liberty!"

Mr. WEBSTER here rose to reply; but as the hour was advanced, (it being then near four o'clock) he yielded the floor to

Mr. BELL, who moved an adjournment, which motion was agreed to.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 26, 1830.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. FOOT'S resolution, when Mr. WEBSTER addressed the Senate in reply to the last speech of Mr. HAYNE. About half past three o'clock he gave way to a request of one of the members for an adjournment.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 27, 1830.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. FOOT'S resolution; when

Mr. WEBSTER, in a speech of three hours' length, concluded his argument.

[The speech, as delivered yesterday and to-day, was as follows:]

Mr. PRESIDENT: When the mariner has been tossed, for many days, in thick weather, and on an unknown sea, he naturally avails himself of the first pause in the storm, the earliest glance of the sun, to take his latitude; and ascertain how far the elements have driven him from his true course. Let us imitate this prudence, and, before we float farther, on the waves of this debate, refer to the point from which we departed, that we may, at least, be able to form some conjecture where we now are. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

[The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:]

"Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire and report the quantity of the public lands remaining unsold within each State and Territory, and whether it be expedient to limit, for a certain period, the sales of the public lands to such lands only as have heretofore been offered for sale, and are now subject to entry at the minimum price. And, also, whether the office of Surveyor General, and some of the land offices, may not be abolished, without detriment to the public interest; or whether it be expedient to adopt measures to hasten the sales, and extend more rapidly the surveys of the public lands."

We have thus heard, sir, what that resolution is, which is actually submitted for our consideration; and it will readily occur to every one, that it is almost the only subject about which something has not been said in the speech, running through two days, by which the Senate has been now entertained by the gentleman from South Carolina. Every topic in the wide range of our public affairs, whether past or present; every thing, general or local, whether belonging to national politics, or party politics, seems to have attracted more or less of the honorable member's attention, save only the resolution before us. He has spoken of every thing but the public lands. They have escaped his notice. To that subject, in all his excursions, he has not paid even the cold respect of a passing glance.

When this debate, sir, was to be resumed on Thursday morning, it so happened that it would have been convenient for me to be elsewhere. The honorable member, however, did not incline to put off the discussion to another day. He had a shot, he said, to return, and he wished to discharge it. That shot, sir, which it was kind thus to inform us was coming, that we might stand out of the way, or prepare ourselves to fall before it, and die with decency, has now been received. Under all advantages, and with expectation awakened by the tone which preceded it, it has been discharged, and has spent its force. It may become me to say no more of its effect, than that, if nobody is found, after all, either killed or wounded by it, it is not the first time, in the history of human affairs, that the vigor and success of the war have not quite come up to the lofty and sounding phrase of the manifesto.

The gentleman, sir, in declining to postpone the debate, told the Senate, with the emphasis of his hand upon his heart, that there was something rankling here, which he wished to relieve. [Mr. HAYNE rose, and disclaimed having used the word rankling.] It would not [said Mr. W.] be safe for the honorable member to appeal to those around him, upon the question, whether he did, in fact, make use of that word. But he may have been unconscious of it. At any rate, it is enough that he disclaims it. But still, with or without the use of that particular word, he had yet something here, of which he wished to rid himself by an immediate reply. In this respect, sir, I have a great advantage over the honorable gentleman. There is nothing here, sir, which gives me the slightest uneasiness; neither fear, nor anger, nor that which is sometimes more troublesome than either—the consciousness of having been in the wrong. There is nothing, either originating here, or now received here, by the gentleman's shot. Nothing original: for I had not the slightest feeling of disrespect or unkindness towards the honorable member. Some passages, it is true, had occurred since our acquaintance in this body, which I could have wished might have been otherwise; but I had used philosophy and forgotten them. When the honorable member rose, in his first speech, I paid him the respect of attentive listening; and when he sat down, though surprised, and, I must say, even astonished, at some of his opinions, nothing was farther from my intention than to commence any personal warfare: and through the whole of the few remarks I made in answer, I avoided, studiously and carefully, every thing which I thought possible to be construed into disrespect. And, sir, while there is thus nothing originating here, which I wished, at any time, or now wish to discharge, I must repeat, also, that nothing has been received here, which rankles, or, in any way, gives me annoyance. I will not accuse the honorable member of violating the rules of civilized war. I will not say that he poisoned his arrows. But whether his shafts were, or were not, dipped in that which would have caused rankling, if they had reached, there was not, as it happened, quite strength enough in the bow to bring them to their mark. If he wishes now to gather up those shafts, he must look for them elsewhere: they will not be found fixed and quivering in the object at which they were aimed.

The honorable member complained that I had slept on his speech. Sir, I must have slept on it, or not slept at all. The moment the honorable member sat down, his friend from Missouri rose, and, with much honeyed commendation of the speech, suggested that the impressions which it had produced were too charming and delightful to be disturbed by other sentiments, or other sounds, and proposed that the Senate should adjourn. Would it have been quite amiable in me, sir, to interrupt this excellent good feeling? Must I not have been absolutely malicious, if I could have thrust myself forward, to destroy sensations thus pleasing? Was it not much better and kinder, both to sleep upon them myself, and to allow others, also, the pleasure of sleeping upon them? But if it be meant, by sleeping upon his speech, that I took time to prepare a reply to it, it is quite a mistake: owing to other engagements, I could not employ even the interval, between the adjournment of the Senate and its meeting the next morning, in attention to the subject of this debate. Nevertheless, sir, the mere matter of fact is undoubtedly true—I did sleep on the gentleman's speech, and slept soundly; and I slept equally well on his speech of yesterday, to which I am now replying. It is quite possible that, in this respect, also, I possess some advantage over the honorable member, attributable, doubtless, to a cooler temperament on my part: for, in truth, I slept upon his speeches remarkably well. But the gentleman inquires why he was made the object of such a reply? Why was he singled out? If an attack had been made on the East, he, he assures us, did not begin it; it was the gentleman from Missouri. Sir, I answered the gentleman's speech, because I happened to hear it; and because, also, I chose to give an answer to that speech, which, if unanswered, I thought most likely to produce injurious impressions. I did not stop to inquire who was the original drawer of the bill. I found a responsible endorser before me, and it was my purpose to hold him liable, and to bring him to his just responsibility, without delay. But, sir, this interrogatory of the honorable member was only introductory to another. He proceeded to ask me, whether I had turned upon him, in this debate, from the consciousness that I should find an overmatch, if I ventured on a contest with his friend from Missouri. If, sir, the honorable member, ex gratia modestie, had chosen thus to defer to his friend, and to pay him a compliment, without intentional disparagement to others, it would have been quite according to the friendly courtesies of debate, and not at all ungrateful to my own feelings. I am not one of those, sir, who esteem any tribute of regard, whether light and occasional, or more serious and deliberate, which may be bestowed on others, as so much unjustly withheld from themselves. But the tone and manner of the gentleman's question forbid me that I thus interpret it. I am not at liberty to consider it as nothing more than a civility to his friend. It had an air of taunt and disparagement, a little of the loftiness of asserted superiority, which does not allow me to pass it over without notice. It was put as a question for me to answer—and so put as if it were difficult for me to answer—whether I deemed the member from Missouri an overmatch for myself, in debate here? It seems to me, sir, that this is extraordinary language, and an extraordinary tone, for the discussions of this body.

Matches and over-matches! Those terms are more applicable elsewhere than here, and fitter for other assemblies than this. Sir, the gentleman seems to forget where, and what we are. This is a Senate—a Senate of equals: of men of individual honor and personal character, and of absolute independence. We know no masters: we acknowledge no dictators. This is a hall for mutual consultation and discussion; not an arena for the exhibition of champions. I offer myself, sir, as a match for no man; I throw the challenge of debate at no man's feet. But, then, sir, since the honorable member has put the question in a manner that calls for an answer; I will give him an answer; and I tell him, that, holding myself to be the humblest of the members here, I yet know nothing in the arm of his friend from Missouri, either alone, or when aided by the arm of his friend from South Carolina, that need deter, even me, from espousing whatever opinions I may choose to espouse; from debating whenever I may choose to debate; or from speaking whatever I may see fit to say, on the floor of the Senate. Sir, when uttered as matter of commendation or compliment, I should dissent from nothing which the honorable member might say of his friend. Still less do I put forth any pretensions of my own. But, when put to me as matter of taunt, I throw it back, and say to the gentleman that he could possibly have said nothing less likely than such a comparison to wound my pride of personal character. The anger of its tone rescued the remark from intentional irony, which otherwise, probably, would have been its general acceptance. But, sir, if it be imagined that, by this mutual quotation and commendation; if it be supposed that, by casting the characters of the drama, assigning to each his part: to one the attack; to another the cry of onset; or, if it be thought that, by a lead and empty vaunt of anticipated victory, any laurels are to be won here; if it be imagined, especially, that any, or all these things will shake any purpose of mine, I can tell the honorable member, once for all, that he is greatly mistaken, and that he is dealing with one of whose temper and character he has yet much to learn. Sir, I shall not allow myself, on this occasion, I hope on no occasion, to be betrayed into any loss of temper; but, if provoked, as I trust I never shall be, into crimination and recrimination, the honorable member may, perhaps, find, that, in that contest, there will be blows to take as well as blows to give; that others can state comparisons as significant, at least, as his own, and that his impunity may, perhaps, demand of him whatever powers of taunt and sarcasm he may possess. I commend him to a prudent husbandry of his resources.

But, sir, the coalition! the coalition! "ay, the murdered coalition!" The gentleman asks if I were led or frightened into this debate by the spectre of the coalition! "Was it the ghost of the murdered coalition, (he exclaims) which haunted the member from Massachusetts, and which, like the ghost of Banquo, would never down?" "The murdered coalition!" Sir, this charge of a coalition, in reference to the late administration, is not original with the honorable member. It did not spring up in the Senate. Whether as a fact, as an argument, or as an embellishment, it is all borrowed. He adopts it, indeed, from a very low origin, and a still lower present condition. It is one of the thousand calumnies with which the press teemed, during an excited political canvass. It was a charge, of which there was not only no proof or probability, but which was, in itself, wholly impossible to be true. No man of common information ever believed a syllable of it. Yet it was of that class of falsehoods, which, by continued repetition, through all the organs of detraction and abuse, are capable of misleading those who are already far misled; and of farther fanning passions already kindling into flame. Doubtless it served, in its day, and in greater or less degree, the end designed by it. Having done that, it has sunk into the general mass of stale and loathed calumnies. It is the very cast-off slough of a polluted and shameless press. Incapable of further mischief, it lies in the sewer, lifeless and despised. It is not now, sir, in the power of the honorable member to give it dignity or decency, by attempting to elevate it, and to introduce it into the Senate. He cannot change it from what it is—an object of general disgust and scorn. On the contrary, the contact, if he choose to touch it, is more likely to drag him down, down, to the place where it lies itself.

But, sir, the honorable member was not, for other reasons, entirely happy in his allusion to the story of Banquo's murder, and Banquo's ghost. It was not, I think, the friends, but the enemies of the murdered Banquo, at whose bidding his spirit would not down. The honorable gentleman is fresh in his reading of the English classics, and can put me right if I am wrong; but, according to my poor recollection, it was at those who had begun with caresses, and ended with foul and treacherous murder, that the gory locks were shaken! The ghost of Banquo, like that of Hamlet, was an honest ghost; it disturbed no innocent man. It knew where its appearance would strike terror, and who would cry out, a ghost! It made itself visible in the right quarter, and compelled the guilty and the conscience smitten, and none others, to start, with—

"Pr'ythee, see there! behold! lo!

"If I stand here, I saw him!"

Their eye balls were seared (was it not so, sir?) who had thought to shield themselves, by concealing their own hand, and laying the imputation of the crime on a low and hireling agency in wickedness, who had vainly attempted to stifle the workings of their own coward consciences, by ejaculating, through white lips and chattering teeth, "thou canst not say I did it!" I have misread the great poet, if it was those who had no way partaken in the deed of the death, who either found that they were, or feared that they should be, pushed from their stools by the ghost of the slain, or who exclaimed, to a spectre created by their own fears, and their own remorse, "avaunt! and quit our sight!"

There is another particular, sir, in which the honorable member's quick perception of resemblances might, I should think, have seen something in the story of Banquo, making it not altogether a subject of the most pleasant contemplation. Those who murdered Banquo, what did they win by it? substantial good? permanent power? or disappointment, rather, and sore mortification; dust and ashes, the common fate of vaulting ambition, overleaping itself? Did not even-handed justice, ere long, commend the poisoned chalice to their own lips? Did they not soon find that for another they had "fled their mind?" that their ambition, though apparently for the moment successful, had but put a barren sceptre in their grasp? Ay, sir,

"A barren sceptre in their gripe,

"Thence to be wrenched by an unlineal hand.

"No son of their's succeeding."

Sir, I need pursue the allusion no farther. I leave the honorable gentleman to run it out at his leisure, and to derive from it all the gratification it is calculated to administer. If he finds himself pleased with the associations, and prepared to be quite satisfied, though the parallel should be entirely completed, I had almost said I am satisfied also—but that I shall think of. Yes, sir, I will think of that.

In the course of my observations, the other day, I paid a passing tribute of respect to a very worthy man, Mr. Dane, of Massachusetts. It so happened that he drew the ordinance of 1787, for the government of the Northwestern Territory. A man of so much ability, and so little pretence; of so great a capacity to do good, and so unmixed a disposition to do it, for its own sake; a gentleman who acted an important part, forty years ago, in a measure, the influence of which is still deeply felt in the very matter which was the subject of debate, might, I thought, receive from me a commendatory recognition. But the honorable member was inclined to be facetious on the subject. He was rather disposed to make it matter of ridicule that I had introduced into the debate the name of one Nathan Dane, of whom, he assures us, he had never before heard. Sir, if the honorable member had never before heard of Mr. Dane, I am sorry for it. It shows him less acquainted with the public men of the country than I had supposed. Let me tell him, however, that a sneer from him, at the mention of the name of Mr. Dane, is in bad taste. It may well be a high mark of ambition, sir, either with the honorable gentleman or myself, to accomplish as much to make our names known to advantage, and remembered with gratitude, as Mr. Dane has accomplished. But the truth is, sir, I suspect that Mr. Dane lives a little too far North. He is of Massachusetts, and too near the North star, to be reached by the honorable gentleman's telescope. If his sphere had happened to range South of Mason's and Dixon's line, he might, probably, have come within the scope of his vision!

I spoke, sir, of the ordinance of 1787, which prohibited slavery, in all future times, Northwest of the Ohio, as a measure of great wisdom and foresight, and one which had been attended with highly beneficial and permanent consequences. I supposed that, on this point, no two gentlemen in the Senate could entertain different opinions. But, the simple expression of this sentiment has led the gentleman not only into a labored defence of slavery, in the abstract, and on principle, but, also, into a warm accusation against me, as having attacked the system of domestic slavery, now existing in the Southern States. For all this, there was not the slightest foundation in any thing said or intimated by me. I did not utter a single word, which any ingenuity could torture into an attack on the slavery of the South. I said, only, that it was highly wise and useful, in legislating for the Northwestern country, while it was yet a wilderness, to prohibit the introduction of slaves; and added, that I presumed in the neighboring State of Kentucky, there was no reflecting and intelligent gentleman who would doubt that, if the same prohibition had been extended, at the same early period, over that commonwealth, her strength and population would, at this day, have been far greater than they are. If these opinions be thought doubtful, they are, nevertheless, I trust, neither extraordinary or disrespectful. They attack nobody, and menace nobody. And yet, sir, the gentleman's optics have discovered, even in the mere expression of this sentiment, what he calls the very spirit of the Missouri question! He represents me as making an onset on the whole South, and manifesting a spirit which would interfere with and disturb their domestic condition! Sir, this injustice no otherwise surprises me, than as it is done here, and done without the slightest pretence of ground for it. I say, it only surprises me, as being done here: for, I know, full well, that it is, and has been, the settled policy of some persons in the South, for years, to represent the people of the North as disposed to interfere with them in their own exclusive and peculiar concerns. This is a delicate and sensitive point in Southern feeling; and, of late years, it has always been touched, and generally with effect, whenever the object has been to unite the whole South against Northern men, or Northern measures. This feeling, always carefully kept alive, and maintained at too intense a heat to admit discrimination or reflection, is a lever of great power in our political machine. It moves vast bodies, and gives to them one and the same direction. But the feeling is without all adequate cause, and the suspicion which exists wholly groundless. There is not, and never has been, a disposition in the North to interfere with these interests of the South. Such interference has never been supposed to be within the power of Government; nor has it been, in any way, attempted. It has always been regarded as a matter of domestic policy, left with the States themselves, and with which the Federal Government had nothing to do. Certainly, sir, I am, and ever have been, of that opinion. The gentleman, indeed, argues, that slavery, in the abstract, is no evil. Most assuredly, I need not say I differ with him, altogether and most widely, on that point. I regard domestic slavery as one of the greatest of evils, both moral and political. But, though it be a malady, and whether it be curable, and, if so, by what means; or, on the other hand, whether it be the vulnus inmedicabile of the social system, I leave it to those whose right and duty it is to inquire and to decide. And this, I believe, sir, is, and uniformly has been, the sentiment of the North. Let us look a little at the history of this matter.

When the present constitution was submitted for the ratification of the people, there were those who imagined that the powers of the Government which it proposed to establish, might, perhaps, in some possible mode, be exerted in measures tending to the abolition of slavery. This suggestion would, of course, attract much attention in the Southern conventions. In that of Virginia, Gov. Randolph said:

"I hope there is none here, who, considering the subject in the calm light of philosophy, will make an objection dishonorable to Virginia; that at the moment they are securing the rights of their citizens, an objection is started that there is a spark of hope that those unfortunate men now held in bondage, may, by the operation of the General Government, be made free."

At the very first Congress, petitions on the subject were presented, if I mistake not, from several States. The Pennsylvania Society for promoting the Abolition of Slavery, took a lead, and laid before Congress a memorial, praying Congress to promote the abolition by such powers as it possessed. This memorial was referred, in the House of Representatives, to a Select Committee, consisting of Mr. Foster, of New Hampshire, Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts, Mr. Huntington, of Connecticut, Mr. Lawrence of New York, Mr. Sinnickson, of New Jersey, Mr. Hartley, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Parker, of Virginia; all of them, sir, as you will observe, Northern men, but the last. This committee made a report, which was committed to a Committee of the Whole House, and there considered and discussed on several days; and, being amended, although in no material respect, it was made to express three distinct propositions, on the subjects of slavery and the slave trade. First, in the words of the constitution, that Congress could not, prior to the year 1808, prohibit the migration or importation of such persons as any of the States, then existing, should think proper to admit. Second, that Congress had authority to restrain the citizens of the United States from carrying on the African slave trade, for the purpose of supplying foreign countries. On this proposition, our early laws against those who engage in that traffic are founded. The third proposition, and that which bears on the present question, was expressed in the following terms:

"Resolved, That Congress have no authority to interfere in the emancipation of slaves, or in the treatment of them in any of the States, it remaining with the several States, alone, to provide rules and regulations therein, which humanity and true policy may require."

This resolution received the sanction of the House of Representatives so early as March, 1790. And now, sir, the honorable member will allow me to remind him, that, not only were the Select Committee who reported the resolution, with a single exception, all Northern men, but also that, of the members then composing the House of Representatives, a large majority, I believe nearly two-thirds, were Northern men also.

The House agreed to insert these resolutions in its journal; and from that day to this, it has never been maintained or contended that Congress had any authority to regulate, or interfere with, the condition of slaves, in the several States. No Northern gentleman, to my knowledge, has moved any such question in either House of Congress.

The fears of the South, whatever fears they might have entertained, were allayed and quieted by this early decision; and so remained, till they were excited afresh, without cause, but for collateral and indirect purposes. When it became necessary, or was thought so, by some political persons, to find an unvarying ground for the exclusion of Northern men from confidence and from lead in the affairs of the republic, then, and not till then, the cry was raised, and the feeling industriously excited, that the influence of Northern men in the public councils would endanger the relation of master and slave. For myself, I claim no other merit than that this gross and enormous injustice towards the whole North, has not wrought upon me to change my opinions; or my political conduct. I hope I am above violating my principles, even under the smart of injury and false imputations. Unjust suspicions and undeserved reproach; whatever pain I may experience from them, will not induce me, I trust, nevertheless, to overstep the limits of constitutional duty, or to encroach on the rights of others. The domestic slavery of the South I leave where I find it—in the hands of their own Governments. It is their affair, not mine. Nor do I complain of the peculiar effect which the magnitude of that population has had in the distribution of power, under this Federal Government. We know, sir, that the representation of the States in the other House is not equal. We know that great advantage, in that respect, is enjoyed by the slave-holding States; and we know, too, that the intended equivalent for that advantage, that is to say, the imposition of direct taxes in the same ratio, has become merely nominal; the habit of the Government being almost invariably to collect its revenues from other sources, and in other modes. Nevertheless, I do not complain; nor would I countenance any movement to alter this arrangement of representation. It is the original bargain—the compact—let it stand: let the advantage of it be fully enjoyed. The Union itself is too full of benefit to be hazarded in propositions for changing its original basis. I go for the Constitution as it is, and for the Union as it is. But I am resolved not to submit, in silence, to accusations, either against myself individually, or against the North, wholly unfounded and unjust—accusations which impute to us a disposition to evade the constitutional compact, and to extend the power of the Government over the internal laws and domestic condition of the States. All such accusations, wherever and whenever made—all insinuations of the existence of any such purposes, I know, and feel, to be groundless and injurious. And we must confide in Southern gentlemen themselves; we must trust to those whose integrity of heart and magnanimity of feeling will lead them to a desire to maintain and disseminate truth, and who possess the means of its diffusion with the Southern public; we must leave it to them to disabuse that public of its prejudices. But, in the mean time, for my own part, I shall continue to act justly, whether those towards whom justice is exercised receive it with candor or with contumely.

Having had occasion to recur to the ordinance of 1787, in order to defend myself against the inferences which the honorable member has chosen to draw from my former observations on that subject, I am not willing, now, entirely to take leave of it, without another remark. It need hardly be said, that that paper expresses just sentiments on the great subjects of civil and religious liberty. Such sentiments were common, and abound in all our state papers of that day. But this ordinance did that which was not so common, and which is not, even now, universal; that is, it set forth and declared, as a high and binding duty of Government itself, the obligation to encourage schools, and advance the means of education; on the plain reason, that religion, morality, and knowledge, are necessary to good government and to the happiness of mankind. One observation further. The important provision incorporated into the constitution of the United States, and several of those of the States, and recently, as we have seen, adopted into the reformed constitution of Virginia, restraining legislative power, in questions of private right, and from impairing the obligation of contracts, is first introduced and established, as far as I am informed, as matter of express written constitutional law, in this ordinance of 1787. And I must add, also, in regard to the author of the ordinance, who has not had the happiness to attract the gentleman's notice heretofore, nor to avoid his sarcasm now, that he was chairman of that Select Committee of the old Congress whose report first expressed the strong sense of that body, that the old confederation was not ade-

An attempt has been made to transfer, from the North to the South, the honor of this exclusion of slavery from the Northwestern territory. The journal, without argument or comment, refutes such attempt. The cession by Virginia was made March, 1784. On the 19th of April following, a Committee, consisting of Messrs. Jefferson, Chase, and Howell, reported a plan for a temporary government of the territory, in which was this article: "That, after the year 1800, there shall be neither slavery, nor involuntary servitude, in any of the said States, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been convicted." Mr. Speight, of North Carolina, moved to strike out this paragraph. The question was put, according to the form then practised: "Shall these words stand, as part of the plan," &c. New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, seven States, voted in the affirmative. Maryland, Virginia, and South Carolina, in the negative. North Carolina was divided. As the consent of nine States was necessary, the words could not stand, and were struck out accordingly. Mr. Jefferson voted for the clause, but was overruled by his colleagues.

In March of the next year, (1785) Mr. King, of Massachusetts, seconded by Mr. Ellery, of Rhode Island, proposed the formerly rejected article, with this addition: "And that this regulation shall be an article of compact, and remain a fundamental principle of the constitutions between the thirteen original States, and each of the States described in the resolve," &c. On this clause, which provided the adequate and thorough security, the eight Northern States at that time voted affirmatively, and the four Southern States negatively. The votes of nine States were not yet obtained, and thus the provision was again rejected by the Southern States. The perseverance of the North held out, and two years afterwards the object was obtained. It is no derogation from the credit, whatever that may be, of drawing the ordinance, that its principles had before been prepared and discussed, in the form of resolutions. If one should reason in that way, what would become of the distinguished honor of the author of the Declaration of Independence? There is not a sentiment in that paper which had not been voted and resolved in the assemblies, and other popular bodies in the country, over and over again.

But the honorable member has now found out that this gentleman (Mr. Dane) was a member of the Hartford Convention. However uninformed the honorable member may be of characters and occurrences at the North, it would seem that he has at his elbow, on this occasion, some high-minded and lofty spirit, some magnanimous and true-hearted monitor, possessing the means of local knowledge, and ready to supply the honorable member with every thing, down even to forgotten and moth-eaten two-penny pamphlets, which may be used to the disadvantage of his own country. But, as to the Hartford Convention, sir, allow me to say, that the proceedings of that body seem, now, to be less read and studied in New England, than farther South. They appear to be looked to, not in New England, but elsewhere, for the purpose of seeing how far they may serve as a precedent. But they will not answer the purpose—they are quite too tame. The latitude in which they originated was too cold. Other conventions, of more recent existence, have gone a whole bar's length beyond it. The learned doctors of Colleton and Abbeville have pushed their commentaries on the Hartford Collect so far, that the original text-writers are thrown entirely into the shade. I have nothing to do, sir, with the Hartford Convention. Its journal, which the gentleman has quoted, I never read. So far as the honorable member may discover in its proceedings a spirit, in any degree resembling that which was avowed and justified in these other conventions to which I have alluded, or so far as those proceedings can be shown to be disloyal to the constitution, or tending to disunion, so far I shall be as ready as any one to bestow on them reprehension and censure.

Having dwelt long on this convention, and other occurrences of that day, in the hope, probably, (which will not be gratified) that I should leave the course of this debate to follow him, at length, in those excursions, the honorable member returned, and attempted another object. He referred to a speech of mine, in the other House, the same which I had occasion to allude to myself the other day; and has quoted a passage or two from it, with a bold, though uneasy and laboring air of confidence, as if he had detected in me an inconsistency. Judging from the gentleman's manner, a stranger to the course of the debate, and to the point in discussion, would have imagined, from so triumphant a tone, that the honorable member was about to overwhelm me with a manifest contradiction. Any one who had heard him, and who had not heard what I had, in fact, previously said, must have thought me routed and discomfited, as the gentleman had promised. Sir, a breath blows all this triumph away. There is not the slightest difference in the sentiments of my remarks on the two occasions. What I said here on Wednesday is in exact accordance with the opinions expressed by me in the other House in 1825. Though the gentleman had the metaphysics of Hudibras—though he were able "To sever and divide

"A hair 'twixt North and Northwest side,"

he yet could not insert his metaphysical scissors between the fair reading of my remarks in 1825, and what I said here last week. There is not only no contradiction, no difference, but, in truth, too exact a similarity, both in thought and language, to be entirely in just taste. I had myself quoted the same speech, had recurred to it, and spoke with it open before me; and much of what I said was little more than a repetition from it. In order to make finishing work with this alleged contradiction, permit me to recur to the origin of this debate, and review its course. This seems expedient, and may be done as well now as at any time.

Well, then, its history is this: The honorable member from Connecticut moved a resolution, which constitutes the first branch of that which is now before us; that is to say, a resolution instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of limiting, for a certain period, the sales of the public lands, to such as have heretofore been offered for sale; and whether sundry offices, connected with the sales of the lands, might not be abolished, without detriment to the public service.

In the progress of the discussion which arose on this resolution, an honorable member from New Hampshire moved to amend the resolution, so as entirely to reverse its object; that is, to strike it all out, and insert a direction to the Committee to inquire into the expediency of adopting measures to hasten the sales, and to extend more rapidly the surveys of the lands.

The honorable member from Maine [Mr. SPRAGUE] suggested that both those propositions might well enough go, for consideration, to the Committee; and in this state of the question the member from South Carolina addressed the Senate in his first speech. He rose, he said, to give us his own free thought on the public lands. I saw him rise with pleasure, and listened with expectation, though, before he concluded, I was filled with surprise. Certainly, I was never more surprised than to find him following up, to the extent he did, the sentiments and opinions which the gentleman from Missouri had put forth, and which it is known he has long entertained.

I need not repeat at large the general topics of the honorable gentleman's speech. When he said, yesterday, that he did not attack the Eastern States, he certainly must have forgotten not only particular remarks, but the whole drift and tenor of his speech; unless he means, by not attacking, that he did not commence hostilities—but that another had preceded him in the attack. He, in the first place, disapproved of the whole course of the Government, for forty years, in regard to its dispositions of the public land; and then turning northward and eastward, and fancying he had found a cause for alleged narrowness and niggardliness in the "accursed policy" of the tariff, to which he represented the people of New England as wedded, he went on, for a full hour, with remarks, the whole scope of which was to exhibit the results of this policy, in feelings and in measures unfavorable to the West. I thought his opinions unfounded and erroneous, as to the general course of the Government, and ventured to reply to them.

The gentleman had remarked on the analogy of other cases, and quoted the conduct of European Governments towards their own subjects, settling on this continent, as in point to show that we had been harsh and rigid in selling, when we should have given, the public lands to settlers. I thought the honorable member had suffered his judgment to be betrayed by a false analogy; that he was struck with an appearance of resemblance, where there was no real similitude. I think so still. The first settlers of North America were enterprising spirits, engaged in private adventure, or fleeing from tyranny at home. When arrived here, they were forgotten by the mother country, or remembered only to be oppressed. Carried away again by the appearance of analogy, or struck with the eloquence of the passage, the honorable member yesterday observed, that the conduct of Government towards the Western emigrants, or my representation of it, brought to his mind a celebrated speech in the British Parliament. It was, sir, the speech of Col. Barre. On the question of the stamp act, or tea tax, I forget which, Col. Barre had heard a member on the Treasury Bench argue, that the people of the United States, being British colonists, planted by the maternal care, nourished by the indulgence, and protected by the arms of England, would not grudge their mite to relieve the mother country from the heavy burthen under which she groaned. The language of Col. Barre, in reply to this, was: They planted by your care! Your oppression planted them in America. They fled from your tyranny, and grew by your neglect of them. So soon as you began to care for them, you showed your care by sending persons to spy out their liberties, misrepresent their character, prey upon them, and eat out their substance.

And now, does the honorable gentleman mean to maintain that language like this is applicable to the conduct of the Government of the United States towards the Western emigrants, or to any representation given by me of that conduct? Were the settlers in the West driven thither by our oppression? Have they flourished only by our neglect of them? Has the Government done nothing but to prey upon them, and eat out their substance? Sir, this fervid eloquence of the British speaker, just, when and where it was uttered, and fit to remain an exercise for the schools, is not a little out of place when it is brought thence, to be applied here, to the conduct of our own country towards her own citizens. From America to England, it may be true; from Americans to their own Government it would be strange language. Let us leave it to be recited and declaimed by our boys, against a foreign nation; not introduce it here, to recite and declaim ourselves against our own.

But I come to the point of the alleged contradiction. In my remarks on Wednesday, I contended that we could not give away gratuitously all the public lands; that we held them in trust; that the Government had solemnly pledged itself to dispose of them as a common fund for the common benefit, and to sell and to settle them as its discretion should dictate. Now, sir, what contradiction does the gentleman find to this sentiment in his speech of 1825? He quotes me as having then said, that we ought not to hug these lands as a very great treasure. Very well, sir; supposing me to be accurately reported, in that expression, what is the contradiction? I have not now said that we should hug these lands as a favorite source of pecuniary income. No such thing. It is not my view. What I have said, and what I do say, is, that they are a common fund; to be disposed of for the common benefit; to be sold at low prices for the accommodation of settlers, keeping the object of settling the lands as much in view as that of raising money from them. This I say now, and this I have always said. Is this hugging them as a favorite treasure? Is there no difference between hugging and hoarding this fund, on the one hand, as a great treasure, and on the other, of disposing of it at low prices, placing the proceeds in the general treasury of the Union? My opinion is, that as much is to be made of the land as fairly and reasonably may be, selling it all the while at such rates as to give the fullest effect to settlement. This is not giving it all away to the States, as the gentleman would propose; nor is it hugging the fund closely and tenaciously, as a favorite treasure; but it is, in my judgment, a just and wise policy, perfectly according with all the various duties which rest on Government. So much for my contradiction. And what is it? Where is the ground of the gentleman's triumph? What inconsistency, in word or doctrine, has he been able to detect? Sir, if this be a sample of that discomfiture with which the honorable gentleman threatened me, commend me to the word discomfiture for the rest of my life.

[SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[JAN. 27, 1830.]

But, after all, this is not the point of debate; and I must now bring the gentleman back to that which is the point.

The real question between me and him is, where has the doctrine been advanced, at the South or the East, that the population of the West should be retarded, or at least need not be hastened, on account of its effect to drain off the people from the Atlantic States? Is this doctrine, as has been alleged, of Eastern origin? That is the question. Has the gentleman found any thing, by which he can make good his accusation? I submit to the Senate that he has entirely failed; and as far as this debate has shown, the only person who has advanced such sentiments, is a gentleman from South Carolina, and a friend to the honorable member himself. The honorable gentleman has given no answer to this; there is none which can be given. The simple fact, while it requires no comment to enforce it, defies all argument to refute it. I could refer to the speeches of another Southern gentleman, in years before, of the same general character, and to the same effect, as that which has been quoted; but I will not consume the time of the Senate by the reading of them.

So, then, sir, New England is guiltless of the policy of retarding Western population, and of all envy and jealousy of the growth of the new States. Whatever there be of that policy in the country, no part of it is her's. If it has a local habitation, the honorable member has probably seen, by this time, where he is to look for it; and if it now has received a name, he has himself christened it.

We approach, at length, sir, to a more important part of the honorable gentleman's observations. Since it does not accord with my views of justice and policy, to give away the public lands altogether, as a mere matter of gratuity, I am asked by the honorable gentleman on what ground it is that I consent to vote them away, in particular instances? How, he inquires, do I reconcile with these professed sentiments, my support of measures appropriating portions of the lands to particular roads, particular canals, particular improvements of rivers, and particular institutions of education in the West? This leads, sir, to the real and wide difference, in political opinion, between the honorable gentleman and myself. On my part, I look upon all these objects as connected with the common good, fairly embraced in its object and its terms; he, on the contrary, deems them all, if good at all, only of local good. This is our difference. The intergaotory which he proceeded to put, at once explains this difference. "What interest," asks he, "has South Carolina in a canal in Ohio?" Sir, this very question is full of significance. It develops the gentleman's whole political system, and its answer expounds mine. Here we differ, toto calco. I look upon a roadover the Alleghany, a canal round the falls of the Ohio, or a canal or rail-way from the Atlantic to the Western waters, as being objects large and extensive enough to be fairly said to be for the common benefit. The gentleman thinks otherwise; and this is the key to open his construction of the powers of the Government. He may well ask, upon his system, what interest has South Carolina in a canal in Ohio? On that system, it is true, she has no interest. On that system, Ohio and Carolina are different Governments and different countries, connected here, it is true, by some slight and ill-defined bond of union, but, in all main respects, separate and diverse. On that system, Carolina has no more interest in a canal in Ohio than in Mexico. The gentleman, therefore, only follows out his own principles; he does no more than arrive at the natural conclusions of his own doctrines; he only announces the true results of that creed, which he has adopted himself, and would persuade others to adopt, when he thus declares that South Carolina has no interest in a public work in Ohio. Sir, we narrow-minded people of New England do not reason thus. Our notion of things is entirely different. We look upon the States, not as separated, but as united. We love to dwell on that Union, and on the mutual happiness which it has so much promoted, and the common renown which it has so greatly contributed to acquire. In our contemplation, Carolina and Ohio are parts of the same country; States, united under the same General Government, having interests, common, associated, intermingled. In whatever is within the proper sphere of the constitutional power of this Government, we look upon the States as one. We do not impose geographical limits to our patriotic feeling or regard; we do not follow rivers and mountains, and lines of latitude, to find boundaries, beyond which public improvements do not benefit us. We who come here, as agents and representatives of these narrow minded and selfish men of New England, consider ourselves as bound to regard, with equal eye, the good of the whole, in whatever is within our power of legislation. Sir, if a rail-road or a canal, beginning in South Carolina, and ending in South Carolina, appeared to me to be of national importance and national magnitude, believing, as I do, that the power of Government extends to the encouragement of works of that description, if I were to stand up here, and ask what interest has Massachusetts in rail-roads in South Carolina, I should not be willing to face my constituents. These same narrow-minded men would tell me, that they had sent me to act for the whole country, and that one who possessed too little comprehension, either of intellect or feeling; one who was not large enough, in mind and heart, to embrace the whole, was not fit to be entrusted with the interest of any part. Sir, I do not desire to enlarge the powers of the Government by unjustifiable construction, nor to exercise any not within a fair interpretation. But when it is believed that a power does exist, then it is, in my judgment, to be exercised for the general benefit of the whole. So far as respects the exercise of such a power, the States are one. It was the very object of the constitution to create unity of interests, to the extent of the powers of the General Government. In war and peace, we are one; in commerce, one; because the authority of the General Government reaches to war and peace, and to the regulation of commerce. I have never seen any more difficulty, in erecting light houses on the Lakes, than on the Ocean; in improving the harbors of inland seas, than if they were within the ebb and flow of the tide; or of removing obstructions in the vast streams of the West, more than in any work to facilitate commerce on the Atlantic coast. If there be power for one, there is power also for the other; and they are all and equally for the country.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

There are other objects, apparently more local, or the benefit of which is less general, towards which, nevertheless, I have concurred, with others, to give aid, by donations of land. It is proposed to construct a road in or through one of the new States, in which this Government possesses large quantities of land. Have the United States no right, as a great and untaxed proprietor; are they under no obligation, to contribute to an object thus calculated to promote the common good of all the proprietors, themselves included? And even with respect to education, which is the extreme case, let the question be considered. In the first place, as we have seen, it was made matter of compact with these States that they should do their part to promote education. In the next place, our whole system of land laws proceeds on the idea that education is for the common good; because, in every division, a certain portion is uniformly reserved and appropriated for the use of schools. And finally, have not these new States singularly strong claims, founded on the ground already stated, that the Government is a great untaxed proprietor in the ownership of the soil? It is a consideration of great importance, that, probably, there is, in no part of the country, or of the world, so great call for the means of education, as in those new States; owing to the vast numbers of persons within those ages in which education and instruction are usually received, if received at all. This is the natural consequence of recency of settlement and rapid increase. The census of these States shows how great a proportion of the whole population occupies the classes between infancy and manhood. These are the wide fields, and here is the deep and quick soil for the seeds of knowledge and virtue; and this is the favored season, the very spring-time for sowing them. Let them be disseminated without stint. Let them be scattered with a bountiful broad cast. Whatever the Government can fairly do towards these objects, in my opinion, ought to be done.

These, sir, are the grounds, succinctly stated, on which my votes for grants of lands for particular objects rest; while I maintain, at the same time, that it is all a common fund, for the common benefit. And reasons like these, I presume, have influenced the votes of other gentlemen from New England. Those who have a different view of the powers of the Government, of course, come to different conclusions, on these, as on other questions. I observed, when speaking on this subject before, that, if we looked to any measure, whether for a road, a canal, or any thing else, intended for the improvement of the West, it would be found that, if the New England ayes were struck out of the list of votes, the Southern noes would always have rejected the measure. The truth of this has not been denied, and cannot be denied. In stating this, I thought it just to ascribe it to the constitutional scruples of the South, rather than to any other less favorable or less charitable cause. But no sooner had I done this, than the honorable gentleman asks if I reproach him and his friends with their constitutional scruples. Sir, I reproach nobody; I stated a fact, and gave the most respectable reason for it that occurred to me. The gentleman cannot deny the fact; he may, if he choose, disclaim the reason. It is not long since I had occasion, in presenting a petition from his own State, to account for its being entrusted to my hands, by saying, that the constitutional opinions of the gentleman and his worthy colleague prevented them from supporting it. Did I state this as matter of reproach?

Far from it. Did I attempt to find any other cause than an honest one for these scruples? Sir, I did not. It did not become me to doubt, nor to insinuate, that the gentleman had either changed his sentiments, or that he had made up a set of constitutional opinions, accommodated to any particular combination of political occurrences. Had I done so, I should have felt that, while I was entitled to little credit, in thus questioning other people's motives, I justified the whole world in suspecting my own. But how has the gentleman returned this respect for others' opinions? His own candor and justice, how have they been exhibited towards the motives of others, while he has been at so much pains to maintain, what nobody has disputed, the purity of his own? Why, sir, he has asked when, and how, and why, New England votes were found going for measures favorable to the West? He has demanded to be informed whether all this did not begin in 1825, and while the election of President was still pending? Sir, to these questions retort would be justified, and it is both cogent and at hand. Nevertheless, I will answer the inquiry, not by retort, but by facts. I will tell the gentleman when, and how, and why, New England has supported measures favorable to the West. I have already referred to the early history of the Government; to the first acquisition of the lands; to the original laws for disposing of them, and for governing the territories where they lie; and have shown the influence of New England men and New England principles in all these leading measures. I should not be pardoned were I to go over that ground again. Coming to more recent times, and to measures of a less general character, I have endeavored to prove that every thing of this kind, designed for Western improvement, has depended on the votes of New England; all this is true, beyond the power of contradiction.

And now, sir, there are two measures to which I will refer, not so ancient as to belong to the early history of the public lands, and not so recent as to be on this side of the period when the gentleman charitably imagines a new direction may have been given to New England feeling and New England votes. These measures, and the New England votes in support of them, may be taken as samples and specimens of all the rest.

In 1820, (observe, in 1820) the people of the West besought Congress for a reduction in the price of lands. In favor of that reduction, New England, with a delegation of forty members in the other House, gave thirty-three votes, and one only against it. The four Southern States, with fifty members, gave thirty-two votes for it, and seven against it. Again, in 1821, (observe again, sir, the time) the law passed for the relief of the purchasers of the public lands. This was a measure of vital importance to the West, and more especially to the Southwest. It authorized the relinquishment of contracts for lands which had been entered into at high prices, and a reduction in the other cases of not less than thirty-seven and one-half per cent. on the purchase money. Many millions of dollars—six or seven I believe, at least, probably much more—were relinquished by this law. On this bill, New England, with her forty members, gave more affirmative votes than the four Southern States, with their fifty-two or fifty-three members.

These two are far the most important measures respecting the public lands which have been adopted within the last twenty years. They took place in 1820 and 1821. That is the time when. And as to the manner how, the gentleman already sees that it was by voting, in solid column, for the required relief: and, lastly, as to the cause why, I tell the gentleman, it was because the members from New England thought the measures just and salutary; because they entertained towards the West neither envy, hatred, nor malice; because they deemed it becoming them, as just and enlightened public men, to meet the exigency which had arisen in the West with the appropriate measure of relief; because they felt it due to their own characters, and the characters of their New England predecessors in this Government, to act towards the new States in a spirit of liberal, patronizing, magnanimous policy. So much, sir, for the cause why; and I hope, that, by this time, the honorable gentleman is satisfied; if not, I do not know when, or how, or why, he ever will be.

Having recurred to these two important measures, in answer to the gentleman's inquiries, I must now beg permission to go back to a period yet something earlier, for the purpose of still further showing how much, or rather how little, reason there is for the gentleman's insinuation that political hopes or fears, or party associations, were the grounds of these New England votes. And, after what has been said, I hope it may be forgiven me if I allude to some political opinions and votes of my own, of very little public importance, certainly, but which, from the time at which they were given and expressed, may pass for good witnesses on this occasion.

This Government, from its origin to the peace of 1815, had been too much engrossed with various other important concerns to be able to turn its thoughts inward, and look to the development of its vast internal resources. In the early part of President Washington's administration, it was fully occupied with organizing the Departments, providing for the public debt, defending the frontiers, and maintaining domestic peace. Before the termination of that administration, the fires of the French Revolution blazed forth, as from a new opened volcano, and the whole breadth of the ocean did not entirely secure us from its effects. The smoke and the cinders reached us, though not the burning lava. Difficult and agitating questions, embarrassing to Government, and dividing public opinion, sprung out of the new state of our foreign relations, and were succeeded by others, and yet again by others, equally embarrassing, and equally exciting division and discord, through the long series of twenty years; till they finally issued in another war with England. Down to the close of that war, no distinct, marked, and deliberate attention had been given, or could have been given, to the internal condition of the country, its capacities of improvement, or the constitutional power of the Government in regard to objects connected with such improvement.

The peace brought about an entirely new, and a most interesting state of things: it opened to us other prospects, and suggested other duties. We ourselves were changed, and the whole world was changed. The pacification of Europe, after June, 1815, assumed a firm and permanent aspect. The nations evidently manifested that they were disposed for peace. Some agitation of the waves might be expected, even after the storm had subsided, but the tendency was, strongly and rapidly, towards settled repose.

It so happened, sir, that I was, at that time, a member of Congress, and, like others, naturally turned my attention to the contemplation of the newly altered condition of the country and of the world. It appeared plainly enough to me, as well as to wiser and more experienced men, that the policy of the Government would necessarily take a start in a new direction; because new directions would be given to the pursuits and occupations of the people. We had pushed our commerce far and fast, under the advantage of a neutral flag. But there were now no longer flags either neutral or belligerent. The harvest of neutrality had been great, but we had gathered it all. With the peace of Europe, it was obvious there would spring up, in the circle of nations, a revived and invigorated spirit of trade, and a new activity in all the business and objects of civilized life. Hereafter, our commercial gains were to be earned only by success in a close and intense competition. Other nations would produce for themselves, and carry for themselves, and manufacture for themselves, to the full extent of their abilities. The crops of our plains would no longer sustain European armies, nor our ships longer supply those whom war had rendered unable to supply themselves. It was obvious that, under these circumstances, the country would begin to survey itself, and to estimate its own capacity of improvement. And this improvement—how was it to be accomplished, and who was to accomplish it? We were ten or twelve millions of people, spread over almost half a world. We were twenty-four States, some stretching along the same sea board, some along the same line of inland frontier, and others on opposite banks of the same vast rivers. Two considerations at once presented themselves, at looking at this state of things, with great force. One was, that that great branch of improvement, which consisted in furnishing new facilities of intercourse, necessarily ran into different States, in every leading instance, and would benefit the citizens of all such States. No one State, therefore, in such cases, would assume the whole expense, nor was the co-operation of several States to be expected. Take the instance of the Delaware breakwater. It will cost several millions of money. Would Pennsylvania alone have ever constructed it? Certainly never, while this Union lasts; because it is not for her sole benefit. Would Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, have united to accomplish it at their joint expense? Certainly not, for the same reason. It could not be done, therefore, but by the General Government. The same may be said of the large inland undertakings, except that, in them, Government, instead of bearing the whole expense, co-operates with others who bear a part. The other consideration is, that the United States have the means. They enjoy the revenues derived from commerce, and the States have no abundant and easy sources of public income. The custom houses fill the general treasury, while the States have scanty resources, except by resort to heavy direct taxes.

Under this view of things, I thought it necessary to settle, at least for myself, some definite notions, with respect to the powers of the Government in regard to internal affairs. It may not savor too much of self-commendation to remark, that, with this object, I considered the constitution, its judicial construction, its cotemporaneous exposition, and the whole history of the legislation of Congress under it; and I arrived at the conclusion, that Government had power to accomplish sundry objects, or aid in their accomplishment, which are now commonly spoken of as Internal Improvements. That conclusion, sir, may have been right, or it may have been wrong. I am not about to argue the grounds of it at large. I say only that it was adopted and acted on even so early as in 1816. Yes, I made up my opinion, and determined on my intended course of political conduct, on these subjects, in the Fourteenth Congress, in 1816. And now, I have further to say, that I made up these opinions, and entered on this course of political conduct, Teuero duce. Yes, sir, I pursued, in all this, a South Carolina track. On the doctrines of Internal Improvement, South Carolina, as she was then represented in the other House, set forth, in 1816, under a fresh and leading breeze, and I was among the followers. But if my leader sees new lights, and turns a sharp corner, unless I see new lights also, I keep straight on in the same path. I repeat, that leading gentlemen from South Carolina were first and foremost in behalf of the doctrines of Internal Improvements, when those doctrines first came to be considered and acted upon in Congress. The debate on the Bank question, on the Tariff of 1816, and on the Direct Tax, will show who was who, and what was what, at that time. The tariff of 1816, one of the plain cases of oppression and usurpation, from which, if the Government does not recede, individual States, it is said, may justly secede from the Government, is, sir, in truth, a South Carolina tariff, supported by South Carolina votes. But for those votes, it could not have passed in the form in which it did pass; whereas, if it had depended on Massachusetts votes, it would have been lost. Does not the honorable gentleman well know all this? There are certainly those who do, full well, know it all. I do not say this to reproach South Carolina. I only state the fact; and I think it will appear to be true, that, among the earliest and boldest advocates of the tariff, as a measure of protection, and on the express ground of protection, were leading gentlemen of South Carolina in Congress. I did not then, and cannot now, understand their language in any other sense. While this tariff of 1816 was under discussion, in the House of Representatives, an honorable gentleman from Georgia, now of this House, [Mr. Forsyth] moved to reduce the proposed duty on cotton. He failed by four votes, South Carolina giving three votes (enough to have turned the scale) against his motion. The act, sir, then passed, and received, on its passage, the support of a majority of the Representatives of South Carolina present and voting. This act is the first in the order of those now denounced as plain usurpations. We see it daily, in the list, by the side of those of 1824 and 1828, as a case of manifest oppression, justifying disunion. I put it home to the honorable member from South Carolina, that his own State was not only "art and part" in this measure, but the causa causans. Without her aid this seminal principle of mischief, this root of Upas, could not have been planted. I have already said, and it is true, that this act proceeded on the ground of protection. It interfered directly with existing interests of great value and amount. It cut up the Calcutta cotton trade by the roots, but it passed, nevertheless, and it passed on the principle of protecting manufactures, on the principle against free trade, on the principle opposed to that which lets us alone. (Note 2.)

Such [said Mr. W.] were the opinions of important and leading gentlemen from South Carolina, on the subject of Internal Improvement, in 1816. I went out of Congress the next year; and returning again, in 1823, thought I found South Carolina where I had left her. I really supposed that all things remained as they were, and that the South Carolina doctrine of Internal Improvements would be defended by the same eloquent voices, and the same strong arms, as formerly. In the lapse of these six years, it is true, political associations had assumed a new aspect, and new divisions. A party had arisen in the South hostile to the doctrine of Internal Improvements, and had vigorously attacked that doctrine. Anti-consolidation was the flag under which this party fought; and its supporters inveighed against Internal Improvements much after the manner in which the honorable gentleman has now inveighed against them, as part and parcel of the system of consolidation. Whether this party arose in South Carolina herself, or in her neighborhood, is more than I know. I think the latter. However that may have been, there were those found in South Carolina ready to make war upon it, and who did make intrepid war upon it. Names being regarded as things, in such controversies, they bestowed on the anti-improvement gentlemen the appellation of Radicals. Yes, sir, the name of Radicals, as a term of distinction, applicable and applied to those who denied the liberal doctrines of Internal Improvements, originated, according to the best of my recollection, somewhere between North Carolina and Georgia. Well, sir, these mischievous Radicals were to be put down; and the strong arm of South Carolina was stretched out to put them down. About this time, sir, I returned to Congress. The battle with the Radicals had been fought, and our South Carolina champions of the doctrines of Internal Improvements had nobly maintained their ground, and were understood to have achieved a victory. They have driven back the enemy with discomfiture—a thing, by the way, sir, which is not always performed when it is promised. A gentleman, to whom I have already referred in this debate, had come into Congress during my absence from it, from South Carolina, and had brought with him a high reputation for ability. He came from a school with which we had been acquainted, et noscitur a sociis. I hold in my hand, sir, a printed speech of this distinguished gentleman, [Mr. McDuffie] "on Internal Improvements," delivered about the period to which I now refer, and printed, with a few introductory remarks upon consolidation, in which, sir, I think he quite consolidated the arguments of his opponents, the Radicals, if to crush be to consolidate. I give you a short but substantive quotation from these remarks. He is speaking of a pamphlet then recently published, entitled "Consolidation;" and having alluded to the question of renewing the charter of the former Bank of the United States, he says: "Moreover, in the early history of parties, and when Mr. Crawford advocated a renewal of the old charter, it was considered a federal measure, which Internal Improvements never was, as this author erroneously states. This latter measure originated in the administration of Mr. Jefferson, with the appropriation for the Cumberland Road; and was first proposed, as a system, by Mr. Calhoun, and carried through the House of Representatives by a large majority of the republicans, including almost every one of the leading men who carried us through the late war."

So, then, Internal Improvement is not one of the federal heresies. One paragraph more, sir:

"The author in question, not content with denouncing as federalists Gen. Jackson, Mr. Adams, Mr. Calhoun, and the majority of the South Carolina delegation in Congress, modestly extends the denunciation to Mr. Monroe, and the whole republican party. Here are his words: 'During the administration of Mr. Monroe, much has passed which the republican party would be glad to approve, if they could!! But the principal feature, and that which has chiefly elicited these observations, is the renewal of the system of Internal Improvements.' Now this measure was adopted by a vote of 115 to 86, of a republican Congress, and sanctioned by a republican President. Who, then, is this author, who assumes the high prerogative of denouncing, in the name of the republican party, the republican administration of the country? A denunciation including within its sweep Calhoun, Lowndes, and Cheves, men who will be regarded as the brightest ornaments of South Carolina, and the strongest pillars of the republican party, as long as the late war shall be remembered, and talents and patriotism shall be regarded as the proper objects of the admiration and gratitude of a free people!"

Such are the opinions, sir, which were maintained by South Carolina gentlemen, in the House of Representatives, on the subject of Internal Improvements, when I took my seat there, as a member from Massachusetts, in 1823. But this is not all. We had a bill before us, and passed it in that House, entitled "An act to procure the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, upon the subject of roads and canals." It authorized the President to cause surveys and estimates to be made of the routes of such roads and canals as he might deem of national importance, in a commercial or military point of view, or for the transportation of the mail, and appropriated thirty thousand dollars, out of the treasury, to defray the expense. This act, though preliminary in its nature, covered the whole ground. It took for granted the complete power of Internal Improvement, as far as any of its advocates had ever contended for it. Having passed the other House, the bill came up to the Senate, and was here considered and debated in April, 1824. The honorable member from South Carolina was a member of the Senate at that time. While the bill was under consideration here, a motion was made to add the following proviso:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affirm or admit a power in Congress, on their own authority, to make roads or canals, within any of the States of the Union." The yeas and nays were taken on this proviso, and the honorable member voted in the negative! The proviso failed.

A motion was then made to add this proviso, viz:

"Provided, That the faith of the United States is hereby pledged, that no money shall ever be expended for roads and canals, except it shall be among the several States, and in the same proportion as direct taxes are laid and assessed by the provisions of the constitution."

The honorable member voted against this proviso, also, and it failed. The bill was then put on its passage, and the honorable member voted for it, and it passed, and became a law.

Now it strikes me, sir, that there is no maintaining these votes, but upon the power of Internal Improvement, in its broadest sense. In truth, these bills for surveys and estimates have always been considered as test questions: they show who is for and who against Internal Improvement. This law itself went the whole length, and assumed the full and complete power. The gentleman's vote sustained that power, in every form in which the various propositions to amend presented it. He went for the entire and unrestrained authority, without consulting the States, and without agreeing to any proportionate distribution. And now suffer me to remind you, that it is this very same power, thus sanctioned, in every form, by the gentleman's own opinion, that is now so plain and manifest a usurpation, that the State of South Carolina is supposed to be justified in refusing submission to any laws carrying the power into effect. Truly, sir, is this not a little too hard? May we not crave some mercy, under favor and protection of the gentleman's own authority? Admitting that a road, or a canal, must be written down flat usurpation as ever was committed, may we find no mitigation in our respect for his place, and his vote, as one that knows the law?

The tariff, which South Carolina had an efficient hand in establishing, in 1816, and this asserted power of Internal Improvement, advanced by her in the same year, and, as we have seen, approved and sanctioned by her Representatives in 1824, these two measures are the great grounds on which she is now thought to be justified in breaking up the Union, if she sees fit to break it up!

I may now safely say, I think, that we have had the authority of leading and distinguished gentlemen from South Carolina, in support of the doctrine of Internal Improvement. I repeat that, up to 1824, I, for one, followed South Carolina; but, when that star, in its ascension, veered off, in an unexpected direction, I relied on its light no longer. [Here the VICE PRESIDENT said: Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to say that the person now occupying the chair of the Senate has changed his opinions on the subject of Internal Improvement?] From nothing ever said to me, sir, have I had reason to know of any change in the opinions of the person filling the chair of the Senate. If such change has taken place, I regret it. I speak generally of the State of South Carolina. Individuals, we know there are, who hold opinions favorable to the power. An application for its exercise, in behalf of a public work in South Carolina itself, is now pending, I believe, in the other House, presented by members from that State.

I have thus, sir, perhaps not without some tediousness of detail, shown that, if I am in error, on the subjects of Internal Improvement, how, and in what company I fell into that error. If I am wrong, it is apparent who misled me.

I go to other remarks of the honorable member, and I have to complain of an entire misapprehension of what I said on the subject of the national debt, though I can hardly perceive how any one could misunderstand me. What I said was, not that I wished to put off the payment of the debt, but, on the contrary, that I had always voted for every measure for its reduction, as uniformly as the gentleman himself. He seems to claim the exclusive merit of a disposition to reduce the public charge. I do not allow it to him. As a debt, I was, I am, for paying it, because it is a charge on our finances, and on the industry of the country. But I observed that I thought I perceived a morbid fervor on that subject—an excessive anxiety to pay off the debt, not so much because it is a debt simply, as because, while it remains, it furnishes one objection to disunion. It is a tie of common interest while it lasts. I did not impute such motives to the honorable gentleman himself, but that there is such a feeling in existence I have not a particle of doubt. The most I said was, that, if one effect of the debt was to strengthen our Union, that effect itself was not regretted by me, however much others might regret it. The gentleman has not seen how to reply to this, otherwise than by supposing me to have advanced the doctrine that a national debt is a national blessing. Others, I must hope, will find less difficulty in understanding me. I distinctly and pointedly cautioned the honorable member not to understand me as expressing an opinion favorable to the continuance of the debt. I repeated this caution, and repeated it more than once; but it was thrown away. On yet another point, [said Mr. W.] I was still more unaccountably misunderstood. The gentleman had harangued against "consolidation." I told him, in reply, that there was one kind of consolidation to which I was attached, and that was the consolidation of our Union; and that this was precisely that consolidation to which I feared others were not attached. That such consolidation was the very end of the constitution; the leading object, as they had informed us themselves, which its framers kept in view. I turned to their communication, and read their very words—"the consolidation of the Union"—and expressed my devotion to this sort of consolidation. I said, in terms, that I wished not, in the slightest degree, to augment the powers of this Government; that my object was to preserve, not to enlarge; and that, by consolidating the Union, I understood no more than the strengthening of the Union, and perpetuating it. Having been thus explicit, having thus read from the printed book the precise words which I adopted, as expressing my own sentiments, it passes comprehension how any man could understand me as contending for an extension of the powers of the Government, or for consolidation, in that odious sense in which it means an accumulation in the Federal Government of the powers properly belonging to the States.

I repeat, sir, that, in adopting the sentiments of the framers of the constitution, I read their language audibly, and word for word; and I pointed out the distinction, just as fully as I have now done, between the consolidation of the Union and that other obnoxious consolidation which I disclaimed. And yet the honorable member misunderstood me. The gentleman had said that he wished for no fixed revenue—not a shilling. If, by a word, he could convert the capitol into gold, he would not do it. Why all this fear of revenue? Why, sir, because, as the gentleman told us, it tends to consolidation. Now, this can mean neither more nor less than that a common revenue is a common interest, and that all common interests tend to hold the Union of the States together. I confess I like that tendency; if the gentleman dislikes it, he is right in deprecating a shilling's fixed revenue. So much, sir, for consolidation.

As well as I recollect the course of his remarks, the honorable gentleman next recurred to the subject of the tariff. He did not doubt the word must be of unpleasant sound to me, and proceeded, with an effort neither new nor attended with new success, to involve me and my votes in inconsistency and contradiction. I am happy the gentleman has furnished me an opportunity of a timely

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

remark or two on that subject. I was glad he approached it: for it is a question I enter upon without fear from any body. The strenuous toil of the gentleman has been to raise an inconsistency between my dissent to the tariff in 1824 and my vote in 1828. It is labor lost. He pays undeserved compliment to my speech in 1824; but this is only to raise me high, that my fall, as he would have it, in 1828, may be more signal. Sir, there was no fall at all. Between the ground I stood on in 1824, and that I took in 1828, there was not only no precipice, but no declivity. It was a change of position to meet new circumstances, but on the same level. A plain tale explains the whole matter. In 1816, I had not acquiesced in the tariff, then supported by South Carolina. To some parts of it, especially, I felt and expressed great repugnance. I held the same opinions in 1821, at the meeting in Faneuil Hall, to which the gentleman has alluded. I said then, and say now, that, as an original question, the authority of Congress to exercise the revenue power, with direct reference to the protection of manufactures, is a questionable authority; far more questionable, in my judgment, than the power of Internal Improvements. I must confess, sir, that, in one respect, some impression has been made on my opinions lately. Mr. Madison's publication has put the power in a very strong light. He has placed it, I must acknowledge, upon grounds of construction and argument, which seem impregnable. But even if the power were doubtful, on the face of the constitution itself, it had been assumed and asserted in the first revenue law ever passed under that same constitution; and, on this ground, as a matter settled by cotemporaneous practice, I had refrained from expressing the opinion that the tariff laws transcended constitutional limits, as the gentleman supposes. What I did say at Faneuil Hall, as far as I now remember, was, that this was originally matter of doubtful construction. The gentleman himself, I suppose, thinks there is no doubt about it, and that the laws are plainly against the constitution. Mr. Madison's letters, already referred to, contain, in my judgment, by far the most able exposition extant of this part of the constitution. He has satisfied me, so far as the practice of the Government had left it an open question.

With a great majority of the Representatives of Massachusetts, I voted against the tariff of 1824. My reasons were then given, and I will not now repeat them. But, notwithstanding our dissent, the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Kentucky, went for the bill, in almost unbroken column, and it passed. Congress and the President sanctioned it, and it became the law of the land. What, then, were we to do? Our only option was, either to fall in with this settled course of public policy, and accommodate ourselves to it as well as we could, or to embrace the South Carolina doctrine, and talk of nullifying the statute by State interference.

This last alternative did not suit our principles, and, of course, we adopted the former. In 1827, the subject came again before Congress, on a proposition favorable to wool and woollens. We looked upon the system of protection as being fixed and settled. The law of 1824 remained. It had gone into full operation, and, in regard to some objects intended by it, perhaps most of them, had produced all its expected effects. No man proposed to repeal it; no man attempted to renew the general contest on its principle. But, owing to subsequent and unforeseen occurrences, the benefit intended by it to wool and woollen fabrics had not been realized. Events, not known here when the law passed, had taken place, which defeated its object in that particular respect. A measure was accordingly brought forward to meet this precise deficiency, to remedy this particular defect. It was limited to wool and woollens. Was ever any thing more reasonable? If the policy of the tariff laws had become established in principle, as the permanent policy of Government, should they not be revised and amended, and made equal like other laws, as exigencies should arise, or justice require? Because we had doubted about adopting the system, were we to refuse to cure its manifest defects, after it became adopted, and when no one attempted its repeal? And this, sir, is the inconsistency so much bruited. I had voted against the tariff of 1824—but it passed; and in 1827 and 1828 I voted to amend it, in a point essential to the interests of my constituents. Where is the inconsistency? Could I do otherwise? Sir, does political consistency consist in always giving negative votes? Does it require of a public man to refuse to concur in amending laws, because they passed against his consent? Having voted against the tariff originally, does consistency demand that I should do all in my power to maintain an unequal tariff, burthensome to my own constituents, in many respects, favorable in none? To consistency of that sort, I lay no claim; and there is another sort to which I lay as little, and that is, a kind of consistency by which persons feel themselves as much bound to oppose a proposition after it has become a law of the land, as before.

The bill of 1827, limited, as I have said, to the single object in which the tariff of 1824 had manifestly failed in its effect, passed the House of Representatives, but was lost here. We had then the act of 1828. I need not recur to the history of a measure so recent. Its enemies spiced it with whatsoever they thought would render it distasteful; its friends took it, drugged as it was. Vast amounts of property, many millions, had been invested in manufactures, under the inducements of the act of 1824. Events called loudly, as I thought, for further regulation to secure the degree of protection intended by that act. I was disposed to vote for such regulation, and desired nothing more; but certainly was not to be bantered out of my purpose by a threatened augmentation of duty on molasses, put into the bill for the avowed purpose of making it obnoxious. The vote may have been right or wrong, wise or unwise; but it is little less than absurd to allege against it an inconsistency with opposition to the former law.

Sir, as to the general subject of the tariff, I have little now to say. Another opportunity may be presented. I remarked the other day, that this policy did not begin with us in New England; and yet, sir, New England is charged, with vehemence, as being favorable, or charged with equal vehemence, as being unfavorable to the tariff policy, just as best suits the time, place, and occasion, for making some charge against her. The credulity of the public has been put to its extreme capacity of false impression, relative to her conduct in this particular. Through all the South, during the late contest, it was New England policy, and a New England administration, that was afflicting the country with a tariff beyond all endurance; while, on the other side of the Alleghany, even the act of 1828, itself, the very sublimated essence of oppression, according to Southern opinions, was pronounced to be one of those blessings for which the West was indebted to the "generous South."

With large investments in manufacturing establishments, and many and various interests connected with and dependent on them, it is not to be expected that New England, any more than other portions of the country, will now consent to any measure, destructive, or highly dangerous. The duty of the Government, at the present moment, would seem to be to preserve, not to destroy; to maintain the position which it has assumed; and, for one, I shall feel it an indispensable obligation to hold it steady, as far as in my power, to that degree of protection which it has undertaken to bestow. No more of the tariff.

Professing to be provoked by what he chose to consider a charge made by me against South Carolina, the honorable member has taken up a new crusade against New England. Leaving, altogether, the subject of the public lands, in which his success, perhaps, had been neither distinguished nor satisfactory, and letting go, also, of the topic of the tariff, he sallied forth in a general assault on the opinions, politics, and parties, of New England, as they have been exhibited in the last thirty years. This is natural. The "narrow policy" of the public lands had proved a legal settlement in South Carolina, and was not to be removed. The "accursed policy" of the tariff, also, had established the fact of its birth and parentage, in the same State. No wonder, therefore, the gentleman wished to carry the war, as he expressed it, into the enemy's country. Prudently willing to quit these subjects, he was, doubtless, desirous of fastening on others, which could not be transferred south of Mason and Dixon's line. The politics of New England became his theme; and it was in this part of his speech, I think, that he menaced me with such sore discomfiture. Discomfiture! Why, sir, when he attacks any thing which I maintain, and overthrows it; when he turns the right or left of any position which I take up; when he drives me from any ground I choose to occupy; he may then talk of discomfiture—but not till that distant day. What has he done? Has he maintained his own charges? Has he proved what he alleged? Has he sustained himself in his attack on the Government, and on the history of the North, in the matter of the public lands? Has he disproved a fact, refuted a proposition, weakened an argument, maintained by me? Has he come within beat of drum of any position of mine? Oh, no, but he has "carried the war into the enemy's country!" Carried the war into the enemy's country! Yes, sir; and what sort of a war has he made of it? Why, sir, he has stretched a drag-net over the whole surface of perished pamphlets, indiscreet sermons, frothy paragraphs, and fuming popular addresses; over whatever the pulpit, in its moments of alarm, the press in its heats, and parties in their extravagance, have severally thrown off, in times of general excitement and violence. He has thus swept together a mass of such things as, but that they are now old, the public health would have required him rather to leave in their state of dispersion. For a good long hour or two, we had the unbroken pleasure of listening to the honorable member, while he recited, with his usual grace and spirit, and with evident high gusto, speeches, pamphlets, addresses, and all the et ceteras of the political press, such as warm heads produce in warm times; and such as it would be "discomfiture," indeed, for any one, whose taste did not delight in that sort of reading, to be obliged to peruse at any time. This is his war. This it is to carry the war into the enemy's country. It is in an invasion of this sort, that he flatters himself with the expectation of gaining laurels fit to adorn a Senator's brow.

I shall not [said Mr. W.]—it will, I trust, not be expected that I should, either now, or at any time—separate this farrago into parts, and examine and answer its components. I shall hardly bestow upon it all, a general remark or two. In the run of forty years, sir, under this constitution, we have experienced sundry successive violent party contests. Party arose, indeed, with the constitution itself, and, in some form or other, has attended it through the greater part of its history. Whether any other constitution than the old Articles of Confederation was desirable, was, itself, a question on which parties formed: if a new constitution were framed, what powers should be given to it, was another question; and, when it had been formed, what was, in fact, the just extent of the powers actually conferred, was a third. Parties, as we know, existed under the first administration, as distinctly marked as those which manifested themselves at any subsequent period. The contest immediately preceding the political change in 1801, and that, again, which existed at the commencement of the late war, are other instances of party excitement, of something more than usual strength and intensity. In all these conflicts, there was, no doubt, much of violence on both and all sides. It would be impossible, if one had a fancy for such employment, to adjust the relative quantum of violence between these contending parties. There was enough in each, as must always be expected in popular Governments. With a great deal of proper and decorous discussion, there was mingled a great deal, also, of declamation, virulence, crimination, and abuse. In regard to any party, probably, at one of these leading epochs in the history of parties, enough may be found to make out another equally inflamed exhibition as that with which the honorable member has edified us. For myself, sir, I shall not rake among the rubbish of by-gone times, to see what I can find, or whether I cannot find something, by which I can fix a blot on the escutcheon of any State, any party, or any part of the country. General Washington's administration was steadily and zealously maintained, as we all know, by New England. It was violently opposed elsewhere. We know in what quarter he had the most earnest, constant, and persevering support, in all his great and leading measures. We know where his private and personal character were held in the highest degree of attachment and veneration; and we know, too, where his measures were opposed, his services slighted, and his character vilified. We know, or we might know, if we turned to the Journals, who expressed respect, gratitude, and regret, when he retired from the Chief Magistracy; and who refused to express either respect, gratitude, or regret. I shall not open those Journals. Publications more abusive or scurrilous never saw the light, than were sent forth against Washington, and all his leading measures, from presses South of New England. But I shall not look them up. I employ no scavengers; no one is in attendance on me, tendering such means of retaliation; and if there were, with an ass's load on them, with a bulk as huge as that which the gentleman himself has produced, I would not touch one of them. I see enough of the violence of our own times, to be no way anxious to rescue from forgetfulness the extravagancies of times past. Besides, what is all this to the present purpose? It has nothing to do with the public lands, in regard to which the attack was begun; and it has nothing to do with those sentiments and opinions, which, I have thought, tend to disunion, and all of which the honorable member seems to have adopted himself, and undertaken to defend. New England has, at times, so argues the gentleman, held opinions as dangerous as those which he now holds. Suppose this were so; why should he, therefore, abuse New England? If he finds himself countenanced by acts of hers, how is it that, while he relies on these acts, he covers, or seeks to cover, their authors with reproach? But, sir, if, in the course of forty years, there have been undue effervescences of party in New England, has the same thing happened no where else? Party animosity, and party outrage, not in New England, but elsewhere, denounced President Washington, not only as a Federalist, but as a Tory; a British agent; a man who, in his high office, sanctioned corruption! But does the honorable member suppose, that, if I had a tender here, who should put such an effusion of wickedness and folly in my hand, that I would stand up and read it against the South? Parties ran into great heats, again, in 1799 and 1800. What was said, sir, or rather what was not said, in those years, against John Adams, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and its admitted ablest defender on the floor of Congress? If the gentleman wishes to increase his stores of party abuse and frothy violence; if he has a determined proclivity to such pursuits; there are treasures of that sort south of the Potomac, much to his taste, yet untouched: I shall not touch them.

The parties which divided the country at the commencement of the late war, were violent. But, then, there was violence on both sides, and violence in every State. Minorities and majorities were equally violent. There was no more violence against the war in New England, than in other States; nor any more appearance of violence, except that, owing to a dense population, greater facility of assembling, and more presses, there may have been more in quantity, spoken and printed there, than in some other places. In the article of sermons, too, New England is somewhat more abundant than South Carolina; and, for that reason, the chance of finding here and there an exceptionable one, may be greater. I hope, too, there are more good ones. Opposition may have been more formidable in New England, as it embraced a larger portion of the whole population; but it was no more unrestrained in its principles, or violent in manner. The minorities dealt quite as harshly with their own State Governments as the majorities dealt with the administration here. There were presses on both sides, popular meetings on both sides, ay, and pulpits on both sides, also. The gentleman's purveyors have only catered for him among the productions of one side. I certainly shall not supply the deficiency by furnishing samples of the other. I leave to him, and to them, the whole concern.

It is enough for me to say, that if, in any part of this, their grateful occupation; if, in all their researches, they find any thing in the history of Massachusetts, or New England, or in the proceedings of any legislature, or other public body, disloyal to the Union, speaking slightly of its value, proposing to break it up, or recommending non-intercourse with neighboring States, on account of difference of political opinion, then, sir, I give them all up to the honorable gentleman's unrestrained rebuke; expecting, however, that he will extend his buffetings, in like manner, to all similar proceedings, wherever else to be found.

The gentleman, sir, has spoken at large of former parties, now no longer in being, by their received appellations, and has undertaken to instruct us, not only in the knowledge of their principles, but of their respective pedigrees also. He has ascended to the origin, and run out their genealogies. With most exemplary modesty, he speaks of the party to which he professes to have belonged himself, as the true pure, the only honest, patriotic party, derived by regular descent, from father to son, from the time of the virtuous Romans! Spreading before us the family tree of political parties, he takes especial care to show himself snugly perched on a popular bough! He is wakeful to the expediency of adopting such rules of descent as shall bring him in, in exclusion of others, as an heir to the inheritance of all public virtue, and all true political principles. His party, and his opinions, are sure to be orthodox; heterodoxy is confined to his opponents. He spoke, sir, of the federalists, and I thought I saw some eyes begin to open and stare a little, when he ventured on that ground. I expected he would draw his sketches rather lightly, when he looked on the circle round him, and especially if he should cast his thoughts to the high places out of the Senate. Nevertheless, he went back to Rome, ad annum urbe condita, and found the fathers of the federalists in the primeval aristocrats of that renowned empire! He traced the flow of federal blood down, through successive ages and centuries, till he brought it into the veins of the American Tories, (of whom, by the way, there were twenty in the Carolinas for one in Massachusetts.) From the Tories, he followed it to the federalists: and as the federal party was broken up, and there was no possibility of transmitting it further on this side of the Atlantic, he seems to have discovered that it has gone off, collaterally, though against all the canons of descent, into the ultras of France, and finally become extinguished, like exploded gas, among the adherents of Don Miguel! This, sir, is an abstract of the gentleman's history of federalism. I am not about to controvert it. It is not, at present, worth the pains of refutation; because, sir, if, at this day, any one feels the sin of federalism lying heavily on his conscience, he can easily obtain remission. He may even have an indulgence, if he be desirous of repeating the same transgression. It is an affair of no difficulty to get into this same right line of patriotic descent. A man, now-a-days, is at liberty to choose his political parentage. He may elect his own father. Federalist, or not, he may, if he choose, claim to belong to the favored stock, and his claim will be allowed. He may carry back his pretensions just as far as the honorable gentleman himself; nay, he may make himself out the honorable gentleman's own cousin, and prove, satisfactorily, that he is descended from the same political great grandfather. All this is allowable. We all know a process, sir, by which the whole Essex Junto could, in one hour, be all washed white from their ancient federalism, and come out, every one of them, an original democrat, dyed in the wool! Some of them have actually undergone the operation, and they say it is quite easy. The only inconvenience it occasions, as they tell us, is a slight tendency of the blood to the face, a soft suffusion, which however is very transient, since nothing is said by those whom they join, calculated to deepen the red on the cheek, but a prudent silence observed in regard to all the past. Indeed, sir, some smiles of approbation have been bestowed, and some crumbs of comfort have fallen, not a thousand miles from the door of the Hartford Convention itself. And if the author of the ordinance of 1787 possessed the other requisite qualifications, there is no knowing, notwithstanding his federalism, to what heights of favor he might not yet attain.

In carrying his warfare, such as it was, into New England, the honorable gentleman all along professes to be acting on the defensive. He elects to consider me as having assailed South Carolina, and insists that he comes forth only as her champion, and in her defence. Sir, [said Mr. W.] I do not admit that I made any attack whatever on South Carolina. Nothing like it. The honorable member, in his first speech, expressed opinions in regard to revenue, and some other topics, which I heard both with pain and with surprise. I told the gentleman that I was aware that such sentiments were entertained out of the Government, but had not expected to find them advanced in it; that I knew there were persons in the South who speak of our Union with indifference, or doubt, taking pains to magnify its evils, and to say nothing of its benefits; that the honorable member himself, I was sure, could never be one of these; and I regretted the expression of such opinions as he had avowed, because I thought their obvious tendency was to encourage feelings of disrespect to the Union, and to weaken its connexion. This, sir, is the sum and substance of all I said on the subject. And this constitutes the attack which called on the chivalry of the gentleman, in his opinion, to harry us with such a foray, among the party pamphlets and party proceedings of Massachusetts! If he means that I spoke with dissatisfaction or disrespect of the ebullitions of individuals in South Carolina, it is true. But, if he means that I had assailed the character of the State, her honor, or patriotism; that I had reflected on her history or her conduct; he had not the slightest ground for any such assumption. I did not even refer, I think, in my observations, to any collection of individuals. I said nothing of the recent conventions. I spoke in the most guarded and careful manner, and only expressed my regret for the publication of opinions which I presumed the honorable member disapproved as much as myself. In this it seems I was mistaken. I do not remember that the gentleman has disclaimed any sentiment, or any opinion, of a supposed anti-union tendency, which on all, or any of the recent occasions, has been expressed. The whole drift of his speech has been rather to prove that, in divers times and manners, sentiments equally liable to my objection have been promulgated in New England. And one would suppose that his object, in this reference to Massachusetts, was to find a precedent to justify proceedings in the South, were it not for the reproach and contumely with which he labors, all along, to load these, his own chosen precedents. By way of defending South Carolina from what he chooses to think an attack on her, he first quotes the example of Massachusetts, and then denounces that example in good set terms. This two-fold purpose, not very consistent with itself, one would think, was exhibited more than once in the course of his speech. He referred, for instance, to the Hartford Convention. Did he do this for authority, or for a topic of reproach? Apparently for both: for he told us that he should find no fault with the mere fact of holding such a convention, and considering and discussing such questions as he supposes were then and there discussed: but what rendered it obnoxious was the time in which it was holden, and the circumstances of the country, then existing. We were in war, he said, and the country needed all our aid; the hand of Government required to be strengthened, not weakened; and patriotism should have postponed such proceedings to another day. The thing itself, then, is a precedent; the time and manner of it only, a subject of censure. Now, sir, I go much further, on this point, than the honorable member. Supposing, as the gentleman seems to, that the Hartford Convention assembled for any such purpose as breaking up the Union, because they thought unconstitutional laws had been passed, or to consult on that subject, or to calculate the value of the Union; supposing this to be their purpose, or any part of it, then I say the meeting itself was disloyal, and was obnoxious to censure, whether held in time of peace or time of war, or under whatever circumstances. The material question is the object. Is dissolution the object? If it be, external circumstances may make it a more or less aggravated case, but cannot affect the principle. I do not hold, therefore, sir, that the Hartford Convention was pardonable, even to the extent of the gentleman's admission, if its objects were really such as have been imputed to it. Sir, there never was a time, under any degree of excitement, in which the Hartford Convention, or any other convention, could maintain itself one moment in New England, if assembled for any such purpose as the gentleman says would have been an allowable purpose. To hold conventions to decide questions of constitutional law! To try the binding validity of statutes, by votes in a convention! Sir, the Hartford Convention, I presume, would not desire that the honorable gentleman should be their defender or advocate, if he puts their case upon such untenable and extravagant grounds.

Then, sir, the gentleman has no fault to find with these recently promulgated South Carolina opinions. And, certainly, he need have none: for his own sentiments, as now advanced, and advanced on reflection, as far as I have been able to comprehend them, go the full length of all these opinions. I propose, sir, to say something on these, and to consider how far they are just and constitutional. Before doing that, however, let me observe, that the eulogium pronounced on the character of the State of South Carolina, by the honorable gentleman, for her revolutionary and other merits, meets my hearty concurrence. I shall not acknowledge that the honorable member goes before me in regard for whatever of distinguished talent, or distinguished character, South Carolina has produced. I claim part of the honor, I partake in the pride of her great names. I claim them for countrymen, one and all. The Laurenses, the Rutledges, the Pinckneys, the Sumpters, the Marions—Americans all—whose fame is no more to be hemmed in by State lines, than their talents and patriotism were capable of being circumscribed within the same narrow limits. In their day and generation, they served and honored the country, and the whole country; and their renown is of the treasures of the whole country. Him, whose honored name the gentleman himself bears—does he suppose me less capable of gratitude for his patriotism, or sympathy for his sufferings, than if his eyes had first opened upon the light in Massachusetts, instead of South Carolina? Sir, does he suppose it in his power to exhibit a Carolina name so bright as to produce envy in my bosom? No, sir, increased gratification and delight, rather. Sir, I thank God that, if I am gifted with little of the spirit which is able to raise mortals to the skies, I have yet none, as I trust, of that other spirit, which would drag angels down. When I shall be found, sir, in my place, here in the Senate, or elsewhere, to sneer at public merit, because it happened to spring up beyond the little limits of my own State or neighborhood; when I refuse, for any such cause, or for any cause, the homage due to American talent, to elevated patriotism, to sincere devotion to liberty and the country; or if I see an uncommon endowment of heaven—if I see extraordinary capacity and virtue in any son of the South—and if, moved by local prejudice, or gangrened by State jealousy, I get up here to abate the title of a hair from his just character and just fame, may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth!

Sir, let me recur to pleasing recollections; let me indulge in refreshing remembrance of the past; let me remind you that, in early times, no States cherished greater harmony, both of principle and feeling, than Massachusetts and South Carolina. Would to God, that harmony might again return! Shoulder to shoulder they went through the Revolution—hand in hand they stood round the administration of Washington, and felt his own great arm lean on them for support. Unkind feeling, if it exist; alienation and distrust are the growth, unnatural to such soils, of false principles since sown. They are weeds, the seeds of which that same great arm never scattered.

I shall enter on no encomiums upon Massachusetts; she needs none. There she is; behold her, and judge for yourselves. There is her history; the world knows it by heart. The past, at least, is secure. There is Boston, and Concord, and Lexington, and Bunker Hill; and there they will remain forever. The bones of her sons, fallen in the great struggle for Independence, now lie mingled with the soil of every State, from New England to Georgia; and there they will lie forever. And, sir, where American liberty raised its infant voice; and where its youth was nurtured and sustained; there it still lives, in the strength of its manhood, and full of its original spirit. If discord and disunion shall wound it; if party strife and blind ambition shall hawk at and tear it; if folly and madness; if uneasiness, under salutary and necessary restraint, shall succeed to separate it from that Union, by which alone its existence is made sure, it will stand, in the end, by the side of that cradle in which its infancy was rocked; it will stretch forth its arm, with whatever of vigor it may still retain, over the friends who may gather round it; and it will fall at last, if fall it must, amidst the proudest monuments of its own glory, and on the very spot of its origin.

There yet remains to be performed, [said Mr. W.] by far the most grave and important duty, which I feel to be devolved on me, by this occasion. It is to state, and to defend, what I conceive to be the true principles of the constitution under which we are here assembled. I might well have desired that so weighty a task should have fallen into other and abler hands. I could have wished that it should have been executed by those, whose character and experience give weight and influence to their opinions, such as cannot possibly belong to mine. But, sir, I have met the occasion, not sought it; and I shall proceed to state my own sentiments, without challenging for them any particular regard, with studied plainness, and as much precision as possible.

I understand the honorable gentleman from South Carolina to maintain, that it is a right of the State Legislatures to interfere, whenever, in their judgment, this Government transcends its constitutional limits, and to arrest the operation of its laws.

I understand him to maintain this right, as a right existing under the constitution; not as a right to overthrow it, on the ground of extreme necessity, such as would justify violent revolution.

I understand him to maintain an authority, on the part of the States, thus to interfere, for the purpose of correcting the exercise of power by the General Government, of checking it, and of compelling it to conform to their opinion of the extent of its powers.

I understand him to maintain that the ultimate power of judging of the constitutional extent of its own authority is not lodged exclusively in the General Government, or any branch of it; but that, on the contrary, the States may lawfully decide for themselves, and each State for itself, whether, in a given case, the act of the General Government transcends its power.

I understand him to insist that, if the exigency of the case, in the opinion of any State Government, require it, such State Government may, by its own sovereign authority, annul an act of the General Government, which it deems plainly and palpably unconstitutional.

This is the sum of what I understand from him to be the South Carolina doctrine; and the doctrine which he maintains. I propose to consider it, and to compare it with the constitution. Allow me to say, as a preliminary remark, that I call this the South Carolina doctrine, only because the gentleman himself has so denominated it. I do not feel at liberty to say that South Carolina, as a State, has ever advanced these sentiments. I hope she has not, and never may. That a great majority of her people are opposed to the tariff laws is doubtless true. That a majority, somewhat less than that just mentioned, conscientiously believe those laws unconstitutional, may probably also be true. But, that any majority holds to the right of direct State interference, at State discretion, the right of nullifying acts of Congress by acts of State legislation, is more than I know, and what I shall be slow to believe.

That there are individuals, besides the honorable gentleman, who do maintain these opinions, is quite certain. I recollect the recent expression of a sentiment, which circumstances attending its utterance and publication justify us in supposing was not unpremeditated. "The sovereignty of the State—never to be controlled, construed, or decided on, but by her own feelings of honorable justice."

[Mr. HAYNE here rose, and said that, for the purpose of being clearly understood, he would state, that his proposition was in the words of the Virginia resolution, as follows:

"That this Assembly doth explicitly and peremptorily declare, that it views the powers of the Federal Government as resulting from the compact, to which the States are parties, as limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, as no farther valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that compact; and that, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the States who are parties thereto have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose, for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them."]

Mr. WEBSTER resumed: I am quite aware of the existence of the resolution which the gentleman read, and has now repeated, and that he relies on it as his authority. I know the source, too, from which it is understood to have proceeded. I need not say that I have much respect for the constitutional opinions of Mr. Madison; they would weigh greatly with me, always. But, before the authority of his opinion be vouched for the gentleman's proposition, it will be proper to consider what is the fair interpretation of that resolution to which Mr. Madison is understood to have given his sanction. As the gentleman construes it, it is an authority for him. Possibly, he may not have adopted the right construction. That resolution declares, that, in the case of the dangerous exercise of powers not granted to the General Government, the States may interpose to arrest the progress of the evil. But how interpose, and what does this declaration purport? Does it mean no more than that there may be extreme cases, in which the people, in any mode of assembling, may resist usurpation, and relieve themselves from a tyrannical government? No one will deny this. Such resistance is not only acknowledged to be just in America, but in England, also. Blackstone admits as much, in his theory, and practice, too, of the English constitution. We, sir, who oppose the Carolina doctrine, do not deny that the people may, if they choose, throw off any government when it becomes oppressive and intolerable, and erect a better in its stead. We all know that civil institutions are established for the public benefit, and that, when they cease to answer the ends of their existence, they may be changed. But I do not understand the doctrine now contended for to be that which, for the sake of distinctness, we may call the right of revolution. I understand the gentleman to maintain, that, without revolution, without civil commotion, without rebellion, a remedy for supposed abuse and transgression of the powers of the General Government lies in a direct appeal to the interference of the State Governments. [Mr. HAYNE here rose: He did not contend, he said, for the mere right of revolution, but for the right of constitutional resistance. What he maintained was, that, in case of plain, palpable violation of the constitution, by the General Government, a State may interpose; and that this interposition is constitutional.] Mr. W. resumed: So, sir, I understood the gentleman, and am happy to find that I did not misunderstand him. What he contends for, is, that it is constitutional to interrupt the administration of the constitution itself, in the hands of those who are chosen and sworn to administer it, by the direct interference, in form of law, of the States, in virtue of their sovereign capacity. The inherent right in the people to reform their government, I do not deny; and they have another right, and that is, to resist unconstitutional laws, without overturning the Government. It is no doctrine of mine, that unconstitutional laws bind the people. The great question is, whose prerogative is it to decide on the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the laws? On that, the main debate hinges. The proposition, that, in case of a supposed violation of the constitution by Congress, the States have a constitutional right to interfere, and annul the law of Congress, is the proposition of the gentleman: I do not admit it. If the gentleman had intended no more than to assert the right of revolution, for justifiable cause, he would have said only what all agree to. But I cannot conceive that there can be a middle course, between submission to the laws, when regularly pronounced constitutional, on the one hand, and open resistance, which is revolution, or rebellion, on the other. I say, the right of a State to annul a law of Congress, cannot be maintained but on the ground of the unalienable right of man to resist oppression; that is to say, upon the ground of revolution. I admit that there is an ultimate violent remedy, above the constitution, and in defiance of the constitution, which may be resorted to, when a revolution is to be justified. But I do not admit that, under the constitution, and in conformity with it, there is any mode in which a State Government, as a member of the Union, can interfere and stop the progress of the General Government, by force of her own laws, under any circumstances whatever.

This leads us to inquire into the origin of this Government, and the source of its power. Whose agent is it? Is

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

it the creature of the State Legislatures, or the creature of the people? If the Government of the United States be the agent of the State Governments, then they may control it, provided they can agree in the manner of controlling it; if it be the agent of the people, then the people alone can control it, restrain it, modify, or reform it. It is observable enough, that the doctrine for which the honorable gentleman contends leads him to the necessity of maintaining, not only that this General Government is the creature of the States, but that it is the creature of each of the States, severally; so that each may assert the power, for itself, of determining whether it acts within the limits of its authority. It is the servant of four and twenty masters, of different wills and different purposes, and yet bound to obey all. This absurdity (for it seems no less) arises from a misconception as to the origin of this Government in its true character. It is, sir, the people's constitution, the people's Government; made for the people; made by the people; and answerable to the people. The people of the United States have declared that this constitution shall be the supreme law. We must either admit the proposition, or dispute their authority. The States are, unquestionably, sovereign, so far as their sovereignty is not affected by this supreme law. But the State Legislatures, as political bodies, however sovereign, are yet not sovereign over the people. So far as the people have given power to the General Government, so far the grant is unquestionably good, and the Government holds of the people, and not of the State Governments. We are all agents of the same supreme power, the people. The General Government and the State Governments derive their authority from the same source. Neither can, in relation to the other, be called primary, though one is definite and restricted, and the other general and residuary. The National Government possesses those powers which it can be shown the people have conferred on it, and no more. All the rest belongs to the State Governments or to the people themselves. So far as the people have restrained State sovereignty, by the expression of their will, in the constitution of the United States, so far, it must be admitted, State sovereignty is effectually controlled. I do not contend that it is, or ought to be, controlled farther. The sentiment to which I have referred, propounds that State sovereignty is only to be controlled by its own "feeling of justice;" that is to say, that it is not to be controlled at all: for one who is to follow his own feelings is under no legal control. Now, however men may think this ought to be, the fact is, that the people of the United States have chosen to impose control on State sovereignties. There are those, doubtless, who wish they had been left without restraint; but the constitution has ordered the matter differently. To make war, for instance, is an exercise of sovereignty; but the constitution declares that no State shall make war. To coin money is another exercise of sovereign power; but no State is at liberty to coin money. Again, the constitution says that no sovereign State shall be so sovereign as to make a treaty. These prohibitions, it must be confessed, are a control on the State sovereignty of South Carolina, as well as of the other States, which does not arise "from her own feelings of honorable justice." Such an opinion, therefore, is in defiance of the plainest provisions of the constitution.

There are other proceedings of public bodies which have already been alluded to, and to which I refer again, for the purpose of ascertaining more fully what is the length and breadth of that doctrine, denominated the Carolina doctrine, which the honorable gentleman has now stood up on this floor to maintain. In one of them I find it resolved, that "the tariff of 1828, and every other tariff designed to promote one branch of industry at the expense of others, is contrary to the meaning and intention of the Federal compact; and, as such, a dangerous, palpable, and deliberate usurpation of power, by a determined majority, wielding the General Government beyond the limits of its delegated powers, as calls upon the States which compose the suffering minority, in their sovereign capacity, to exercise the powers which, as sovereigns, necessarily devolve upon them, when their compact is violated."

Observe, sir, that this resolution holds the tariff of 1828, and every other tariff, designed to promote one branch of industry at the expense of another, to be such a dangerous, palpable, and deliberate usurpation of power, as calls upon the States, in their sovereign capacity, to interfere by their own authority. This denunciation, you will please to observe, includes our old tariff, of 1816, as well as all others; because that was established to promote the interest of the manufacturers of cotton, to the manifest and admitted injury of the Calcutta cotton trade. Observe again, that all the qualifications are here rehearsed and charged upon the tariff, which are necessary to bring the case within the gentleman's proposition. The tariff is a usurpation; it is a dangerous usurpation; it is a palpable usurpation; it is a deliberate usurpation. It is such a usurpation, therefore, as calls upon the States to exercise their right of interference. Here is a case, then, within the gentleman's principles, and all his qualifications of his principles. It is a case for action. The constitution is plainly, dangerously, palpably, and deliberately violated; and the States must interpose their own authority to arrest the law. Let us suppose the State of South Carolina to express this same opinion, by the voice of her Legislature. That would be very imposing; but what then? Is the voice of one State conclusive? It so happens that, at the very moment when South Carolina resolves that the tariff laws are unconstitutional, Pennsylvania and Kentucky resolve exactly the reverse. They hold those laws to be both highly proper and strictly constitutional. And now, sir, how does the honorable member propose to deal with this case? How does he relieve us from this difficulty, upon any principle of his? His construction gets us into it; how does he propose to get us out?

In Carolina, the tariff is a palpable, deliberate usurpation; Carolina, therefore, may nullify it, and refuse to pay the duties. In Pennsylvania, it is both clearly constitutional, and highly expedient; and there, the duties are to be paid. And yet we live under a Government of uniform laws, and under a constitution, too, which contains an express provision, as it happens, that all duties shall be equal in all the States! Does not this approach absurdity?

If there be no power to settle such questions, independent of either of the States, is not the whole Union a rope of sand? Are we not thrown back again, precisely upon the old Confederation?

It is too plain to be argued. Four and twenty interpreters of constitutional law, each with a power to decide for itself, and none with authority to bind any body else, and this constitutional law the only bond of their union! What is such a state of things, but a mere connexion during pleasure; or, to use the phraseology of the times, during feeling? And that feeling, too, not the feeling of the people who established the constitution, but the feeling of the State Governments.

In another of the South Carolina addresses, having premised that the crisis requires "all the concentrated energy of passion," an attitude of open resistance to the laws of the Union is advised. Open resistance to the laws, then, is the constitutional remedy, the conservative power of the State, which the South Carolina doctrines teach, for the redress of political evils, real or imaginary. And its authors further say, that, appealing with confidence to the constitution itself, to justify their opinions, they cannot consent to try their accuracy by the courts of justice. In one sense, indeed, sir, [said Mr. W.] this is assuming an attitude of open resistance in favor of liberty. But what sort of liberty? The liberty of establishing their own opinions, in defiance of the opinions of all others; the liberty of judging and deciding exclusively themselves, in a matter in which others have as much right to judge and decide as they; the liberty of placing their own opinions above the judgment of all others, above the laws, and above the constitution. This is their liberty; and this is the fair result of the proposition contended for by the honorable gentleman. Or, it may be more properly said, it is identical with it, rather than a result from it.

In the same publication, we find the following: "Previously to our Revolution, when the arm of oppression was stretched over New England, where did our Northern brethren meet with a braver sympathy than that which sprang from the bosoms of Carolinians? We had no extortion, no oppression, no collision with the King's ministers, no navigation interests springing up in envious rivalry of England."

This seems extraordinary language. South Carolina no collision with the King's ministers in 1775! No extortion! No oppression! But, sir, it is, also, most significant language. Does any man doubt the purpose for which it was penned? Can any one fail to see that it was designed to raise in the reader's mind the question, whether, at this time—that is to say, in 1828, South Carolina has any collision with the King's ministers, any oppression, or extortion, to fear from England? Whether, in short, England is not as naturally the friend of South Carolina, as New England, with her navigation interests springing up in envious rivalry of England?

Is it not strange, sir, that an intelligent man in South Carolina, in 1828, should thus labor to prove, that, in 1775, there was no hostility, no cause of war between South Carolina and England? That she had no occasion, in reference to her own interest, or from a regard to her own welfare, to take up arms in the revolutionary contest? Can any one account for the expression of such strange sentiments, and their circulation through the State, otherwise than by supposing the object to be, what I have already intimated, to raise the question, if they had no "collision" (mark the expression) with the ministers of King George the third, in 1775, what collision have they in 1828, with the ministers of King George the fourth? What is there now, in the existing state of things, to separate Carolina from Old, more, or rather, than from New England?

Resolutions, sir, have been recently passed by the Legislature of South Carolina. I need not refer to them: they go no farther than the honorable gentleman himself has gone, and, I hope, not so far. I content myself, therefore, with debating the matter with him.

And now, sir, what I have first to say on this subject is, that at no time, and under no circumstances, has New England, or any State in New England, or any respectable body of persons in New England, or any public man of standing in New England, put forth such a doctrine as this Carolina doctrine.

The gentleman has found no case, he can find none, to support his own opinions by New England authority. New England has studied the constitution in other schools, and under other teachers. She looks upon it with other regards, and deems more highly and reverently, both of its just authority, and its utility and excellence. The history of her legislative proceedings may be traced; the ephemeral effusions of temporary bodies, called together by the excitement of the occasion, may be hunted up—they have been hunted up. The opinions and votes of her public men, in and out of Congress, may be explored; it will all be in vain. The Carolina doctrine can derive from her neither countenance nor support. She rejects it now; she always did reject it; and till she loses her senses, she always will reject it. The honorable member has referred to expressions on the subject of the embargo law, made in this place by an honorable and venerable gentleman, [Mr. Hillhouse] now favoring us with his presence. He quotes that distinguished Senator as saying, that, in his judgment, the embargo law was unconstitutional, and that, therefore, in his opinion, the people were not bound to obey it. That, sir, is perfectly constitutional language. An unconstitutional law is not binding; but then it does not rest with a resolution, or a law of a State Legislature, to decide whether an act of Congress be, or be not, constitutional. An unconstitutional act of Congress would not bind the people of this District, although they have no Legislature to interfere in their behalf; and, on the other hand, a constitutional law of Congress does bind the citizens of every State, although all their Legislatures should undertake to annul it, by act or resolution. The venerable Connecticut Senator is a constitutional lawyer, of sound principles, and enlarged knowledge; a statesman, practised and experienced; bred in the company of Washington, and holding just views upon the nature of our Governments. He believed the embargo unconstitutional, and so did others; but what then? Who, did he suppose, was to decide that question? The State Legislatures? Certainly not. No such sentiment ever escaped his lips. Let us follow up, sir, this New England opposition to the embargo laws; let us trace it till we discern the principle which controlled and governed New England, throughout the whole course of that opposition. We shall then see what similarity there is between the New England school of constitutional opinions, and this modern Carolina school. The gentleman, I think, read a petition from some single individual, addressed to the Legislature of Massachusetts, asserting the Carolina doctrine—that is, the right of State interference to arrest the laws of the Union. The fate of that petition shows the sentiments of the Legislature. It met no favor. The opinions of Massachusetts were otherwise. They had been expressed in 1798, in answer to the resolutions of Virginia, and she did not depart from them, nor bend them to the times. Misgoverned, wronged, oppressed, as she felt herself to be, she still held fast her integrity to the Union. The gentleman may find in her proceedings much evidence of dissatisfaction with the measures of the Government, and great and deep dislike to the embargo; all this makes the case so much the stronger for her: for, notwithstanding all this dissatisfaction and dislike, she claimed no right, still, to sever asunder the bonds of the Union. There was heat, and there was anger, in her political feelings. Be it so; her heat or her anger did not, nevertheless, betray her into infidelity to the Government. The gentleman labors to prove that she disliked the embargo; as much as South Carolina dislikes the tariff, and expressed her dislike as strongly. Be it so; but did she propose the Carolina remedy? Did she threaten to interfere, by State authority, to annul the laws of the Union? That is the question for the gentleman's consideration.

No doubt, sir, a great majority of the people of New England conscientiously believed the embargo law, of 1807, unconstitutional; as conscientiously, certainly, as the people of South Carolina hold that opinion of the tariff. They reasoned thus: Congress has power to regulate commerce; but here is a law, they said, stopping all commerce, and stopping it indefinitely. The law is perpetual; that is, it is not limited in point of time, and must, of course, continue until it shall be repealed by some other law. It is as perpetual, therefore, as the law against treason or murder. Now, is this regulating commerce, or destroying it? Is it guiding, controlling, giving the rule to commerce, as a subsisting thing, or is it putting an end to it altogether? Nothing is more certain than that a majority in New England deemed this law a violation of the constitution. The very case required by the gentleman, to justify State interference, had then arisen. Massachusetts believed this law to be "a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of a power not granted by the constitution." Deliberate it was, for it was long continued; palpable she thought it, as no words in the constitution gave the power, and only a construction, in her opinion most violent, raised it; dangerous it was, since it threatened utter ruin to her most important interests. Here, then, was a Carolina case. How did Massachusetts deal with it? It was, as she thought, a plain, manifest, palpable violation of the constitution; and it brought ruin to her doors. Thousands of families, and hundreds of thousands of individuals, were beggared by it. While she saw and felt all this, she saw and felt also, that, as a measure of national policy, it was perfectly futile; that the country was no way benefited by that which caused so much individual distress; that it was efficient only for the production of evil, and all that evil inflicted on ourselves. In such a case, under such circumstances, how did Massachusetts demean herself? Sir, she remonstrated, she memorialized, she addressed herself to the General Government, not exactly "with the concentrated energy of passion," but with her own strong sense, and the energy of sober conviction. But she did not interpose the arm of her own power to arrest the law and break the embargo. Far from it. Her principles bound her to two things; and she followed her principles, lead where they might. First, to submit to every constitutional law of Congress; and secondly, if the constitutional validity of the law be doubted, to refer that question to the decision of the proper tribunals. The first principle is vain and ineffectual without the second. A majority of us in New England believed the embargo law unconstitutional; but the great question was, and always will be, in such cases, who is to decide this? Who is to judge between the people and the Government? And, sir, it is quite plain, that the constitution of the United States confers on the Government itself, to be exercised by its appropriate department, and under its own responsibility to the people, this power of deciding ultimately and conclusively upon the just extent of its own authority. If this had not been done, we should not have advanced a single step beyond the old confederation.

Being fully of opinion that the embargo law was unconstitutional, the people of New England were yet equally clear in the opinion—it was a matter they did not doubt upon—that the question, after all, must be decided by the judicial tribunals of the United States. Before those tribunals, therefore, they brought the question. Under the provisions of the law, they had given bonds, to millions in amount, and which were alleged to be forfeited. They suffered the bonds to be sued, and thus raised the question. In the old fashioned way of settling disputes, they went to law. The case came to hearing, and solemn argument; and he who espoused their cause, and stood up for them against the validity of the embargo act, was none other than that great man, of whom the gentleman has made honorable mention—Samuel Dexter. He was then, sir, in the fulness of his knowledge and the maturity of his strength. He had retired from long and distinguished public service here, to the renewed pursuit of professional duties; carrying with him all that enlargement and expansion, all the new strength and force, which an acquaintance with the more general subjects discussed in the National Councils is capable of adding to professional attainment in a mind of true greatness and comprehension. He was a lawyer, and he was also a statesman. He had studied the constitution, when he filled a public station, that he might defend it; he had examined its principles, that he might maintain them. More than all men, or at least as much as any man, he was attached to the General Government and to the union of the States. His feelings and opinions all ran in that direction. A question of constitutional law, too, was, of all subjects, that one which was best suited to his talents and learning. Aloof from technicality, and unfettered by artificial rules, such a question gave opportunity for that deep and clear analysis, that mighty grasp of principle, which so much distinguished his higher efforts. His very statement was argument; his inference seemed demonstration. The earnestness of his own conviction wrought conviction in others. One was convinced, and believed, and assented, because it was gratifying, delightful, to think, and feel, and believe, in unison with an intellect of such evident superiority.

Mr. Dexter, sir, such as I have described him, argued the New England cause. He put into his effort his whole heart, as well as all the powers of his understanding: for he had avowed, in the most public manner, his entire concurrence with his neighbors on the point in dispute. He argued the cause: it was lost—and New England submitted. The established tribunals pronounced the law constitutional, and New England acquiesced. Now, sir, is not this the exact opposite of the doctrine of the gentleman from South Carolina? According to him, instead of referring to the judicial tribunals, we should have broken up the embargo, by laws of our own; we should have repealed it, quoad New England; for we had a strong, palpable, and oppressive case. Sir, we believed the embargo unconstitutional; but still, that was matter of opinion, and who was to decide it? We thought it a clear case; but, nevertheless, we did not take the law into our own hands, because we did not wish to bring about a revolution, nor to break up the Union: for, I maintain, that, between submission to the decision of the constituted tribunals, and revolution, or disunion, there is no middle ground; there is no ambiguous condition, half allegiance, and half rebellion. And, sir, how futile, how very futile, it is, to admit the right of State interference, and then attempt to save it from the character of unlawful resistance, by adding terms of qualification to the causes and occasions, leaving all these qualifications, like the case itself, in the discretion of the State Governments. It must be a clear case, it is said; a deliberate case; a palpable case; a dangerous case. But, then, the State is still left at liberty to decide for herself what is clear, what is deliberate, what is palpable, what is dangerous. Do adjectives and epithets avail any thing? Sir, the human mind is so constituted that the merits of both sides of a controversy appear very clear and very palpable to those who respectively espouse them; and both sides usually grow clearer, as the controversy advances. South Carolina sees unconstitutionality in the tariff; she sees oppression there, also; and she sees danger. Pennsylvania, with a vision not less sharp, looks at the same tariff, and sees no such thing in it; she sees it all constitutional, all useful, all safe. The faith of South Carolina is strengthened by opposition, and she now not only sees, but resolves, that the tariff is palpably unconstitutional, oppressive, and dangerous: but Pennsylvania, not to be behind her neighbors, and equally willing to strengthen her own faith by a confident asseveration, resolves, also, and gives to every warm affirmative of South Carolina, a plain, downright, Pennsylvania negative. South Carolina, to show the strength and unity of her opinion, brings her Assembly to a unanimity, within seven voices; Pennsylvania, not to be outdone in this respect more than others, reduces her dissentient fraction to a single vote. Now, sir, again I ask the gentleman, what is to be done? Are these States both right? Is he bound to consider them both right? If not, which is in the wrong? or rather, which has the best right to decide? And if he, and if I, are not to know what the constitution means, and what it is, till those two State Legislatures and the twenty-two others shall agree in its construction, what have we sworn to, when we have sworn to maintain it? I was forcibly struck, sir, with one reflection, as the gentleman went on in his speech. He quoted Mr. Madison's resolutions to prove that a State may interfere, in a case of deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of a power not granted. The honorable member supposes the tariff law to be such an exercise of power; and that, consequently, a case has arisen in which the State may, if it see fit, interfere by its own law. Now it so happens, nevertheless, that Mr. Madison himself deems this same tariff law quite constitutional. Instead of a clear and palpable violation, it is, in his judgment, no violation at all. So that, while they use his authority for a hypothetical case, they reject it in the very case before them. All this, sir, shows the inherent futility—I had almost used a stronger word—of conceding this power of interference to the States, and then attempting to secure it from abuse by imposing qualifications, of which the States themselves are to judge. One of two things is true; either the laws of the Union are beyond the discretion and beyond the control of the States, or else we have no constitution of General Government, and are thrust back again to the days of the confederacy.

Let me here say, sir, that, if the gentleman's doctrine had been received and acted upon in New England, in the times of the embargo and non-intercourse, we should probably not now have been here. The Government would, very likely, have gone to pieces, and crumbled into dust. No stronger case can ever arise than existed under those laws; no States can ever entertain a clearer conviction than the New England States then entertained; and if they had been under the influence of that heresy of opinion, as I must call it, which the honorable member espouses, this Union would, in all probability, have been scattered to the four winds. I ask the gentleman, therefore, to apply his principles to that case; I ask him to come forth and declare, whether, in his opinion, the New England States would have been justified in interfering to break up the embargo system, under the conscientious opinions which they held upon it? Had they a right to annul that law? Does he admit or deny? If that which is thought palpably unconstitutional in South Carolina, justifies that State in arresting the progress of the law, tell me, whether that which was thought palpably unconstitutional also in Massachusetts, would have justified her in doing the same thing? Sir, I deny the whole doctrine. It has not a foot of ground in the constitution to stand on. No public man of reputation ever advanced it in Massachusetts, in the warmest times, or could maintain himself upon it there at any time.

I wish now, sir, to make a remark upon the Virginia resolutions of 1798. I cannot undertake to say how these resolutions were understood by those who passed them. Their language is not a little indefinite. In the case of the exercise, by Congress, of a dangerous power, not granted to them, the resolutions assert the right, on the part of the State, to interfere, and arrest the progress of the evil. This is susceptible of more than one interpretation. It may mean no more than that the States may interfere by complaint and remonstrance; or by proposing to the people an alteration of the Federal constitution. This would all be quite unobjectionable; or, it may be, that no more is meant than to assert the general right of revolution, as against all governments, in cases of intolerable oppression. This no one doubts; and this, in my opinion, is all that he who framed the resolutions could have meant by it: for I shall not readily believe that he was ever of opinion that a State, under the constitution, and in conformity with it, could, upon the ground of her own opinion of its unconstitutionality, however clear and palpable she might think the case, annul a law of Congress, so far as it should operate on herself, by her own Legislative power.

I must now beg to ask, sir, whence is this supposed right of the States derived? Where do they find the power to interfere with the laws of the Union? Sir, the opinion which the honorable gentleman maintains, is a notion founded on a total misapprehension, in my judgment, of the origin of this Government, and of the foundation on which it stands. I hold it to be a popular Government, erected by the people; those who administer it, responsible to the people; and itself capable of being amended and modified, just as the people may choose it should be. It is as popular, just as truly emanating from the people, as the State Governments. It is created for one purpose; the State Governments for another. It has its own powers; they have theirs. There is no more authority with them to arrest the operation of a law of Congress, than with Congress to arrest the operation of their laws. We are here to administer a constitution emanating immediately from the people, and trusted, by them, to our administration. It is not the creature of the State Governments. It is of no moment to the argument, that certain acts of the State Legislatures are necessary to fill our seats in this body. That is not one of their original State powers—a part of the sovereignty of the State. It is a duty which the people, by the constitution itself, have imposed on the State Legislatures; and which they might have left to be performed elsewhere if they had seen fit. So they have left the choice of President with electors; but all this does not affect the proposition that this whole Government—President, Senate, and House of Representatives—is a popular Government. It leaves it still all its popular character. The Governor of a State (in some of the States) is chosen, not directly by the people, but by those who are chosen by the people, for the purpose of performing, among other duties, that of electing a Governor. Is the Government of a State, on that account, not a popular Government? This Government, sir, is the independent offspring of the popular will. It is not the creature of State Legislatures. Nay, more, if the whole truth must be told, the people brought it into existence, established it, and have hitherto supported it, for the very purpose, amongst others, of imposing certain salutary restraints on State sovereignties. The States cannot now make war; they cannot contract alliances; they cannot make, each for itself, separate regulations of commerce; they cannot lay imposts; they cannot coin money. If this constitution, sir, be the creature of State Legislatures, it must be admitted that it has obtained a strange control over the volitions of its creators.

The people, then, sir, erected this Government. They gave it a constitution; and in that constitution they have enumerated the powers which they bestow on it. They have made it a limited Government. They have defined its authority. They have restrained it to the exercise of such powers as are granted; and all others, they declare, are reserved to the States or to the people. But, sir, they have not stopped here. If they had, they would have accomplished but half their work. No definition can be so clear as to avoid possibility of doubt; no limitation so precise, as to exclude all uncertainty. Who then shall construe this grant of the people? Who shall interpret their will, where it may be supposed they have left it doubtful? With whom do they repose this ultimate right of deciding on the powers of the Government? Sir, they have settled all this in the fullest manner. They have left it with the Government itself, in its appropriate branches. Sir, the very chief end, the main design, for which the whole constitution was framed and adopted was, to establish a Government that should not be obliged to act through State agency, or depend on State opinion and State discretion. The people had had quite enough of that kind of government, under the Confederacy. Under that system, the legal action, the application of law to individuals, belonged exclusively to the States. Congress could only recommend; their acts were not of binding force, till the States had adopted and sanctioned them. Are we in that condition still? Are we yet at the mercy of State discretion, and State construction? Sir, if we are, then vain will be our attempt to maintain the constitution under which we sit. But, sir, the people have wisely provided, in the constitution itself, a proper, suitable mode and tribunal for settling questions of constitutional law. There are, in the constitution, grants of powers to Congress, and restrictions on these powers. There are, also, prohibitions on

Mr. Foote's Resolution.

the States. Some authority must, therefore, necessarily exist, having the ultimate jurisdiction to fix and ascertain the interpretation of these grants, restrictions, and prohibitions. The constitution has, itself, pointed out, ordained, and established, that authority. How has it accomplished this great and essential end? By declaring, sir, that "the constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land, any thing in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

This, sir, was the first great step. By this, the supremacy of the constitution and laws of the United States is declared. The people so will it. No State law is to be valid which comes in conflict with the constitution or any law of the United States. But who shall decide this question of interference? To whom lies the last appeal? This, sir, the constitution itself decides also, by declaring "that the judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States." These two provisions, sir, cover the whole ground. They are, in truth, the key-stone of the arch. With these, it is a constitution; without them, it is a confederacy. In pursuance of these clear and express provisions, Congress established, at its very first session, in the Judicial Act, a mode for carrying them into full effect, and for bringing all questions of constitutional power to the final decision of the Supreme Court. It then, sir, became a Government. It then had the means of self protection; and, but for this, it would, in all probability, have been now among things which are past. Having constituted the Government, and declared its powers, the people have farther said, that, since somebody must decide on the extent of these powers, the Government shall itself decide; subject, always, like other popular governments, to its responsibility to the people. And now, sir, I repeat, how is it that a State Legislature acquires any power to interfere? Who or what gives them the right to say to the people, "we, who are your agents and servants for one purpose, will undertake to decide that your other agents and servants, appointed by you for another purpose, have transcended the authority you gave them?" The reply would be, I think, not impertinent: "Who made you a judge over another's servants? To their own masters they stand or fall."

Sir, I deny this power of State Legislatures altogether. It cannot stand the test of examination. Gentlemen may say that, in an extreme case, a State Government might protect the people from intolerable oppression. Sir, in such a case, the people might protect themselves, without the aid of the State Governments. Such a case warrants revolution. It must make, when it comes, a law for itself. A nullifying act of a State Legislature cannot alter the case, nor make resistance any more lawful. In maintaining these sentiments, sir, I am but asserting the rights of the people. I state what they have declared, and insist on their right to declare it. They have chosen to repose this power in the General Government, and I think it my duty to support it, like other constitutional powers.

For myself, sir, I do not admit the jurisdiction of South Carolina, or any other State, to prescribe my constitutional duty, or to settle, between me and the people, the validity of laws of Congress, for which I have voted. I decline her umpirage. I have not sworn to support the constitution according to her construction of its clauses. I have not stipulated, by my oath of office, or otherwise, to come under any responsibility, except to the people, and those whom they have appointed to pass upon the question, whether laws, supported by my votes, conform to the constitution of the country. And, sir, if we look to the general nature of the case, could any thing have been more preposterous than to make a government for the whole Union, and yet leave its powers subject, not to one interpretation, but to thirteen, or twenty-four, interpretations? Instead of one tribunal, established by all, responsible to all, with power to decide for all, shall constitutional questions be left to four and twenty popular bodies, each at liberty to decide for itself, and none bound to respect the decisions of others; and each at liberty, too, to give a new construction on every new election of its own members? Would any thing, with such a principle in it, or rather with such a destitution of all principle, be fit to be called a government? No, sir. It should not be denominated a constitution. It should be called, rather, a collection of topics, for everlasting controversy; heads of debate for a disputatious people. It would not be a government. It would not be adequate to any practical good, nor fit for any country to live under. To avoid all possibility of being misunderstood, allow me to repeat again, in the fullest manner, that I claim no powers for the Government by forced or unfair construction. I admit that it is a Government of strictly limited powers, of enumerated, specified, and particularized powers; and that whatsoever is not granted, is withheld. But notwithstanding all this, and however the grant of powers may be expressed, its limit and extent may yet, in some cases, admit of doubt; and the General Government would be good for nothing, it would be incapable of long existing, if some mode had not been provided, in which these doubts, as they should arise, might be peaceably, but authoritatively, solved.

And now let me run the honorable gentleman's doctrine a little into its practical application. Let us look at his probable modus operandi. If a thing can be done, an ingenious man can tell how it is to be done. Now, I wish to be informed how this State interference is to be put in practice without violence, bloodshed, and rebellion. We will take the existing case of the tariff law. South Carolina is said to have made up her opinion upon it. If we do not repeal it, (as we probably shall not) she will then apply to the case the remedy of her doctrine. She will, we must suppose, pass a law of her Legislature, declaring the several acts of Congress, usually called the tariff laws, null and void, so far as they respect South Carolina, or the citizens thereof. So far, all is a paper transaction, and easy enough. But the collector at Charleston is collecting the duties imposed by these tariff laws; he, therefore, must be stopped. The collector will seize the goods if the tariff duties are not paid. The State authorities will undertake their rescue: the marshal, with his posse, will come to the collector's aid, and here the contest begins. The militia of the State will be called out to sustain the nullifying act. They will march, sir, under a very gallant leader: for I believe the honorable member himself commands the militia of that part of the State. He will raise the nullifying act on his standard, and spread it out as his banner! It will have a preamble, bearing, that the tariff laws are palpable, deliberate, and dangerous violations of the constitution! He will proceed, with this banner flying, to the custom house in Charleston:

"All the while,
"Sonorous metal blowing martial sounds."

Arrived at the custom house, he will tell the collector that he must collect no more duties under any of the tariff laws. This he will be somewhat puzzled to say, by the way, with a grave countenance, considering what hand South Carolina herself had in that of 1816. But, sir, the collector would, probably, not desist at his bidding. Here would ensue a pause: for they say that a certain stillness precedes the tempest. Before this military array should fall on the custom house, collector, clerks, and all, it is very probable some of those composing it would request, of their gallant commander in chief, to be informed a little upon the point of law: for they have, doubtless, a just respect for his opinions as a lawyer, as well as for his bravery as a soldier. They know he has read Blackstone and the constitution, as well as Turenne and Vauban. They would ask him, therefore, something concerning their rights in this matter. They would inquire whether it was not somewhat dangerous to resist a law of the United States. What would be the nature of their offence, they would wish to learn, if they, by military force and array, resisted the execution, in Carolina, of a law of the United States, and it should turn out, after all, that the law was constitutional? He would answer, of course, treason. No lawyer could give any other answer. John Fries, he would tell them, had learned that some years ago. How, then, they would ask, do you propose to defend us? We are not afraid of bullets; but treason has a way of taking people off, that we do not much relish. How do you propose to defend us? "Look at my floating banner," he would reply; "see there the nullifying law!" Is it your opinion, gallant commander, they would then say, that, if we should be indicted for treason, that same floating banner of your's would make a good plea in bar? "South Carolina is a sovereign State," he would reply. That is true; but would the judge admit our plea? "These tariff laws," he would repeat, "are unconstitutional, palpably, deliberately, dangerously." That all may be so; but if the tribunals should not happen to be of that opinion, shall we swing for it? We are ready to die for our country, but it is rather an awkward business, this dying without touching the ground! After all, that is a sort of hemp tax, worse than any part of the tariff. The honorable gentleman would be in a dilemma like that of another great general: he would have a knot before him which he could not untie. He must cut it with his sword: he must say to his followers, defend yourselves with your bayonets!—and this is war—civil war.

Direct collision, therefore, between force and force, is the unavoidable result of that remedy for the revision of unconstitutional laws which the gentleman contends for. It must happen in the very first case to which it is applied. Is not this the plain result? To resist, by force, the execution of a law, generally, is treason. Can the courts of the United States take notice of the indulgence of a State to commit treason? The common saying that a State cannot commit treason herself, is nothing to the purpose. Can she authorize others to do it? If John Fries had produced an act of Pennsylvania, annulling the law of Congress, would it have helped his case? Talk about it as we will, these doctrines go the length of revolution. They are incompatible with any peaceable administration of the Government. They lead directly to disunion and civil commotion; and therefore it is, that, at their commencement, when they are first found to be maintained by respectable men, and in a tangible form, I enter my public protest against them all.

The honorable gentleman argues that, if this Government be the sole judge of the extent of its own powers, whether that right of judging be in Congress or the Supreme Court, it equally subverts State sovereignty. This the gentleman sees, or thinks he sees, although he cannot perceive how the right of judging, in this matter, if left to the exercise of State Legislatures, has any tendency to subvert the Government of the Union. The gentleman's opinion may be, that the right ought not to have been lodged with the General Government; he may like better such a constitution as we should have under the right of State interference; but I ask him to meet me on the plain matter of fact; I ask him to meet me on the constitution itself; I ask him if the power is not found there, clearly and visibly found there?—(Note 3.)

But, sir, what is this danger, and what the grounds of it? Let it be remembered that the constitution of the United States is not unalterable. It is to continue in its present form no longer than the people, who established it, shall choose to continue it. If they shall become convinced that they have made an injudicious or inexpedient partition and distribution of power, between the State Governments and the General Government, they can alter that distribution at will.

If any thing be found in the national constitution, either by original provision, or subsequent interpretation, which ought not to be in it, the people know how to get rid of it. If any construction be established, unacceptable to them, so as to become, practically, a part of the constitution, they will amend it at their own sovereign pleasure. But while the people choose to maintain it as it is; while they are satisfied with it, and refuse to change it, who has given, or who can give, to the State Legislatures, a right to alter it, either by interference, construction, or otherwise? Gentlemen do not seem to recollect that the people have any power to do any thing for themselves; they imagine there is no safety for them any longer than they are under the close guardianship of the State Legislatures. Sir, the people have not trusted their safety, in regard to the general constitution, to these hands. They have required other security, and taken other bonds. They have chosen to trust themselves, first, to the plain words of the instrument, and to such construction as the Government itself, in doubtful cases, should put on its own powers, under their oaths of office, and subject to their responsibility to them; just as the people of a State trust their own State Governments with a similar power. Secondly, they have reposed their trust in the efficacy of frequent elections, and in their own power to remove their own servants and agents, whenever they see cause. Thirdly, they have reposed their trust in the Judicial power, which, in order that it might be trust-worthy, they have made as respectable, as disinterested, and as independent as was practicable. Fourthly, they have seen fit to rely, in case of necessity, or high expediency, on their known and admitted power to alter or amend the constitution, peaceably and quietly, whenever experience shall point out defects or imperfections. And, finally, the people of the United States have, at no time, in no way, directly or indirectly, authorized any State Legislature to construe or interpret their high instrument of Government; much less to interfere, by their own power, to arrest its course and operation.

If, sir, the people, in these respects, had done otherwise than they have done, their constitution could neither have been preserved, nor would it have been worth preserving. And, if its plain provisions shall now be disregarded, and these new doctrines interpolated in it, it will become as feeble and helpless a being as its enemies, whether early or more recent, could possibly desire. It will exist, in every State, but as a poor dependent on State permission. It must borrow leave to be; and will be no longer than State pleasure, or State discretion, sees fit to grant the indulgence, and to prolong its poor existence.

But, sir, although there are fears, there are hopes, also. The people have preserved this, their own chosen constitution, for forty years, and have seen their happiness, prosperity, and renown, grow with its growth, and strengthen with its strength. They are now, generally, strongly attached to it. Overthrown by direct assault, it cannot be; evaded, undermined, nullified, it will not be, if we, and those who shall succeed us here, as agents and representatives of the people, shall conscientiously and vigilantly discharge the two great branches of our public trust, faithfully to preserve, and wisely to administer it.

I have thus stated the reasons of my dissent to the doctrines which have been advanced and maintained. I am conscious, sir, of having detained you and the Senate much too long. I was drawn into the debate with no previous deliberation, such as is suited to the discussion of so grave and important a subject. But it is a subject of which my heart is full, and I have not been willing to suppress the utterance of its spontaneous sentiments. I cannot, even now, persuade myself to relinquish it, without expressing, once more, my deep conviction, that, since it respects nothing less than the union of the States, it is of most vital and essential importance to the public happiness. I profess, sir, in my career, hitherto, to have kept steadily in view the prosperity and honor of the whole country, and the preservation of our Federal Union. It is to that Union we owe our safety at home, and our consideration and dignity abroad. It is to that Union that we are chiefly indebted for whatever makes us most proud of our country. That Union we reached only by the discipline of our virtues in the severe school of adversity. It had its origin in the necessities of disordered finance, prostrate commerce, and ruined credit. Under its benign influence, these great interests immediately awoke, as from the dead, and sprang forth with newness of life. Every year of its duration has teemed with fresh proofs of its utility and its blessings; and, although our territory has stretched out wider and wider, and our population spread farther and farther, they have not outrun its protection or its benefits. It has been to us all a copious fountain of national, social, and personal happiness. I have not allowed myself, sir, to look beyond the Union, to see what might lie hidden in the dark recess behind. I have not coolly weighed the chances of preserving liberty, when the bonds that unite us together shall be broken asunder. I have not accustomed myself to hang over the precipice of disunion, to see whether, with my short sight, I can fathom the depth of the abyss below; nor could I regard him as a safe counsellor, in the affairs of this Government, whose thoughts should be mainly bent on considering, not how the Union should be best preserved, but how tolerable might be the condition of the people when it shall be broken up and destroyed. While the Union lasts, we have high, exciting, gratifying prospects spread out before us, for us and our children. Beyond that, I seek not to penetrate the veil. God grant that, in my day, at least, that curtain may not rise. God grant that, on my vision, never may be opened what lies behind. When my eyes shall be turned to behold, for the last time, the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining on the broken and dishonored fragments of a once glorious Union; on States dissevered, discordant, belligerent; on a land rent with civil feuds, or drenched, it may be, in fraternal blood! Let their last feeble and lingering glance, rather, behold the gorgeous ensign of the republic, now known and honored throughout the earth, still full high advanced, its arms and trophies streaming in their original lustre, not a stripe erased or polluted, nor a single star obscured, bearing for its motto no such miserable interrogatory as, What is all this worth? Nor those other words of delusion and folly, Liberty first, and Union afterwards: but every where, spread all over in characters of living light, blazing on all its ample folds, as they float over the sea and over the land, and in every wind under the whole heavens, that other sentiment, dear to every true American heart—Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable!

NOTE 1.

WEDNESDAY, February 21, 1787.

Congress assembled: Present, as before.

The report of a Grand Committee, consisting of Mr. Dane, Mr. Varnum, Mr. S. M. Mitchell, Mr. Smith, Mr. Cadwallader, Mr. Irvine, Mr. N. Mitchell, Mr. Forrest, Mr. Grayson, Mr. Blount, Mr. Bull, and Mr. Few, to whom was referred a letter of 14th September, 1786, from J. Dickinson, written at the request of commissioners from the States of Virginia, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and New York, assembled at the city of Annapolis, together with a copy of a report of said commissioners to the Legislatures of the States by whom they were appointed, being an order of the day, was called up, and which is contained in the following resolution, viz:

"Congress having had under consideration the letter of John Dickinson, Esq. chairman of the commissioners who assembled at Annapolis during the last year; also, the proceedings of the said commissioners, and entirely coinciding with them, as to the inefficiency of the Federal Government, and the necessity of devising such further provisions as shall render the same adequate to the exigencies of the Union, do strongly recommend to the different Legislatures to send forward delegates, to meet the proposed convention, on the second Monday in May next, at the city of Philadelphia."

NOTE 2.

Extracts from Mr. Calhoun's Speech on Mr. Randolph's motion to strike out the minimum valuation on cotton goods, in the House of Representatives, April, 1816.

"The debate, heretofore, on this subject, has been on the degree of protection which ought to be afforded to our cotton and woollen manufactures; all professing to be friendly to those infant establishments, and to be willing to extend to them adequate encouragement. The present motion assumes a new aspect. It is introduced, professedly, on the ground that manufactures ought not to receive any encouragement; and will, in its operation, leave our cotton establishments exposed to the competition of the cotton goods of the East Indies, which, it is acknowledged on all sides, they are not capable of meeting with success, without the proviso proposed to be stricken out by the motion now under discussion. Till the debate assumed this new form, he determined to be silent; participating, as he largely did, in that general anxiety which is felt, after so long and laborious a session, to return to the bosom of our families. But on a subject of so much vital importance, touching, as it does, the security and permanent prosperity of our country, he hoped that the House would indulge him in a few observations."

"To give perfection to this state of things, it will be necessary to add, as soon as possible, a system of Internal Improvements, and, at least, such an extension of our navy, as will prevent the cutting off our coasting trade. The advantage of each is so striking as not to require illustration, especially after the experience of the late war."

"He firmly believed that the country is prepared, even to maturity, for the introduction of manufactures. We have abundance of resources, and things naturally tend, at this moment, in that direction. A prosperous commerce has poured an immense amount of commercial capital into this country. This capital has, till lately, found occupation in commerce; but that state of the world which transferred it to this country, and gave it active employment, has passed away, never to return. Where shall we now find full employment for our prodigious amount of tonnage? Where markets for the numerous and abundant products of our country? This great body of active capital, which, for the moment, has found sufficient employment in supplying our markets, exhausted by the war, and measures preceding it, must find a new direction; it will not be idle. What channel can it take but that of manufactures? This, if things continue as they are, will be its direction. It will introduce an era in our affairs, in many respects highly advantageous, and ought to be countenanced by the Government. Besides, we have already surmounted the greatest difficulty that has ever been found in undertakings of this kind. The cotton and woollen manufactures are not to be introduced—they are already introduced to a great extent; freeing us entirely from the hazards, and, in a great measure, the sacrifices, experienced in giving the capital of the country a new direction. The restrictive measures, and the war, though not intended for that purpose, have, by the necessary operation of things, turned a large amount of capital to this new branch of industry. He had often heard it said, both in and out of Congress, that this effect alone would indemnify the country for all its losses. So high was this tone of feeling, when the want of these establishments was practically felt, that he remembered, during the war, when some question was agitated respecting the introduction of foreign goods, that many then opposed it on the grounds of injuring our manufactures. He then said, that war alone furnished sufficient stimulus, and perhaps too much, as it would make their growth unnaturally rapid; but that, on the return of peace, it would then be time to show our affection for them. He, at that time, did not expect an apathy and aversion to the extent which is now seen. But it will, no doubt, be said, if they are so far established, and if the situation of the country is so favorable to their growth, where is the necessity of affording them protection? It is to put them beyond the reach of contingency."

"It has been further asserted, that manufactures are the fruitful cause of pauperism; and England has been referred to, as furnishing conclusive evidence of its truth. For his part, he could perceive no such tendency in them, but the exact contrary, as they furnished new stimulus and means of subsistence to the laboring classes of the community. We ought not to look at the cotton and woolen establishments of Great Britain for the prodigious numbers of poor with which her population was disgraced; causes much more efficient exist. Her poor laws, and statutes regulating the prices of labor, with taxes, were the real causes. But, if it must be so, if the mere fact that England manufactured more than any other country, explained the cause of her having more beggars, it is just as reasonable to refer her courage, spirit, and all her masculine virtues, in which she excels all other nations, with a single exception—he meant our own—in which we might, without vanity, challenge a pre-eminence. Another objection had been, which he must acknowledge was better founded, that capital employed in manufacturing produced a greater dependence on the part of the employed, than in commerce, navigation, or agriculture. It is certainly an evil, and to be regretted; but he did not think it a decisive objection to the system; especially when it had incidental political advantages which, in his opinion, more than counterpoised it. It produced an interest strictly American, as much so as agriculture, in which it had the decided advantage of commerce or navigation. The country will, from this, derive much advantage. Again: it is calculated to bind together more closely our widely spread republic. It will greatly increase our mutual dependence and intercourse; and will, as a necessary consequence, excite an increased attention to Internal Improvements—a subject every way so intimately connected with the ultimate attainment of national strength, and the perfection of our political institutions."

Extracts from the Speech of Mr. Calhoun, April, 1816, on the Direct Tax.

"In regard to the question how far manufactures ought to be fostered, [Mr. C. said] it was the duty of this country, as a means of defence, to encourage the domestic industry of the country, more especially that part of it which provides the necessary materials for clothing and defence. Let us look to the nature of the war most likely to occur. England is in possession of the ocean. No man, however sanguine, can believe that we can deprive her, soon, of her predominance there. That control deprives us of the means of maintaining our army and navy cheaply clad. The question relating to manufactures must not depend on the abstract principle that industry, left to pursue its own course, will find in its own interest all the encouragement that is necessary. I lay the claims of the manufacturers entirely out of view, [said Mr. C.] but, on general principles, without regard to their interest, a certain encouragement should be extended, at least to our woollen and cotton manufactures."

"This nation [Mr. C. said] was rapidly changing the character of its industry. When a nation is agricultural, depending for supply on foreign markets, its people may be taxed through its imports almost to the amount of its capacity. The nation was, however, rapidly becoming, to a considerable extent, a manufacturing nation."

To the quotations from the speeches and proceedings of the Representatives of South Carolina, in Congress, during Mr. Monroe's administration, may be added the following extract from Mr. Calhoun's report on roads and canals, submitted to Congress on 7th January, 1819, from the Department of War:

"A judicious system of roads and canals, constructed for the convenience of commerce, and the transportation of the mail only, without any reference to military operations, is itself among the most efficient means for 'the more complete defence of the United States.' Without adverting to the fact that the roads and canals which such a system would require, are, with few exceptions, precisely those which would be required for the operations of war; such a system, by consolidating our Union, increasing our wealth and fiscal capacity, would add greatly to our resources in war. It is in a state of war, when a nation is compelled to put all its resources, in men, money, skill, and devotion to country, into requisition, that its Government realizes, in its security, the beneficial effects from a people made prosperous and happy by a wise direction of its resources in peace."

"Should Congress think proper to commence a system of roads and canals for 'the more complete defence of the United States,' the disbursements of the sum appropriated for the purpose might be made by the Department of War, under the direction of the President. Where incorporate companies are already formed, or the road or canal commenced, under the superintendence of a State, it perhaps would be advisable to direct a subscription on the part of the United States, on such terms and conditions as might be thought proper."

NOTE 3.

The following resolutions of the Legislature of Virginia bear so pertinently and so strongly on this point of the debate, that they are thought worthy of being inserted in a note, especially as other resolutions of the same body are referred to in the discussion. It will be observed that these resolutions were unanimously adopted in each House.

VIRGINIA LEGISLATURE.

Extract from the Message of Governor Tyler, of Virginia, December 4, 1809.

"A proposition from the State of Pennsylvania is herewith submitted, with Governor Snyder's letter accompanying the same, in which is suggested the propriety of amending the constitution of the United States, so as to prevent collisions between the Government of the Union, and the State Governments."

HOUSE OF DELEGATES, FRIDAY, December 15, 1809.

On motion, Ordered, That so much of the Governor's communication as relates to the communication from the Governor of Pennsylvania, on the subject of an amendment proposed by the Legislature of that State to the constitution of the United States, be referred to Messrs. Peyton, Otey, Cabell, Walker, Madison, Holt, Newton, Parker, Stevenson, Randolph, (of Amelia) Cocke, Wyatt, and Ritchie.—Page 25 of the Journal.

THURSDAY, January 11, 1810.

Mr. Peyton, from the Committee to whom was referred that part of the Governor's communication which relates to the amendment proposed by the State of Pennsylvania

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[JAN. 27, 1830.]

to the constitution of the United States, made the following report:

The Committee to whom was referred the communication of the Governor of Pennsylvania, covering certain resolutions of the Legislature of that State proposing an amendment of the constitution of the United States, by the appointment of an impartial tribunal to decide disputes between the State and Federal Judiciary, have had the same under their consideration, and are of opinion that a tribunal is already provided by the constitution of the United States, to wit. the Supreme Court, more eminently qualified, from their habits and duties, from the mode of their selection, and from the tenure of their offices, to decide the disputes aforesaid, in an enlightened and impartial manner, than any other tribunal which could be created. The members of the Supreme Court are selected from those in the U. States who are most celebrated for virtue and legal learning, not at the will of a single individual, but by the concurrent wishes of the President and Senate of the United States: they will, therefore, have no local prejudices and partialities. The duties they have to perform lead them, necessarily, to the most enlarged and accurate acquaintance with the jurisdiction of the Federal and State Courts together, and with the admirable symmetry of our Government. The tenure of their offices enables them to pronounce the sound and correct opinions they may have formed, without fear, favor, or partiality.

The amendment to the constitution, proposed by Pennsylvania, seems to be founded upon the idea that the Federal Judiciary will, from a lust of power, enlarge their jurisdiction, to the total annihilation of the jurisdiction of the State Courts; that they will exercise their will, instead of the law and the constitution.

This argument, if it proves any thing, would operate more strongly against the tribunal proposed to be created, which promised so little, than against the Supreme Court, which, for the reasons given before, have every thing connected with their appointment calculated to ensure confidence. What security have we, were the proposed amendment adopted, that this tribunal would not substitute their will and their pleasure, in place of the law? The Judiciary is the weakest of the three departments of Government, and least dangerous to the political rights of the constitution; they hold neither the purse nor the sword; and, even to enforce their own judgments and decisions, must ultimately depend upon the Executive arm. Should the Federal Judiciary, however, unmindful of their weakness, unmindful of the duty which they owe to themselves and their country, become corrupt, and transcend the limits of their jurisdiction, would the proposed amendment oppose even a probable barrier in such an improbable state of things?

The creation of a tribunal, such as is proposed by Pennsylvania, so far as we are able to form an idea of it from the descriptions given in the resolutions of the Legislature of that State, would, in the opinion of your committee, tend rather to invite, than to prevent, collision between the Federal and State Courts. It might also become, in process of time, a serious and dangerous embarrassment to the operations of the General Government.

Resolved, therefore, That the Legislature of this State do disapprove of the amendment to the constitution of the United States proposed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, also, That his Excellency the Governor be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit forthwith, a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to each of the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress, and to the Executive of the several States in the Union, with a request that the same be laid before the Legislatures thereof.

The said resolutions being read a second time, were, on motion, ordered to be referred to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Commonwealth.

TUESDAY, January 23, 1810.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Commonwealth, and, after some time spent therein, Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and Mr. Stanard, of Spottsylvania, reported that the Committee had, according to order, had under consideration the preamble and resolutions of the Select Committee, to whom was referred that part of the Governor's communication which relates to the amendment proposed to the constitution of the United States by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, had gone through with the same, and directed him to report them to the House without amendment; which he handed in at the Clerk's table.

And the question being put on agreeing to the said preamble and resolutions, they were agreed to by the House unanimously.

Ordered, That the Clerk carry the said preamble and resolutions to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

IN SENATE, WEDNESDAY, January 24, 1810.

The preamble and resolutions on the amendment to the constitution of the United States, proposed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, by the appointment of an impartial tribunal to decide disputes between the State and Federal Judiciary, being also delivered in and twice read, on motion, was ordered to be committed to Messrs. Nelson, Currie, Campbell, Upshur, and Wolfe.

FRIDAY, January 26.

Mr. Nelson reported, from the Committee to whom was committed the preamble and resolutions on the amendment proposed by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, &c. that the Committee had, according to order, taken the said preamble, &c. under their consideration, and directed him to report them without any amendment.

And on the question being put thereupon, the same was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. HAYNE, in reply to Mr. WEBSTER, observed: I do not rise at this late hour* to go at large into the controverted questions between the Senator from Massachusetts and myself, but merely to correct some very gross errors into which he has fallen, and to afford explanations on some points, which, after what has fallen from that gentleman, may perhaps be considered as requiring explanation. The gentleman has attempted, through the whole course of his argument, to throw upon me the blame of having provoked this discussion. Though standing himself at the very head and source of this angry controversy, which has flowed from him down to me, he insists that I have troubled the waters. In order to give color to this charge, (wholly unfounded, sir, as every gentleman of this body will bear witness) he alludes to my excitement when I first rose to answer the gentleman, after he had made his attack upon the South. He charges me with having then confessed that I had something ranking in my bosom, which I desired to discharge. Sir, I have no recollection of having used that word. If it did escape me, however, in the excitement of the moment, it was indicative, not of any personal hostility towards that Senator—for, in truth, sir, I felt none—but proceeded from a sensibility which could not but be excited by what I had a right to consider as an unprovoked and most unwarrantable attack upon the South through me.

The gentleman boasts that he has escaped unhurt in the conflict. The shaft, it seems, was shot by too feeble an arm to reach its destination. Sir, I am glad to hear this. Judging from the actions of the gentleman, I had feared that the arrow had penetrated even more deeply than I could have wished. From the beating of his breast, and the tone and manner of the gentleman, I should fear he is most sorely wounded. In a better spirit, however, I will say, I hope his wounds may heal kindly, and leave no scars behind; and let me assure the gentleman, that however deeply the arrow may have penetrated, its point was not envenomed. It was shot in fair and manly fight, and with the twang of the bow have fled the feelings which impelled it. The gentleman indignantly repels the charge of having avoided the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BEXFORD] and selected me as his adversary, from any apprehension of being overmatched. Sir, when I found the gentleman passing over in silence the arguments of the Senator from Missouri, which had charged the East with hostility towards the West, and directing his artillery against me, who had made no such charge, I had a right to inquire into the causes of so extraordinary a proceeding. I suggested some as probable, and among them, that to which the gentleman takes such strong exception. Sir, has he now given any sufficient reason for the extraordinary course of which I have complained? At one moment he tells us that "he did not hear the whole of the argument of the gentleman from Missouri," and again, "that, having found a responsible endorser of the bill, he did not think proper to pursue the drawer." Well, sir, if the gentleman answered the arguments which he did not hear, why attribute them to me, whom he did hear, and by whom they were certainly not urged? If he was determined to pursue the parties to the bill, why attempt to throw the responsibility on one who was neither the drawer nor the endorser? Let me once more, sir, put this matter on its true footing. I will not be forced to assume a position in which I have not chosen to place myself. Sir, I disclaim any intention whatever, in my original remarks on the public lands, to impute to the East hostility towards the West. I imputed none. I did not utter one word to that effect. I said nothing that could be tortured into an attack upon the East.

*The lateness of the hour when Mr. W. resumed his seat compelled Mr. H. to curtail his remarks in reply, especially those which related to the constitutional question. In the speech as here reported, the arguments omitted are supplied. The great importance of the question makes it desirable that nothing should be omitted necessary to its elucidation.—Note by Mr. H.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

I did not mention the "accursed tariff"—a phrase which the gentleman has put into my mouth. I did not even impute the policy of Mr. Rush to New England. In alluding to that policy I noticed its source, and spoke of it as I thought it deserved. Sir, I am aware that a gentleman who rises, without premeditation, to throw out his ideas on a question before the Senate, may use expressions of the force and extent of which he may, at the time, not be fully aware. I should not, therefore, rely so confidently on my own recollections, but for the circumstance that I have not found one gentleman who heard my remarks, (except the Senator from Massachusetts himself) who supposed that one word had fallen from my lips that called for a reply of the tone and character of that which the gentleman thought proper to pronounce; not one who supposed that I had thrown out any imputations against the East, or justly subjected myself or the South to rebuke, unless, indeed, the principles for which I contended were so monstrous as to demand unmeasured reprobation. Now, sir, what were those principles? I have already shown, that, whether sound or unsound, they are not separated by a "hair's breadth" from those contended for by the gentleman himself, in 1825, and therefore, that he, of all men, had the least right to take exception to them.

Sir, the gentleman charges me with having unnecessarily introduced the slave question; with what justice, let those determine who heard that gentleman pointing out the superiority of Ohio over Kentucky, and attributing it to that happy stroke of New England policy, by which slavery was forever excluded north of the Ohio river. Sir, I was wholly at a loss to conceive why that topic had been introduced here at all, until the gentleman followed it up by an attack upon the principles and the policy of the South. When that was done, the object was apparent, and it became my duty to take up the gauntlet which the gentleman had thrown down, and to come out, without reserve, in defence of our institutions and our principles. The gentleman charges us with a morbid sensibility on this subject. Sir, it is natural and proper that we should be sensitive on that topic, and we must continue so just so long as those who do not live among us shall be found meddling with a subject with which they have nothing to do, and about which they know nothing. But, sir, we will agree, now, henceforth, and forever, to avoid the subject altogether, never even to mention the word slavery on this floor, if gentlemen on the other side will only consent not to intrude it upon us, by forcing it unnecessarily into debate. When introduced, however, whether by a hint or a sneer, by the imputation of weakness to slave-holding States, or in any other way, we must be governed entirely by our own discretion, as to the manner in which the attack must be met. When the proposition was made here to appropriate the public lands to emancipation, I met it with a protest. I have now met an attack of a different character by an argument.

The gentleman, in alluding to the Hartford Convention, told us he had nothing to do with it, and had nothing to say either for or against it, and yet he undertook, at the same time, to recommend that renowned assembly as a precedent to the South.

Sir, unkind as my allusion to the Hartford Convention has been considered by its supporters, I apprehend that this disclaimer of the gentleman will be regarded as "the unkindest cut of all." When the gentleman spoke of the Carolina conventions of Colleton and Abbeville, let me tell him that he spoke of that which never had existence, except in his own imagination. There have, indeed, been meetings of the people in those districts, composed, sir, of as high-minded and patriotic men as any country can boast; but we have had no "convention" as yet; and when South Carolina shall resort to such a measure for the redress of her grievances, let me tell the gentleman that, of all the assemblies that have ever been convened in this country, the Hartford Convention is the very last we shall consent to take as an example; nor will it find more favor in our eyes, from being recommended to us by the Senator from Massachusetts. Sir, we would scorn to take advantage of difficulties created by a foreign war, to wring from the Federal Government a redress even of our grievances. We are standing up for our constitutional rights, in a time of profound peace; but if the country should, unhappily, be involved in a war to-morrow, we should be found flying to the standard of our country—first driving back the common enemy, and then insisting upon the restoration of our rights.

The gentleman, speaking of the tariff and internal improvements, said, that, in supporting these measures, he had but followed "a Carolina lead." He also quoted, with high encomium, the opinions of the present chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House, in relation to the latter subject. Now, sir, it is proper that the Senator from Massachusetts should be, once for all, informed, that South Carolina acknowledges no leaders, whom she is willing blindly to follow, in any course of policy. The "Carolina doctrines," in relation to the "American System," have been expounded to us by the resolutions of her Legislature, and the remonstrances of her citizens, now upon your table; and when the gentleman shows us one of her distinguished sons expressing different sentiments, he neither changes her principles, nor subjects the State to a charge of inconsistency. Sir, no man can entertain a higher respect than I do for the distinguished talents, high character, and manly independence of the gentleman alluded to; [Mr. McDUFFIE] but if he now entertains the opinions attributed to him, in relation to internal improvements and the public lands,

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[JAN. 27, 1830.]

there can be no doubt that his sentiments, in these respects, differ widely from those of a large majority of the people of South Carolina; while, in relation to the tariff, and other questions of vital importance, he not only goes heart and hand with us, but is himself a host.

The gentleman considers the tariff of 1816 and the bonus bill as the foundation of the American System, and intimates that the former would not have prevailed, but for South Carolina votes. Now, sir, as to the tariff of 1816, I think a great mistake prevails throughout the country, in regarding it as the commencement of the existing policy. That was not a bill for increasing, but for reducing duties. During the war double duties had been resorted to, for raising the revenue necessary for its prosecution. Manufactures had sprung up under the protection incidentally afforded by the restrictive measures and the war. On the restoration of peace, a scale of duties was to be established, adapted to the situation in which the country was, by that event, placed. All agreed that the duties were to be reduced, and that this reduction must be gradual. We had a debt on our hands of one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty millions dollars. Admonished by recent experience, a navy was to be built up, and an extensive system of fortifications to be commenced. The operation, too, of a sudden reduction of duties upon the manufactures which had been forced into existence by the war, and which then bore their full proportion of the direct taxes, was also to be taken into consideration; and, under all of these circumstances, it was determined to reduce the duties gradually, until they should reach the lowest amount necessary for revenue in time of peace. Such, sir, was the true character of the tariff law of 1816. By that bill, (reported, sir, by the lamented Lowndes, a steady opponent of the protecting system) the duties on woollen and cotton goods were at once reduced to twenty-five per cent. with a provision that they should, in the course of three years, be further reduced to twenty per cent.; while, by the tariff of 1824, the duties on the same articles were at once increased to thirty per cent., and were to go on increasing to thirty-seven and a half per cent.; and, by the tariff of 1828, have been carried much higher. And yet the tariff of 1816 is now quoted as an authority for the tariffs of 1824 and 1828; by which duties admitted to be already high enough for all the purposes of revenue, are to go on increasing, year after year, for the avowed purpose of promoting domestic manufactures, by preventing importations. Suppose, sir, the New England gentlemen were now to join the South in going back to a tariff for revenue, and were to propose to us gradually to reduce all the existing duties, so that they should come down, in two or three years, to fifteen or twenty per cent.—would the gentleman consider us as sending in our adhesion to the American System by voting for such a reduction? And if not, how can he charge the supporters of the tariff of 1816 with being the fathers of that system? In this view of the subject it is not at all material whether the representatives from South Carolina voted for that measure or not; or whether the passage of the bill depended on their votes. On looking into the journals, however, it will be found that the bill actually passed the House of Representatives, by a vote of 88 to 54; and would have succeeded, if every member from South Carolina had voted against it.

The gentleman next mentions the "bonus bill" as the first step in the system of Internal Improvement. That was a bill, sir, not appropriating, but setting apart, a fixed sum (the bank bonus) for Internal Improvements, to be distributed among the States, on principles of perfect equality, and to be applied "by consent of the States" themselves. Though Mr. Madison put his veto on that bill, it was supposed, at the time, to be in the spirit of his own message; and though I must express my dissent from the measure, no doubt can exist that, if the system of Internal Improvement had been prosecuted on the principles of that bill, much of the inequality and injustice that have since taken place would have been avoided. But, sir, I am by no means disposed to deny, or to conceal the fact, that a considerable change has taken place in the Southern States, and in South Carolina in particular, in relation to Internal Improvements, since that measure was first broached, at the close of the last war. Sir, when we were restored to a state of peace, the attention of our prominent statesmen was directed to plans for the restoration of the country from the wounds of the war, and the public mind received a strong impulse towards Internal Improvements. The minds of the eminent men of the South had, by the events of that war, received, for the time, a direction rather favorable to the enlargement of the powers of the Government. They had seen the public arm paralyzed by the opposition to that war; and it was quite natural that they should, at that time, rather be disposed to strengthen than to weaken the powers of the Federal Government. Internal Improvements spring up in that heated soil; and I have no doubt that, as a new question, hardly examined, and very little understood, the people of the South, for a short period, took up the belief that, to a certain extent, and under certain guards, the system could be beneficially and constitutionally pursued. But, sir, before time had been allowed for the formation of any fixed and settled opinions, the evils of the system were so fully developed, the injustice, the inequality, the corruption, flowing from it, and the alarming extent of powers claimed for the Federal Government, by its supporters, became so manifest, as thoroughly to satisfy the South that the system of Internal Improvement, on the principles on which it was to be administered, was not only unequal and unjust, but a most alarming innovation on the constitution.

The gentleman has alluded to my own vote on the survey bill of 1824. Sir, I have to return him my thanks for having afforded me, by that allusion, an opportunity of explaining my conduct in relation to the system of Internal Improvements. At the time that I was called to a seat in this House I had been for many years removed from political life, and engaged in the arduous pursuits of a profession, which abstracted me almost entirely from the examination of political questions. The gentleman tells us he had not made up his own mind on this subject as late as 1817. Sir, I had not even fully examined it in 1823. But, even at that time, I entertained doubts, both as to the constitutionality and expediency of the system. I came here with these feelings, and before I was yet warm in my seat, the survey bill of 1824 was brought up. We were then expressly told by its advocates, that its object was, not to establish a system of Internal Improvements, but merely to present to Congress and the country a full view of the whole ground, leaving it hereafter to be decided whether the system should be prosecuted, and if so, on what principles? Sir, I was induced to believe that no great work would be undertaken until the objects of that survey bill should be accomplished; that is to say, until the President should submit the whole scheme in one connected view, so that we should have before us at once all the measures deemed to be of "national importance," to which the attention of Congress might be directed.

Sir, I did suppose that a few great works, in which all the States would have a common interest, and which might therefore be considered as of "national importance," were alone intended to be embraced in that bill, and that, in one or two years, the whole of the surveys would be completed, when Congress would have it in their power to decide whether the system should be carried on at all, and if so, on what principles? Sir, I know that more than one gentleman who voted for the survey bill of 1824 expressly stated at the time, that they did not intend to commit themselves on the general question; and I was one of that number. And it was expressly because

[SENATE.]

I did not consider that bill as committing those who supported it, for or against any system of Internal Improvement, that I voted against every amendment calculated to give any expression of opinion, one way or the other. I was unwilling to deprive it of the character which it bore on its face, as a measure intended merely to bring before the public in a single view, the entire scheme, so as to enable us to judge of its practicability and expediency. Sir, in all these views and expectations I was deceived. By the year 1826, it came to be fully understood that these surveys were never to be finished, and that fifty thousand dollars per annum was to be appropriated, merely to give popularity to the system, by feeding the hopes of the people in all parts of the country. In the mean time, too, appropriations were made, and new works commenced, just as if no surveys were going on. Sir, as soon as I discovered the true character of the survey bill, I opposed it openly on this floor, and have since constantly voted against all appropriations for surveys. Sir, as to the system of Internal Improvement, my first impressions against it were fully confirmed very soon after I took my seat here, and (except in cases which I consider as exceptions from the general rule) I have uniformly voted against all appropriations for Internal Improvements, against the Cumberland road, the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, and all other works of a similar character. But, sir, if the South, or the statesmen of the South, had committed themselves ever so deeply on this subject, does the gentleman from Massachusetts suppose it would afford any excuse for their continued support of a system conducted on principles which now manifestly appear to be unconstitutional as they are unequal and unjust? Surely not.

The gentleman has made his defence for his conduct in relation to the tariff of 1828. He considers the country as being committed by the tariff of 1824 to go on with the system. Sir, we wholly deny that the country is, in any way, committed, or that Congress could commit it on such a subject, much less to the support of a ruinous, unjust, and unconstitutional policy. But how, if such a commitment were possible, could the imposition of a duty of twenty or thirty per cent. commit us to the imposition of duties of fifty or one hundred? The gentleman is mistaken in supposing that I charged him with having, in 1820, denounced the tariff as "utterly unconstitutional;" I stated that he had called its constitutionality in question. I have now before me the proceedings of the Boston meeting, to which I referred, and will read them, that there may be no mistake on the subject. In the resolutions reported by a committee, (of which Mr. W. was a member) it was, among other things,

1. "Resolved, That no objection ought ever to be made to any amount of taxes equally apportioned, and imposed for the purpose of raising revenue necessary for the support of the Government; but that taxes imposed on the people for the benefit of any one class of men [the manufacturers] are equally inconsistent with the principles of the constitution and with sound policy."

2. "Resolved, That, in our opinion, the proposed tariff, and the principles on which it is avowedly founded, would, if adopted, have a tendency, however different may be the motives of those who recommend them, to diminish the industry, impede the prosperity, and corrupt the morals of the people."

Mr. WEBSTER said, at that meeting, in support of these anti-tariff resolutions (which were unanimously adopted)

"There is a power in names; and those who had pressed the tariff on Congress and on the country, had represented it as immediately, and almost exclusively connected with domestic industry, and national independence. In his opinion, no measure could prove more injurious to the industry of the country, and nothing was more fanciful than the opinion, that national independence rendered such a measure necessary. He certainly thought it might be doubted, whether Congress would not be acting somewhat against the spirit and intention of the constitution, in exercising a power to control essentially the pursuits and occupations of individuals, not as incidental to the exercise of any other power, but as a substantial and direct power. If such changes were wrought incidentally only, and were the necessary consequence of such imposts as Congress, for the leading purpose of revenue, should enact, then they could not be complained of. But he doubted whether Congress fairly possessed the power of turning the incident into the principal; and, instead of leaving manufactures to the protection of such laws as should be passed with a primary regard to revenue, of enacting laws with the avowed object of giving a preference to particular manufactures," &c.

Sir, these are good sound "Carolina doctrines," and if the gentleman finds reason to abandon them now, we cannot consent to go with him.

We have been often reproached, sir, with lending our aid to some of the most obnoxious provisions of the tariff of 1828. What was the fact? Not an amendment was put into that bill here which did not go to reduce the duties. That bill came to the Senate in a form in which it was known that it could not pass. Gentlemen who would not vote for it, in that shape, but who wished it to pass, called upon us to aid them in amending it, to suit their own purposes. Sir, if we had lent our aid to such an object we would have deserved any fate that could have befallen us. We proceeded throughout on the open and avowed ground of hostility to the whole system, and acted accordingly.

To disprove my observations, that the New England members generally did not support Internal Improvements in the West, before the memorable era, the winter of 1825, the gentleman quoted two votes, in 1820 and 1821, reducing the price, or extending the time of payment for the public lands. Now, sir, the only objection to his authority is, that it has no manner of relation to the point in dispute. I stated that New England did not support Internal Improvements, as a branch of the American system, before 1825. The gentleman proves that, on two occasions, they voted for certain measures in relation to the public lands—measures which I had always supposed had been forced upon Congress by motives of interest, but which, whatever may have been their character, do not touch the point in dispute in the smallest degree. I think this mode of meeting my argument, however creditable to the gentleman's ingenuity, amounts to an acknowledgment that it is unanswerable.

The gentleman complains of his arguments having been misunderstood in relation to consolidation. He thinks my misapprehension almost miraculous in treating his as an argument in favor of the "consolidation of the Government." Now, sir, what was the point in dispute between us? I had deprecated the consolidation of the Government. I said not one word against the "consolidation of the Union." I went further, and pointed out, and deprecated some of the means, by which this consolidation was to be brought about. The gentleman gets up and attacks my argument at every point, ridicules our fears about "consolidation," and finally reads a passage from a letter of General Washington's, stating that one of the objects of the constitution was "the consolidation of the Union." Surely, sir, under these circumstances, I was not mistaken in saying, that the authority quoted did not apply to the case, as the point in dispute was the "consolidation of the Government," and not of "the Union." But, sir, the gentleman has relieved me from all embarrassment on this point, by going fully into the examination of the Virginia doctrines of '98; and while he denounces them, giving us his own views of the power of the Federal Government; views which, in my humble judgment, stop nothing short of the consolidation of all power in the hands of the Federal Government. Sir, when I last touched on this topic, I did little more than quote the high authorities on which our doctrines rest; but, after the elaborate argument which we have just heard from the gentleman from Massachusetts, it cannot be supposed that I can suffer them to go to the world unanswered. I entreat the Senate, therefore, to bear with me, while I go over, as briefly as possible, the most prominent arguments of the gentleman.

The proposition which I laid down, and from which the gentleman dissents, is taken from the Virginia resolutions of '98, and is in these words: "that in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise by the Federal Government of powers not granted by the compact, [the constitution] the States who are parties thereto have a right to interpose, for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them." The gentleman insists that the States have no right to decide whether the constitution has been violated by acts of Congress or not, but that the Federal Government is the exclusive judge of the extent of its own powers; and that, in case of a violation of the constitution, however "deliberate, palpable, and dangerous," a State has no constitutional redress, except where the matter can be brought before the Supreme Court, whose decision must be final and conclusive on the subject. Having thus distinctly stated the points in dispute between the gentleman and myself, I proceed to examine them. And here it will be necessary to go back to the origin of the Federal Government. It cannot be doubted, and is not denied, that, before the formation of the constitution, each State was an independent sovereignty, possessing all the rights and powers appertaining to independent nations; nor can it be denied that, after the constitution was formed, they remained equally sovereign and independent, as to all powers not expressly delegated to the Federal Government. This would have been the case, even if no positive provision to that effect had been inserted in that instrument. But to remove all doubt, it is expressly declared, by the tenth article of the amendments of the constitution, that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." The true nature of the Federal constitution, therefore, is, (in the language of Mr. Madison) "a compact to which the States are parties"—a compact by which each State, acting in its sovereign capacity, has entered into an agreement with the other States, by which they have consented that certain designated powers shall be exercised by the United States, in the manner prescribed in the instrument. Nothing can be clearer, than that, under such a system, the Federal Government, exercising strictly delegated powers, can have no right to act beyond the pale of its authority, and that all such acts are void. A State, on the contrary, retaining all powers not expressly given away, may lawfully act in all cases where she has not voluntarily imposed restrictions on herself. Here, then, is a case of a compact between sovereigns; and the question arises, What is the remedy for a clear violation of its express terms by one of the parties? And here the plain obvious dictate of common sense is in strict conformity with the understanding of mankind, and the practice of nations in all analogous cases; "that, where resort can be had to no common superior, the parties to the compact must, themselves, be the rightful judges whether the bargain has been pursued or violated." (Madison's Report, p. 20.) When it is insisted by the gentleman that one of the parties (the Federal Government) "has the power of deciding ultimately and conclusively upon the extent of its own authority," I ask for the grant of such a power. I call upon the gentleman to show it to me in the constitution. It is not to be found there. If it is to be inferred from the nature of the compact, I aver that not a single argument can be urged in support of such an inference, in favor of the Federal Government, which would not apply, with at least equal force, in favor of a State. All sovereigns are of necessity equal; and any one State, however small in population or territory, has the same rights as the rest, just as the most insignificant nation in Europe is as much sovereign as France, or Russia, or England.

The very idea of a division of power by compact, is destroyed by a right claimed and exercised by either to be the exclusive interpreter of the instrument. Power is not divided, where one of the parties can arbitrarily determine its limits. A compact between two, with a right reserved to one to expound the instrument according to his own pleasure, is no compact at all, but an absolute surrender of the whole subject matter to the arbitrary discretion of the party who is constituted the judge. This is so obvious, that, in the conduct of human affairs between man and man, a common superior is always looked to as the expounder of contracts. But if there be no common superior, it results, from the very nature of things, that the parties must be their own judges. This is admitted to be the case where treaties are formed between independent nations; and, if the same rule does not apply to the federal compact, it must be because the Federal is superior to the State Government, or because the States have surrendered their sovereignty. Neither branch of this proposition can be maintained for a moment. I have already shown that all sovereigns must, as such, be equal. It only remains therefore to inquire whether the States have surrendered their sovereignty, and consented to reduce themselves to mere corporations. The whole form and structure of the Federal Government, the opinions of the framers of the constitution, and the organization of the State Governments, demonstrate that, though the States have surrendered certain specific powers, they have not surrendered their sovereignty. They have each an independent Legislature, Executive, and Judiciary, and exercise jurisdiction over the lives and property of their citizens. They have, it is true, voluntarily restrained themselves from doing certain acts, but, in all other respects, they are as omnipotent as any independent nation whatever. Here, however, we are met by the argument, that the constitution was not formed by the States in their sovereign capacity, but by the people; and it is therefore inferred that, the Federal Government being created by all the people, must be supreme; and though it is not contended that the constitution may be rightfully violated, yet it is insisted that from the decision of the Federal Government there can be no appeal. It is obvious that this argument rests on the idea of State inferiority. Considering the Federal Government as one whole, and the States merely as component parts, it follows, of course, that the former is as much superior to the latter as the whole is to the parts of which it is composed. Instead of deriving power by delegation from the States to the Union, this scheme seems to imply that the individual States derive their power from the United States, just as petty corporations may exercise so much power, and no more, as their superior may permit them to enjoy. This notion is entirely at variance with all our conceptions of State rights, as those rights were understood by Mr. Madison and others, at the time the constitution was framed. I deny that the constitution was framed by the people in the sense in which that word is used on the other side, and insist that it was framed by the States acting in their sovereign capacity. When, in the preamble of the constitution, we find the words, "we the people of the United States," it is clear they can only relate to the people as citizens of the several States, because the Federal Government was not then in existence.

We accordingly find, in every part of that instrument, that the people are always spoken of in that sense. Thus,

JAN. 27, 1830.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

in the second section of the first article it is declared, that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year, by the people of the several States." To show that, in entering into this compact, the States acted in their sovereign capacity, and not merely as parts of one great community, what can be more conclusive than the historical fact that, when every State had consented to it except one, she was not held to be bound? A majority of the people in any State bound that State, but nine-tenths of all the people of the United States could not bind the people of Rhode Island, until Rhode Island, as a State, had consented to the compact. It cannot be denied that, at the time the constitution was framed, the people of the United States were members of regularly organized Governments, citizens of independent States; and unless these State Governments had been dissolved, it was impossible that the people could have entered into any compact but as citizens of these States. Suppose an assent to the constitution had been given by all the people within a certain district of any State, but that the State, in its sovereign capacity, had refused its assent: Would the people of that district have become citizens of the United States? Surely not. It is clear, then, that in adopting the constitution, the people did not act, and could not have acted, in any other character than as citizens of their respective States. And if, on the adoption of the constitution, they became citizens of the United States, it was only by virtue of that clause in the constitution which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." In choosing members to the convention, the States acted through their Legislatures, by whose authority the constitution, when framed, was submitted for ratification to conventions of the people, the usual and most appropriate organ of the sovereign will. I am not disposed to dwell longer on this point, which does appear to my mind to be too clear to admit of controversy. But I will quote from Mr. Madison's report, which goes the whole length in support of the doctrines for which I have contended:

"The other position involved in this branch of the resolution, namely: 'that the States are parties to the constitution, or compact,' is, in the judgment of the Committee, equally free from objection. It is indeed true, that the term 'States' is sometimes used in a vague sense, and sometimes in different senses, according to the subject to which it is applied. Thus, it sometimes means the separate sections of territory occupied by the political societies within each; sometimes the particular governments established by those societies; sometimes those societies as organized into those particular governments; and, lastly, it means the people composing those political societies, in their highest sovereign capacity. Although it might be wished that the perfection of language admitted of less diversity in the signification of the same words, yet little inconvenience is produced by it where the true sense can be collected with certainty from the different applications. In the present instance, whatever different constructions of the term 'States,' in the resolution, may have been entertained, all will at least concur in that last mentioned; because, in that sense the constitution was submitted to the 'States,' in that sense the 'States' ratified it; and in that sense of the term 'States,' they are consequently parties to the compact, from which the powers of the Federal Government result."

Having now established the position that the constitution was a compact between sovereign and independent States, having no common superior, "it follows, of necessity, (to borrow the language of Mr. Madison) "that there can be no tribunal above their authority to decide, in the last resort, whether the compact made by them be violated, and consequently, that, as the parties to it, they must themselves decide, in the last resort, such questions as may be of sufficient magnitude to require their interpretation."

But, the gentleman insists that the tribunal provided by the constitution for the decision of controversies between the States and the Federal Government, is the Supreme Court. And here again I call for the authority on which the gentleman rests the assertion, that the Supreme Court has any jurisdiction whatever over questions of sovereignty between the States and the United States. When we look into the constitution we do not find it there. I put entirely out of view any act of Congress on the subject. We are not looking into the laws, but the constitution.

It is clear that questions of sovereignty are not the proper subjects of judicial investigation. They are much too large, and of too delicate a nature, to be brought within the jurisdiction of a court of justice. Courts, whether supreme or subordinate, are the mere creatures of the sovereign power designed to expound and carry into effect its sovereign will. No independent State ever yet submitted to a Judge on the bench, the true construction of the compact between himself and another sovereign. All courts may incidentally take cognizance of treaties, where rights are claimed under them; but who ever heard of a court making an inquiry into the authority of the agents of the high contracting parties to make the treaty—whether its terms had been fulfilled, or whether it had become void, on account of a breach of its conditions on either side? All these are political, and not judicial questions. Some reliance has been placed on those provisions of the constitution which constitute "one Supreme Court;" which provide that "the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties;" and which declare that "this constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties, &c. shall be the supreme law of the land," &c. Now, as to the name of the Supreme Court, it is clear that the term has relation only to its supremacy over the inferior courts provided for by the constitution, and has no reference whatever to any supremacy over the sovereign States. The words are, "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish," &c. Though jurisdiction is given "in cases arising under the constitution," yet it is expressly limited to "cases in law and equity," showing conclusively that this jurisdiction was incidental merely to the ordinary administration of justice, and not intended to touch high questions of conflicting sovereignty. When it is declared that the constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land, it is manifest that no indication is given either as to the power of the Supreme Court to bind the States by its decisions, nor as to the course to be pursued in the event of laws being passed not in pursuance of the constitution. And I beg leave to call gentlemen's attention to the striking fact, that the powers of the Supreme Court, in relation to questions arising under the laws and the constitution, are co-extensive with those arising under treaties. In all of these cases the power is limited to questions arising "in law and equity," that is to say, to cases where jurisdiction is incidentally acquired in the ordinary administration of justice. But, as with regard to treaties, the Supreme Court has never assumed jurisdiction over questions arising between the sovereigns who are parties to it, so under the constitution they cannot assume jurisdiction over questions arising between the individual States and the United States.

If they should do so, they would be acting entirely out of their sphere. Umpires are indeed sometimes appointed by special agreement, but, in the case before us, there can be no pretence that the Supreme Court have been specially constituted umpires. But, if the judiciary are, from

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[JAN. 27, 1830.]

their character and the peculiar scope of their duties, unfit for the high office of deciding questions of sovereignty, much more strongly is the Supreme Court disqualified from assuming the umpirage between the States and the United States; because it is created by, and is indeed merely one of the departments of, the Federal Government. The United States have a Supreme Court; each State has also its Supreme Court. Both of them, in the ordinary administration of justice, must of necessity decide on the constitutionality of laws; but when it becomes a question of sovereignty between these two independent Governments, the subject matter is equally removed from the jurisdiction of both. If the Supreme Court of the United States can take cognizance of such a question, so can the Supreme Courts of the States. But, sir, can it be supposed for a moment, that, when the States proceeded to enter into the compact, called the constitution of the United States, they could have designed, nay, that they could, under any circumstances, have consented to leave to a court to be created by the Federal Government, the power to decide, finally, on the extent of the powers of the latter, and the limitations on the powers of the former? If it had been designed to do so, it would have been so declared, and assuredly some provision would have been made to secure, as umpires, a tribunal somewhat differently constituted from that whose appropriate duties is the ordinary administration of justice. But to prove, as I think conclusively, that the Judiciary were not designed to act as umpires, it is only necessary to observe that, in a great majority of cases, that court could manifestly not take jurisdiction of the matters in dispute. Whenever it may be designed by the Federal Government to commit a violation of the constitution, it can be done, and always will be done, in such a manner as to deprive the court of all jurisdiction over the subject. Take the case of the tariff and internal improvements; whether constitutional or unconstitutional, it is admitted that the Supreme Court have no jurisdiction. Suppose Congress should, for the acknowledged purpose of making an equal distribution of the property of the country, among States or individuals, proceed to lay taxes to the amount of fifty millions of dollars a year. Could the Supreme Court take cognizance of the act laying the tax, or making the distribution? Certainly not. Take another case, which is very likely to occur. Congress have the unlimited power of taxation. Suppose them also to assume an unlimited power of appropriation. Appropriations of money are made to establish presses, promote education, build and support churches, create an order of nobility, or any other unconstitutional object; it is manifest that, in none of these cases, could the constitutionality of the laws making those grants be tested before the Supreme Court. It would be in vain that a State should come before the judges with an act appropriating money to any of these objects, and ask of the court to decide whether these grants were constitutional. They could not even be heard; the court would say, they had nothing to do with it; and they would say rightly. It is idle, therefore, to talk of the Supreme Court affording any security to the States, in cases where their rights may be violated by the exercise of unconstitutional powers, on the part of the Federal Government. On this subject Mr. Madison, in his report, says: "But it is objected, that the judicial authority is to be regarded as the sole expositor of the constitution in the last resort; and it may be asked, for what reason the declaration by the General Assembly, supposing it to be theoretically true, could be required at the present day, and in so solemn a manner? On this objection it might be observed, first, that there may be instances of usurped power, which the forms of the constitution would never draw within the control of the Judicial Department: Secondly, that, if the decision of the Judiciary be raised above the authority of the sovereign parties to the constitution, the decisions of the other departments, not carried by the forms of the constitution before the Judiciary, must be equally authoritative and final with the decisions of that department. But the proper answer to the objection is, that the resolution of the General Assembly relates to those great and extraordinary cases in which all the forms of the constitution may prove ineffectual against infractions dangerous to the essential rights of the parties to it. The resolution supposes that dangerous powers, not delegated, may not only be usurped and executed by the other departments, but that the Judicial Department also may exercise or sanction dangerous powers beyond the grant of the constitution, and consequently, that the ultimate right of the parties to the constitution to judge whether the compact has been dangerously violated, must extend to violations by one delegated authority, as well as by another—by the Judiciary as well as by the Executive or Legislative.

"However true, therefore, it may be, that the Judicial Department is, in all questions submitted to it by the forms of the constitution, to decide in the last resort, this resort must necessarily be deemed the last in relation to the authorities of the other departments of the Government; not in relation to the rights of the parties to the constitutional compact, from which the judicial as well as the other departments hold their delegated trusts. On any other hypothesis the delegation of judicial power would annul the authority delegating it; and the concurrence of this department with the others in usurped powers, might subvert forever, and beyond the possible reach of any rightful remedy, the very constitution which all were instituted to preserve."

If, then, the Supreme Court are not, and, from their organization, cannot, be the umpires in questions of conflicting sovereignty, the next point to be considered is, whether Congress themselves possess the right of deciding conclusively on the extent of their own powers. This I know is a popular notion, and it is founded on the idea that, as all the States are represented here, nothing can prevail which is not in conformity with the will of the majority; and it is supposed to be a republican maxim "that the majority must govern." Now, sir, I admit that much care has been taken to secure the States and the people from rash and unadvised legislation. The organization of two houses, the one the Representatives of the States, and the other of the people, manifest an anxiety to secure equality and justice in the operation of the federal system. But all this has done no more than to secure us against any laws but such as should be assented to by a majority of the Representatives in the two Houses of Congress.

Now will any one contend that it is the true spirit of this Government that the will of a majority of Congress should, in all cases, be the supreme law? If no security was intended to be provided for the rights of the States, and the liberty of the citizen, beyond the mere organization of the Federal Government, we should have had no written constitution, but Congress would have been authorized to legislate for us, in all cases whatsoever; and the acts of our State Legislatures, like those of the present legislative councils in the Territories, would have been subjected to the revision and control of Congress. If the will of a majority of Congress is to be the supreme law of the land, it is clear the constitution is a dead letter, and has utterly failed of the very object for which it was designed—the protection of the rights of the minority. But when, by the very terms of the compact, strict limitations are imposed on every branch of the Federal Government, and it is, moreover, expressly declared that all powers, not granted to them, "are reserved to the States or to the people," with what show of reason can it be contended that the Federal Government is to be the exclusive judge of the extent of its own powers? A written constitution was resorted to in this country, as a great experiment, for the purpose of ascertaining how far the rights of a minority could be secured against the encroachments of majorities—often acting under party excitement, and not unfrequently under the influence of strong interests. The moment that constitution was formed, the will of the majority ceased to be the law, except in cases that should be acknowledged by the parties to it, to be within the constitution, and to have been thereby submitted to their will. But when Congress (exercising a delegated and strictly limited authority) pass beyond these limits, their acts become null and void, and must be declared to be so by the courts, in cases within their jurisdiction; and may be pronounced to be so by the States themselves, in cases not within the jurisdiction of the courts, or of sufficient importance to justify such an interference. I will put the case strongly. Suppose, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, the Federal Government, in its three ruling branches, should (at some future day) be found “to be in combination to strip their colleagues, the State authorities, of the powers reserved by them, and to exercise themselves all powers, foreign and domestic,” would there be no constitutional remedy against such an usurpation? If so, then Congress is supreme, and your constitution is not worth the parchment on which it is written. What the gentleman calls the right of revolution would exist, and could be exerted as well, without a constitution as with it.

It is in vain to tell us that all the States are represented here. Representation may, or may not, afford security to the people. The only practical security against oppression, in representative Governments, is to be found in this, that those who impose the burthens are compelled to share them. Where there are conflicting interests, however, and a majority are enabled to impose burthens on the minority, for their own advantage, it is obvious that representation, on the part of that minority, can have no other effect than to “furnish an apology for the injustice.” What security would a representation of the American colonies in the British Parliament have afforded to our ancestors? What would be the value of a West India representation there now? Of what value is our representation here, on questions connected with the “American System,” where (to use the strong language of a distinguished statesman) the “imposition is laid, not by the Representatives of those who pay the tax, but by the Representatives of those who are to receive the bounty?” Sir, representation will afford us ample security, if the Federal Government shall be strictly confined within the limits prescribed by the constitution, and if, limiting its action to matters in which all have a common interest, the system shall be made to operate equally over the whole country. But it will afford us none if the will of an interested majority shall be the supreme law, and Congress shall undertake to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever. Before I leave this branch of the subject, I must remark, that, while gentlemen admit, as they do, that the courts may nullify an act of Congress, by declaring it to be unconstitutional, it is impossible for them to contend that Congress are the final judges of the extent of their own powers.

I think I have now shown that the right of a State to judge of infractions of the constitution, on the part of the Federal Government, results from the very nature of the compact; and that, neither by the express provisions of that instrument, nor by any fair implication, is such a power exclusively reserved to the Federal Government, or any of its Departments—executive, legislative, or judicial. But I go farther, and contend that the power in question may be fairly considered as reserved to the States, by that clause of the constitution before referred to, which provides that all powers not delegated to the United States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

No doubt can exist, that, before the States entered into the compact, they possessed the right, to the fullest extent, of determining the limits of their own powers—it is incident to all sovereignty. Now, have they given away that right, or agreed to limit or restrict it in any respect? Assuredly not. They have agreed that certain specific powers shall be exercised by the Federal Government; but the moment that government steps beyond the limits of its charter, the right of the States “to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them,” is as full and complete as it was before the constitution was formed. It was plenary then, and never having been surrendered, must be plenary now. But what then, asks the gentleman? A State is brought into collision with the United States, in relation to the exercise of unconstitutional powers: who is to decide between them? Sir, it is the common case of difference of opinion between sovereigns as to the true construction of a compact. Does such a difference of opinion necessarily produce war? No. And if not, among rival nations, why should it do so among friendly States? In all such cases, some mode must be devised by mutual agreement, for settling the difficulty; and most happily for us, that mode is clearly indicated in the constitution itself, and results, indeed, from the very form and structure of the Government. The creating power is three-fourths of the States. By their decision, the parties to the compact have agreed to be bound, even to the extent of changing the entire form of the Government itself; and it follows, of necessity, that, in case of a deliberate and settled difference of opinion between the parties to the compact, as to the extent of the powers of either, resort must be had to their common superior—(that power which may give any character to the constitution they may think proper) viz: three-fourths of the States. This is the view of the matter taken by Mr. Jefferson himself, who, in 1821, expressed himself in this emphatic manner: “It is a fatal heresy to suppose that either our State Governments are superior to the Federal, or the Federal to the State; neither is authorized literally to decide what belongs to itself, or its co-partner in government, in difference of opinion between their different sets of public servants; the appeal is to neither, but to their employers, peaceably assembled by their representatives in convention.”

But it has been asked, why not compel a State, objecting to the constitutionality of a law, to appeal to her sister States, by a proposition to amend the constitution? I answer, because such a course would, in the first instance, admit the exercise of an unconstitutional authority, which the States are not bound to submit to, even for a day, and because it would be absurd to suppose that any redress could ever be obtained by such an appeal, even if a State were at liberty to make it. If a majority of both Houses of Congress should, from any motive, be induced, deliberately, to exercise “powers not granted,” what prospect would there be of “arresting the progress of the evil,” by a vote of three-fourths? But the constitution does not permit a minority to submit to the people a proposition for an amendment to the constitution. Such a proposition can only come from “two-thirds of the two Houses of Congress, or the Legislatures of two-thirds of the States.” It will be seen, therefore, at once, that a minority, whose constitutional rights are violated, can have no redress by an amendment of the constitution. When any State is brought into direct collision with the Federal Government, in the case of an attempt, by the latter, to exercise unconstitutional powers, the appeal must be made by Congress, (the party proposing to exert the disputed power) in order to have it expressly conferred, and, until so conferred, the exercise of such authority must be suspended. Even in cases of doubt, such an appeal is due to the peace and harmony of the Government. On this subject our present Chief Magistrate, in his opening message to Congress, says: "I regard an appeal to the source of power, in cases of real doubt, and where its exercise is deemed indispensable to the general welfare, as among the most sacred of all our obligations. Upon this country, more than any other, has, in the providence of God, been cast the especial guardianship of the great principle of adherence to written constitutions. If it fail here, all hope in regard to it will be extinguished. That this was intended to be a Government of limited and specific, and not general powers, must be admitted by all; and it is our duty to preserve for it the character intended by its framers. The scheme has worked well. It has exceeded the hopes of those who devised it, and become an object of admiration to the world. Nothing is clearer, in my view, than that we are chiefly indebted for the success of the constitution under which we are now acting, to the watchful and auxiliary operation of the State authorities. This is not the reflection of a day, but belongs to the most deeply rooted convictions of my mind. I cannot, therefore, too strongly or too earnestly, for my own sense of its importance, warn you against all encroachments upon the legitimate sphere of State sovereignty. Sustained by its healthful and invigorating influence, the Federal system can never fail."

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

But the gentleman apprehends that this will "make the Union a rope of sand." Sir, I have shown that it is a power indispensably necessary to the preservation of the constitutional rights of the States, and of the people. I now proceed to show that it is perfectly safe, and will practically have no effect, but to keep the Federal Government within the limits of the constitution, and prevent those unwarrantable assumptions of power, which cannot fail to impair the rights of the States, and finally destroy the Union itself. This is a Government of checks and balances. All free Governments must be so. The whole organization and regulation of every department of the Federal as well as of the State Governments, establish, beyond a doubt, that it was the first object of the great fathers of our Federal system to interpose effectual checks to prevent that over-action, which is the besetting sin of all Governments, and which has been the great enemy to freedom over all the world. There is an obvious and wide distinction between the power of acting, and of preventing action—a distinction running through the whole of our system. No one can question that, in all really doubtful cases, it would be extremely desirable to leave things as they are. And how happy would it be for mankind, and how greatly would it contribute to the peace and tranquillity of this country, and to that mutual harmony on which the preservation of the Union must depend, that the Federal Government (confining its operations to subjects clearly federal) should only be felt in the blessings which it dispenses. Look, sir, at our system of checks. The House of Representatives checks the Senate, the Senate checks the House, the Executive checks both, the Judiciary checks the whole; and it is in the true spirit of this system, that the States should check the Federal Government, at least so far as to preserve the constitution from "gross, palpable, and deliberate violations," and to compel an appeal to the amending power, in cases of real doubt and difficulty. That the States possess this right seems to be acknowledged by Alexander Hamilton himself. In the 51st number of the Federalist he says, "that, in a single republic, all the powers surrendered by the people are submitted to the administration of a single government, and usurpations are guarded against by a division of the government into separate departments. In the compound republic of America, the power surrendered by the people is first divided between two distinct governments, and then the portion allotted to each, subdivided into separate departments; hence a double security arises to the rights of the people. The different governments will control each other, at the same time each will be controlled by itself."

I have already shown, that it has been fully recognized by the Virginia resolutions of '98, and by Mr. Madison's report on these resolutions, that it is not only "the right but the duty of the States" to "judge of infractions of the constitution," and "to interpose for maintaining, within their limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them."

Mr. Jefferson, on various occasions, expressed himself in language equally strong. In the Kentucky resolutions, of '98, prepared by him, it is declared that the Federal Government "was not made the exclusive and final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself, since that would have made its discretion, and not the constitution, the measure of its powers; but that, as in all other cases of compact among parties, having no common judge, each party has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of infractions as the mode and measure of redress."

In the Kentucky resolutions of '98, it is even more explicitly declared, "that the several States which formed the constitution, being sovereign and independent, have the unquestionable right to judge of its infractions, and that a nullification by those sovereignties of all unauthorized acts done under color of that instrument is the right-ful remedy."

But the gentleman says this right will be dangerous. Sir, I insist, that, of all the checks that have been provided by the constitution, this is by far the safest, and the least liable to abuse. It is admitted by the gentleman, that the Supreme Court may declare a law to be unconstitutional, and check your further progress. Now, the Supreme Court consists of only seven judges; four are a quorum, three of whom are a majority, and may exercise this mighty power. Now, the judges of this court are without any direct responsibility, in matters of opinion, and may certainly be governed by any of the motives which it is supposed will influence a State in opposing the acts of the Federal Government. Sir, it is not my desire to excite prejudice against the Supreme Court. I not only entertain the highest respect for the individuals who compose that tribunal, but I believe they have rendered important services to the country; and that, confined within their appropriate sphere, (the decision of questions "of law and equity") they will constitute a fountain from which will forever flow the streams of pure and undefiled justice, diffusing blessings throughout the land. I object, only, to the assumption of political power, by the Supreme Court—a power which belongs not to them, and which they cannot safely exercise. But, surely, a power which the gentleman is willing to confide to three judges of the Supreme Court, may safely be entrusted to a sovereign State. Sir, there are so many powerful motives to restrain a State from taking such high ground as to interpose her sovereign power to protect her citizens from unconstitutional laws, that the danger is not that this power will be wantonly exercised, but that she will fail to exert it, even on proper occasions.

A State will be restrained by a sincere love of the Union. The people of the United States cherish a devotion to the Union, so pure, so ardent, that nothing short of intolerable oppression can ever tempt them to do any thing that may possibly endanger it. Sir, there exists, moreover, a deep and settled conviction of the benefits which result from a close connexion of all the States for purposes of mutual protection and defence. This will co-operate with the feelings of patriotism to induce a State to avoid any measures calculated to endanger that connexion. A State will always feel the necessity of consulting public opinion, both at home and abroad, before she resorts to any measures of such a character. She will know that, if she acts rashly, she will be abandoned even by her own citizens, and will utterly fail in the object she has in view. If, as is asserted in the Declaration of Independence, all experience has proved that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to resort to measures for redress, why should this case be an exception, where so many additional motives must always be found for forbearance? Look at our own experience on this subject. Virginia and Kentucky, so far back as '98, avowed the principles for which I have been contending—principles which have never since been abandoned; and no instance has yet occurred in which it has been found necessary, practically, to exert the power asserted in those resolutions.

If the alien and sedition laws had not been yielded to the force of public opinion, there can be no doubt that the State of Virginia would have interposed to protect her citizens from its operation. And, if the apprehension of such an interposition by a State should have the effect of restraining the Federal Government from acting, except in cases clearly within the limits of their authority, surely no one can doubt the beneficial operation of such a restraining influence. Mr. Jefferson assures us that the embargo was actually yielded up, rather than force New England into open opposition to it. And it was right to yield it, sir, to the honest convictions of its unconstitutionality entertained by so large a portion of our fellow-citizens. If the knowledge that the States possess the constitutional right to interpose, in the event of "gross, deliberate, and palpable violations of the constitution," should operate to prevent a perseverance in such violations, surely the effect would be greatly to be desired. But there is one point of view in which this matter presents itself to my mind with irresistible force. The Supreme Court, it is admitted, may nullify an act of Congress, by declaring it to be unconstitutional. Can Congress, after such a nullification, proceed to enforce the law, even if they should differ in opinion from the Court? What, then, would be the effect of such a decision? And what would be the remedy in such a case? Congress would be arrested in the exercise of the disputed power, and the only remedy would be an appeal to the creating power, three-fourths of the States, for an amendment of the constitution. And by whom must such an appeal be made? It must be made by the party proposing to exercise the disputed power. Now I will ask whether a sovereign State may not be safely entrusted with the exercise of a power, operating merely as a check, which is admitted to belong to the Supreme Court, and which may be exercised every day, by any three of its members? Sir, no ideas that can be formed of arbitrary power on the one hand, and abject dependence on the other, can be carried further than to suppose that three individuals, mere men, "subject to like passions with ourselves," may be safely entrusted with the power to nullify an act of Congress, because they conceive it to be unconstitutional; but that a sovereign and independent State, even the great State of New York, is bound, implicitly, to submit to its operation, even where it violates, in the grossest manner, her own rights, or the liberties of her citizens. But we do not contend that a common case would justify the interposition.

This is "the extreme medicine of the State," and cannot become our daily bread.

Mr. Madison, in his report, says: "It does not follow, however, that, because the States, as sovereign parties to their constitutional compact, must ultimately decide whether it has been violated; that such a decision ought to be interposed either in a hasty manner, or on doubtful and inferior occasions. Even in the case of ordinary conventions, between different nations, where, by the strict rule of interpretation, a breach of a part may be deemed a breach of the whole; every part being deemed a condition of every other part, and of the whole, it is always laid down, that the breach must be both wilful and material, to justify an application of the rule. But in the case of an intimate and constitutional Union, like that of the United States, it is evident that the interposition of the parties, in their sovereign capacity, can be called for by occasions, only, deeply and essentially affecting the vital principles of their political systems."

"The resolution has, accordingly, guarded against any misapprehension of its object, by expressly requiring, for such an interposition, 'the case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous breach of the constitution, by the exercise of powers not granted by it.' It must be a case, not of a light and transient nature, but of a nature dangerous to the great purposes for which the constitution was established. It must be a case, moreover, not obscure or doubtful in its construction, but plain and palpable. Lastly, it must be a case, not resulting from a partial consideration, or hasty determination, but a case stamped with a final consideration and deliberate adherence. It is not necessary, because the resolution does not require that the question should be discussed how far the exercise of any particular power, ungranted by the constitution, would justify the interposition of the parties to it; as cases might easily be stated which none would contend ought to fall within that description, and cases, on the other hand, might, with equal ease, be stated, so flagrant and so fatal, as to unite every opinion in placing them within the description."

"But the resolution has done more than guard against misconstruction, by expressly referring to cases of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous nature. It specifies the object of the interposition which it contemplates, to be, solely, that of arresting the progress of the evil of usurpation, and of maintaining the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to the States, as parties to the constitution."

No one can read this without perceiving that Mr. Madison goes the whole length in support of the principles for which I have been contending.

The gentleman has called upon us to carry out our scheme practically. Now, sir, if I am correct in my view of this matter, then it follows, of course, that the right of a State being established, the Federal Government is bound to acquiesce in a solemn decision of a State, acting in its sovereign capacity, at least so far as to make an appeal to the people for an amendment to the constitution. This solemn decision of a State (made either through its Legislature, or a convention, as may be supposed to be the proper organ of its sovereign will—a point I do not propose now to discuss) binds the Federal Government, under the highest constitutional obligation, not to resort to any means of coercion against the citizens of the dissenting State. How, then, can any collision ensue between the Federal and State Governments, unless, indeed, the former should determine to enforce the law by unconstitutional means? What could the Federal Government do, in such a case? Resort, says the gentleman, to the courts of justice. Now, can any man believe that, in the face of a solemn decision of a State, that an act of Congress is "a gross, palpable, and deliberate violation of the constitution," and the interposition of its sovereign authority to protect its citizens from the usurpation, that juries could be found ready merely to register the decrees of the Congress, wholly regardless of the unconstitutional character of their acts? Will the gentleman contend that juries are to be coerced to find verdicts at the point of the bayonet? And if not, how are the United States to enforce an act solemnly pronounced to be unconstitutional? But, if the attempt should be made to carry such a law into effect, by force, in what would the case differ from an attempt to carry into effect an act nullified by the courts, or to do any other unlawful and unwarrantable act? Suppose Congress should pass an agrarian law, or a law emancipating our slaves, or should commit any other gross violation of our constitutional rights, will any gentleman contend that the decision of every branch of the Federal Government, in favor of such laws, could prevent the States from declaring them null and void, and protecting their citizens from their operation?

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[JAN. 27, 1830.]

Sir, if Congress should ever attempt to enforce any such laws, they would put themselves so clearly in the wrong, that no one could doubt the right of the State to exert its protecting power.

Sir, the gentleman has alluded to that portion of the militia of South Carolina with which I have the honor to be connected, and asked how they would act in the event of the nullification of the tariff law by the State of South Carolina? The tone of the gentleman, on this subject, did not seem to me as respectful as I could have desired. I hope, sir, no imputation was intended.

[Mr. WEBSTER. "Not at all; just the reverse."]

Well, sir, the gentleman asks what their leaders would be able to read to them out of Coke upon Littleton, or any other law book, to justify their enterprise? Sir, let me assure the gentleman that, whenever any attempt shall be made from any quarter, to enforce unconstitutional laws, clearly violating our essential rights, our leaders (whoever they may be) will not be found reading black letter from the musty pages of old law books. They will look to the constitution, and when called upon, by the sovereign authority of the State, to preserve and protect the rights secured to them by the charter of their liberties, they will succeed in defending them, or "perish in the last ditch."

Sir, I will put the case home to the gentleman. Is there any violation of the constitutional rights of the States, and the liberties of the citizen, (sanctioned by Congress and the Supreme Court) which he would believe it to be the right and duty of a State to resist? Does he contend for the doctrine of "passive obedience and non-resistance?" Would he justify an open resistance to an act of Congress sanctioned by the courts, which should abolish the trial by jury, or destroy the freedom of religion, or the freedom of the press? Yes, sir, he would advocate resistance in such cases; and so would I, and so would all of us. But such resistance would, according to his doctrine, be revolution; it would be rebellion. According to my opinion, it would be just, legal, and constitutional resistance. The whole difference between us, then, consists in this. The gentleman would make force the only arbiter in all cases of collision between the States and the Federal Government. I would resort to a peaceful remedy, the interposition of the State to "arrest the progress of the evil," until such time as "a convention (assembled at the call of Congress, or two thirds of the States) shall decide to which they mean to give an authority claimed by two of their organs." Sir, I say with Mr. Jefferson, (whose words I have here borrowed) that "it is the peculiar wisdom and felicity of our constitution to have provided this peaceable appeal, where that of other nations" (and I may add that of the gentleman) "is at once to force."

The gentleman has made an eloquent appeal to our hearts in favor of union. Sir, I cordially respond to that appeal. I will yield to no gentleman here in sincere attachment to the Union; but it is a union founded on the constitution, and not such a union as that gentleman would give us, that is dear to my heart. If this is to become one great "consolidated Government," swallowing up the rights of the States, and the liberties of the citizen, "riding over the plundered ploughmen and beggared yeomanry," the Union will not be worth preserving. Sir, it is because South Carolina loves the Union, and would preserve it forever, that she is opposing now, while there is hope, those usurpations of the Federal Government which, once established, will, sooner or later, tear this Union into fragments. The gentleman is for marching under a banner, studded all over with stars, and bearing the inscription Liberty and Union. I had thought, sir, the gentleman would have borne a standard, displaying in its ample folds a brilliant sun, extending its golden rays from the centre to the extremities, in the brightness of whose beams the "little stars hide their diminished heads." Our's, sir, is the banner of the constitution: the twenty-four stars are there, in all their undiminished lustre: on it is inscribed, Liberty—the Constitution—Union. We offer up our fervent prayers to the Father of all Mercies that it may continue to wave, for ages yet to come, over a free, a happy, and a united people.

Mr. WEBSTER now took the floor, in conclusion, and said: A few words, Mr. President, on this constitutional argument, which the honorable gentleman has labored to reconstruct.

His argument consists of two propositions, and an inference. His propositions are—

1. That the constitution is a compact between the States.
2. That a compact between two, with authority reserved to one to interpret its terms, would be a surrender to that one, of all power whatever.
3. Therefore, (such is his inference) the General Government does not possess the authority to construe its own powers.

Now, sir, who does not see, without the aid of exposition or detection, the utter confusion of ideas, involved in this, so elaborate and systematic argument?

The constitution, it is said, is a compact between States; the States, then, and the States only, are parties to the compact. How comes the General Government itself a party? Upon the honorable gentleman's hypothesis, the General Government is the result of the compact, the creature of the compact, not one of the parties to it. Yet the argument, as the gentleman has now stated it, makes the Government itself one of its own creators. It makes it a party to that compact to which it owes its own existence.

For the purpose of erecting the constitution on the basis of a compact, the gentleman considers the States as parties to that compact; but as soon as his compact is made, then he chooses to consider the General Government, which is the offspring of that compact, not its offspring, but one of its parties; and so, being a party, has not the power of judging on the terms of compact. Pray, sir, in what school is such reasoning as this taught?

If the whole of the gentleman's main proposition were conceded to him, that is to say—if I admit for the sake of the argument, that the constitution is a compact between States, the inferences which he draws from that proposition are warranted by no just reason. Because, if the constitution be a compact between States, still, that constitution, or that compact, has established a Government, with certain powers; and whether it be one of those powers, that it shall construe and interpret for itself the terms of the compact, in doubtful cases, can only be decided by looking to the compact, and inquiring what provisions it contains on this point. Without any inconsistency with natural reason, the Government, even thus created, might be trusted with this power of construction. The extent of its powers, therefore, must still be sought for in the instrument itself.

If the old confederation had contained a clause, declaring that resolutions of the Congress should be the supreme law of the land, any State law or constitution to the contrary notwithstanding; and that a committee of Congress, or any other body created by it, should possess judicial powers, extending to all cases arising under resolutions of Congress, then the power of ultimate decision would have been vested in Congress, under the confederation, although that confederation was a compact between States; and for this plain reason, that it would have been competent to the States, who alone were parties to the compact, to agree who should decide in cases of dispute arising on the construction of the compact.

For the same reason, sir, if I were now to concede to the gentleman his principal propositions, viz. that the constitution is a compact between States, the question would still be, what provision is made, in this compact, to settle

Political History—Mr. Bayard.

points of disputed construction, or contested power, that shall come into controversy? And this question would still be answered, and conclusively answered, by the constitution itself. While the gentleman is contending against construction, he himself is setting up the most loose and dangerous construction. The constitution declares that the laws of Congress shall be the supreme law of the land. No construction is necessary here. It declares, also, with equal plainness and precision, that the judicial power of the United States shall extend to every case arising under the laws of Congress. This needs no construction. Here is a law, then, which is declared to be supreme; and here is a power established, which is to interpret that law. Now, sir, how has the gentleman met this? Suppose the constitution to be a compact, yet here are its terms, and how does the gentleman get rid of them? He cannot argue the seal off the bond, nor the words out of the instrument. Here they are—what answer does he give to them? None in the world, sir, except that the effect of this would be to place the States in a condition of inferiority; and because it results, from the very nature of things, there being no superior, that the parties must be their own judges! Thus closely and cogently does the honorable gentleman reason on the words of the constitution. The gentleman says, if there be such a power of final decision in the General Government, he asks for the grant of that power. Well, sir, I show him the grant—I turn him to the very words—I show him that the laws of Congress are made supreme; and that the judicial power extends, by express words, to the interpretation of these laws. Instead of answering this, he retreats into the general reflection, that it must result, from the nature of things, that the States, being parties, must judge for themselves.

I have admitted, that, if the constitution were to be considered as the creature of the State Governments, it might be modified, interpreted, or construed, according to their pleasure. But, even in that case, it would be necessary that they should agree. One, alone, could not interpret it conclusively; one, alone, could not construe it; one, alone, could not modify it. Yet the gentleman's doctrine is, that Carolina, alone, may construe and interpret that compact which equally binds all, and gives equal rights to all.

So then, sir, even supposing the constitution to be a compact between the States, the gentleman's doctrine, nevertheless, is not maintainable; because, first, the General Government is not a party to that compact, but a Government established by it, and vested by it with the powers of trying and deciding doubtful questions; and, secondly, because, if the constitution be regarded as a compact, not one State only, but all the States, are parties to that compact, and one can have no right to fix upon it her own peculiar construction.

So much, sir, for the argument, even if the premises of the gentleman were granted, or could be proved. But, sir, the gentleman has failed to maintain his leading proposition. He has not shown, it cannot be shown, that the constitution is a compact between State Governments. The constitution itself, in its very front, refutes that proposition: it declares that it is ordained and established by the people of the United States. So far from saying that it is established by the Governments of the several States, it does not even say that it is established by the people of the several States; but it pronounces that it is established by the people of the United States in the aggregate. The gentleman says, it must mean no more than that the people of the several States, taken collectively, constitute the people of the United States; be it so, but it is in this, their collective capacity; it is as all the people of the United States that they establish the constitution. So they declare; and words cannot be plainer than the words used.

When the gentleman says the constitution is a compact between the States, he uses language exactly applicable to the old confederation. He speaks as if he were in Congress before 1789. He describes fully that old state of things then existing. The confederation was, in strictness, a compact; the States, as States, were parties to it. We had no other General Government. But that was found insufficient, and inadequate to the public exigencies. The people were not satisfied with it, and undertook to establish a better. They undertook to form a General Government, which should stand on a new basis—not a confederacy, not a league, not a compact between States, but a constitution; a popular Government, founded in popular election, directly responsible to the people themselves, and divided into branches, with prescribed limits of power, and prescribed duties. They ordained such a Government; they gave it the name of a constitution, and therein they established a distribution of powers between this, their General Government, and their several State Governments. When they shall become dissatisfied with this distribution, they can alter it. Their own power over their own instrument remains. But, until they shall alter it, it must stand as their will, and is equally binding on the General Government and on the States.

The gentleman, sir, finds analogy, where I see none. He likens it to the case of a treaty, in which, there being no common superior, each party must interpret for itself, under its own obligation of good faith. But this is not a treaty, but a constitution of Government, with powers to execute itself, and fulfil its duties.

I admit, sir, that this Government is a Government of checks and balances; that is, the House of Representatives is a check on the Senate, and the Senate is a check on the House, and the President is a check on both. But I cannot comprehend him, or, if I do, I totally differ from him, when he applies the notion of checks and balances to the interference of different Governments. He argues that, if we transgress, each State, as a State, has a right to check us. Does he admit the converse of the proposition, that we have a right to check the States? The gentleman's doctrines would give us a strange jumble of authorities and powers, instead of Governments of separate and defined powers. It is the part of wisdom, I think, to avoid this; and to keep the General Government and the State Governments, each in its proper sphere, avoiding, as carefully as possible, every kind of interference.

Finally, sir, the honorable gentleman says, that the States will only interfere, by their power, to preserve the constitution. They will not destroy it, they will not impair it—they will only save, they will only preserve, they will only strengthen it! Ah, sir, this is but the old story. All regulated Governments, all free Governments, have been broken up by similar disinterested and well disposed interference! It is the common pretence. But I take leave of the subject.

[Here the debate closed for this day.]

THURSDAY, JANUARY 28, 1830.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution moved by Mr. FOOT—Mr. BENTON being entitled to the floor.

POLITICAL HISTORY—MR. BAYARD.

Mr. CLAYTON said that he desired the permission of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] to call the attention of two of the honorable members of this body, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Louisiana, to a passage in a book which had been cited in this debate by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAYNE] as authority on another subject. He did not rise for the purpose of discussing the resolution itself. In the wide range of the debate here, the Northeastern and Southern sections of the country had been arrayed against each other. He listened to the discussion without any intention of participating in it, while the State which he had the honor, in part, to represent, had escaped unscathed by the controversy. Though favorable to the resolution, as a mere proposition to inquire, he felt but little interest in such contentions between the North and South; and his only desire in relation to that subject was, that the warmth of the discussion might have no tendency to alienate one portion of our country from the other. But his attention had been called, by a number of members of the Senate, to a passage in the same book; another part of which had been referred to by the Senator from South Carolina. That passage charged an illustrious statesman, who formerly occupied the seat of a Senator here, and whose memory and fame were dear to himself and to the people he represented, with atrocious corruption, of which he was convinced that great and good man could never have been guilty; and as the witnesses referred to in the book itself were present, and ready to give testimony to set the charge at rest, he hoped he should be pardoned for referring to the objectionable passage in their presence.

He then read, from the fourth volume of Jefferson's Memoirs, page 515, (the same volume which had been brought into the Senate by General HAYNE) the following passage:

"FEBRUARY THE 12TH, 1801.—Edward Livingston tells me that Bayard applied to-day, or last night, to General Samuel Smith, and represented to him the expediency of his coming over to the States who vote for Burr; that there was nothing in the way of appointment which he might not command, and particularly mentioned the Secretaryship of the Navy. Smith asked him if he was authorized to make the offer. He said he was authorized. Smith told this to Livingston, and to W. C. Nicholas, who confirms it to me," &c.

Mr. CLAYTON then called upon the Senators from Maryland and Louisiana, referred to in this passage, to disprove the statement here made.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, rose and said, that he had read the paragraph before he came here to-day, and was, therefore, aware of its import. He had not the most distant recollection that Mr. Bayard had ever made such a proposition to him. Mr. Bayard [said he] and myself, though politically opposed, were intimate personal friends, and he was an honorable man. Of all men Mr. Bayard would have been the last to make such a proposition to any man; and I am confident that he had too much respect for me to have made it, under any circumstances. I never received from any man, any such proposition.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Louisiana, said, that, as to the precise question which had been put to him by the Senator from Delaware, he must say, that, having taxed his recollection as far as it could go, on so remote a transaction, he had no remembrance of it.

Mr. CLAYTON said his purpose had been achieved. He thought it his duty to vindicate the honor and fame of his predecessors against unjustifiable imputations, no matter to what party they may have belonged. The character of the illustrious Bayard would, he trusted, stand forever untarnished by the charge of corruption. He should have thought himself recreant in duty to the people of the State he, in part, represented, to the memory of one who once filled the same place which he now occupied, if he had not seized the first opportunity in his power, after the public appearance of this volume on the floor of the Senate, to disprove the charges to which he had this day called their attention. He thought there were other charges in that volume against other distinguished men of this country, equally unfounded. [Subsequently, upon some remarks from Mr. BENTON, he said, he wished it to be distinctly understood, that it was no part of his purpose to tarnish the fame of Mr. Jefferson. His object was not accusative, but entirely exculpatory.]

Mr. BENTON entered his protest against this mode of introducing extraneous questions here, and regretted that he had given way to Mr. CLAYTON, for a purpose to which, he said, he would not have been instrumental, could he have anticipated it. Mr. B. then proceeded in his speech commenced on the 20th of January, but, before he concluded, he was induced to give way for a motion for adjournment.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 29, 1830.

The Senate, after discussing a resolution authorizing a subscription on the part of the Senate to a proposed compilation of Public Documents by Gales and Seaton, adjourned over to Monday.

MONDAY, FEB. 1, 1830.

POLITICAL HISTORY—MR. BAYARD.

Mr. BENTON was entitled to the floor, but

Mr. HAYNE rose and said, before the Senator from Missouri proceeded further in the debate, he considered it his duty to notice an occurrence which had taken place here, when this subject was last under consideration. An honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON] rose in his place, and, taking up a volume of Jefferson's Memoirs, which I had introduced into this chamber, read a passage implicating the late Mr. Bayard in an attempt to bring over General Samuel Smith, of Maryland, to the support of Colonel Burr, in the celebrated political contest of 1801. The gentleman then appealed to the Senators from Maryland and Louisiana, [Mr. SMITH and Mr. LIVINGSTON] to say whether they had any recollection of the occurrence to which Mr. Jefferson alludes, and those gentlemen having replied in the negative, the Senator from Delaware then stated, that he now considered the vindication of Mr. Bayard to be complete, and went on to make some remarks, which I did not distinctly hear, but which have been supposed, contrary, I must presume, to that gentleman's intention, to cast imputation on the reputation, and even on the veracity of Mr. Jefferson. I find too, sir, that an impression has gone abroad, that I had myself referred to, and relied on, the very passage in which Mr. Bayard is supposed to be implicated. It is my present object [said Mr. B.] to correct these errors; and to prevent any possible misconstruction either as to my own course, or that of the gentleman from Delaware. I referred to the Memoirs of Mr. Jefferson for the purpose of availing myself of his political principles, and declared opinions, in relation to the tariff, and Internal Improvements, and the great question of State rights, then in controversy between the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] and myself. I relied on the authority of Mr. Jefferson but for a single fact, incidentally introduced into the debate, which was, that Mr. Adams had informed him of certain designs on the part of the New England Federalists, for a dissolution of the Union, during the embargo. That such a communication was actually made to Mr. Jefferson, has been publicly acknowledged by Mr. Adams himself. For the memory of Mr. Bayard, I have always entertained too much respect to have permitted me to mention his name otherwise than with becoming respect. I had early learned to respect that gentleman, from his high character and public services; and I was taught to revere his memory by my friend from Delaware, [Mr. McLANE] who sat so long by my side in this chamber, and who is now doing honor to himself and his country in one of our highest diplomatic trusts abroad. But, sir, without proposing to enter into the examination of the question, I will merely remark, that I think the memorandum made by Mr. Jefferson, 12th February, 1801, is susceptible of an easy explanation, without the impeachment of any of the parties. For my own part, I can have no doubt, when Mr. Jefferson made the entry in his note book, on the very day on which the transaction took place, that he actually received the impression which he states from the conversation of one at least of the gentlemen named; and yet, sir, what can be more natural than to suppose that a loose and careless conversation, reaching Mr. Jefferson through circuitous channels, may have been entirely misunderstood? A familiar, a pleasant conversation, between Mr. Bayard and his friend General Smith, on the political prospects of the latter gentleman, (then as bright as those of any man in the country) repeated by him carelessly, or probably in jest, may have for a short time made an impression on the minds of Mr. Livingston and Wilson Cary Nicholas, which these gentlemen, or one of them, assuredly conveyed to Mr. Jefferson. Sir, a very few days probably cleared up the mystery, and put all matters right, and therefore it was immediately forgotten by the parties concerned. This explanation is to my mind entirely satisfactory. I do not make these remarks because I suppose any vindication of the reputation of Mr. Jefferson to be necessary. That rests on a foundation that cannot be shaken. The time was, sir, when a large portion of the people were taught to believe that Mr. Jefferson was destitute of every principle, political, moral, and religious: while, by his political friends, no man was ever so much admired, respected, and beloved, he was feared, and hated, slandered, and reviled, by his enemies. In one respect, however, he was certainly the most fortunate of men. Not having out-lived the gratitude and affection of his friends, he lived down the hostility of his enemies. Time and opportunity convinced all parties, that, in that great and good man were found, in happy combination, all those extraordinary endowments, and rare virtues, which made him an honor to the age in which he lived. Sir, he descended to the tomb, not only "full of years and full of honors," but occupying, at the moment when he closed his mortal career, the very first place in the hearts of millions of freemen.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

Mr. CLAYTON said that he had already announced his intention in regard to this matter to have been entirely exculpatory; but he was willing to avail himself of another opportunity of making the same declaration, to prevent any misapprehension. On Thursday, while this resolution was under consideration, and before the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had commenced his reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, he desired permission to put a question to the gentlemen from Maryland and Louisiana, for the purpose of correcting an error in a volume cited in the debate, which, on account of the extraordinary imputation it cast upon the memory of one now in his grave, who held a distinguished rank among the statesmen of this country, had become the subject of general conversation here, and to which his attention had been repeatedly called by other gentlemen. He at that time saw the gentlemen from Maryland and Louisiana in their seats; and as so favorable an opportunity then offered of removing the effects of an error, which, without their evidence, could never be so satisfactorily corrected, he chose to avail himself of it. My object [said Mr. C.] was fully obtained. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. H.] did not understand me as saying aught against Mr. Jefferson; but the Senator from Missouri chose to work himself up into a most patriotic excitement, denouncing the proceeding as an attack upon Mr. Jefferson. It is true, as he has stated, that I did not consult him in regard to the proceeding. I chose to follow my own course: I would pursue the same course again, and it is now to me a matter of no very great importance whether he approves it or not. As to the charge of an attack upon Mr. Jefferson, as the Senator sat at some distance from me, he may have misapprehended my observation; and whether he did or not, it is not my purpose now to inquire, but protest against all his inferences on the subject, if drawn from my remarks, as unfounded and gratuitous. Every honorable man will appreciate my motives. I think that the gentleman might have put a charitable construction upon the error into which Mr. Jefferson had fallen. I entertain as high an opinion of the reputation of that great statesman as others who make much greater professions, and would not pluck a flower from the chaplet of his fame. But at every hazard—let the consequences fall where they may—I will repel every imputation, like that contained in the memoir, upon the memory of Mr. Bayard, who, at the very period referred to, held the vote of my native State in his hand, and whose honor in that transaction cannot be touched without a reflection upon the State herself. Her maxim will ever be, whether she speaks here by me as her Representative, or by any other—

—"To thine own self be true;
"And it must follow, as the night the day,
"Thou canst not then be false to any man."

And now, having repudiated the inference drawn from this occurrence by the Senator from Missouri, let this subject henceforth and forever sleep with the illustrious dead who have formed the topic of this desultory discussion.

THE RESOLUTION OF MR. FOOT.

Mr. BENTON then rose, and proceeded to address the Senate about an hour, in continuation of his remarks on Mr. FOOT'S resolution.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1830.

Mr. BENTON again rose, and spoke more than two hours, in conclusion of his speech, commenced on a former day.

Mr. SPRAGUE next rose to address the Senate on the subject, and had proceeded near half an hour, when he gave way for a motion to adjourn.

[The following speech of Mr. BENTON was commenced January 20th, and continued for some time, when Mr. WEBSTER having come in, Mr. BENTON gave way to Mr. HAYNE, by whom and Mr. W. the floor was occupied four days. It was not till the discussion between them was over, that Mr. BENTON proceeded with his speech, in doing which he replied to many things said by Mr. W. in his debate with Mr. HAYNE. In reporting Mr. B.'s speech, it was deemed best to keep it united, and it is here given entire, as it was delivered from day to day.]

Mr. BENTON said he could not permit the Senate to adjourn, and the assembled audience of yesterday to separate, without seeing an issue joined on the unexpected declaration then made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER]—the declaration that the Northeast section of the Union had, at all times, and under all circumstances, been the uniform friend of the West, the South inimical to it, and that there were no grounds for asserting the contrary. Taken by surprise, as I was, [said Mr. BENTON] by a declaration so little expected, and so much in conflict with what I had considered established history, I felt it to be due to all concerned to meet the declaration upon the instant—to enter my earnest dissent to it, and to support my denial by a rapid review of some great historical epochs. This I did upon the instant, without a moment's preparation, or previous thought; but I checked myself in an effusion,* in which feeling was at least as predominant as judgment, with the reflection that issues of fact, between Senators, were not to be decided by bandying contradictions across this floor; that it was due to the dignity of the occasion to proceed more temperately, and with proof in hand for every thing that I should urge. I then sat down with the view of recommencing coolly and regularly as soon as I could refresh my memory with dates and references. The warmth of the moment prevented me from observing what was most obvious—namely, that the resolution under discussion was itself the most pregnant illustration of my side of the issue. It is a resolution of direct import to the new States in the West, involving in its fourfold aspect, the stoppage of emigration to that region, the limitation of its settlement, the suspension of surveys, the abolition of the Surveyor's office, and the surrender of large portions of Western territory to the use and dominion of wild beasts; and, in addition to all this, connecting itself, in time and spirit, with another resolution, in the other end of the capitol, for delivering up the public land in the new States to the avarice of the old ones, to be coined into gold and silver for their benefit. This resolution, thus hostile in itself, and aggravated by an odious connexion, came upon us from the Northeast, and was resisted by the South. Its origin, and its progress, was a complete exemplification of the relative affections which the two Atlantic sections of the Union bear to the West. Its termination was to put the seal upon the question of that affection. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] to whom I am now replying, was not present at the offering of that resolution. He arrived when the debate upon it was far advanced, and the temper of the South and West fully displayed. He saw the condition of his friends, and the consequences of the movement which they had made. Their condition was that of a certain army, which had been conducted, by two consuls, into the Caudine Forks; the consequences might be prejudicial to the Northeast—more accurately speaking, to a political party in the Northeast! His part was that of a prudent commander—to extricate his friends from a perilous position; his mode of doing it ingenious, that of starting a new subject, and moving the indefinite postponement of the impending one. His attack upon the South was a cannonade, to divert the attention of the assailants; his concluding motion for indefinite postponement, a signal of retreat and dispersion to his entangled friends. They may obey the signal. They may turn head upon their speeches, and vote for the postponement, and avoid a direct vote upon the resolution, and give up the pursuit after that information which was so indispensable to do justice and to avoid suspicion; but in doing so, they take my ground against the resolution; for indefinite postponement is rejection; and whether rejected or not, the indelible character of the resolution must remain. It was hostile to the West! It came from the Northeast! and was resisted by the South!

Before I proceed to the main object of this reply, I must be permitted [said Mr. B.] to tear away some ornamental work, and to remove some rubbish, which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. W.] has placed in the way, either to decorate his own march, or to embarrass mine. He has brought before us a certain Nathan Dane, of Beverly, Massachusetts, and loaded him with such an exuberance of blushing honors, as no modern name has been known to merit, or to claim. Solon, Lycurgus, and Numa Pompilius, are the renowned legislators of antiquity to whom he is compared, and, only compared for the purpose of being placed at their head. So much glory was earned by a single act, and that act, the supposed authorship of the ordinance of 1787, for the Government of the Northwestern Territory, and especially of the clause in it which prohibits slavery and involuntary servitude. Mr. Dane was assumed to be the author of this ordinance, and especially of this clause, and upon that assumption was founded, not only the great superstructure of Mr. Dane's glory, but a claim also upon the gratitude of Ohio, and all the Northwest, to the unrivalled legislator, who was the author of their happiness, and to the quarter of the Union which was the producer of the legislator. So much encomium, and such grateful consequences, it seems a pity to spoil—but spoil they must be: for Mr. Dane was no more the author of that ordinance, sir, than you, or I, who, about that time were "mewling and puling in our nurse's arms." That ordinance, and especially the non-slavery clause, was not the work of Nathan Dane, of Massachusetts, but of Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia. It was reported by a Committee of three, Messrs. Jefferson, of Virginia, Chase, of Maryland, and Howard, of Rhode Island—a majority from slave States, in April, 1784, nearly two years before Mr. Dane became a member of Congress. The clause was not adopted at that time, there being but six States in favor of it, and the articles of confederation, in questions of that character, requiring seven. The next year, '85, the clause, with some modification, was moved by Mr. King, of New York, as a proposition to be sent to a committee, and was sent to the Committee accordingly; but, still did not ripen into a law. A year afterwards, this clause, and the whole ordinance, was passed, upon the report of a Committee of six members, of whom, the name of Mr. Dane stands No. 5, in the order of arrangement on the Journal. There were but eight States present at the passing of this ordinance, namely, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia; and every one voted for it. [Here Mr. B. read the parts of the Journal which verified these statements, and continued:] So passes away the glory of this world. But yesterday, the name of Nathan Dane, of Beverly, Massachusetts, hung in equipoise against half the names of the sages of Greece and Rome. Poetry and eloquence were at work to blazen his fame; marble, and brass, and history, and song, were waiting to perform their office. The celestial honors of the apotheosis seemed to be only deferred for the melancholy event of the sepulchre. To-day, all this superstructure of honors, human and divine, disappears from the earth. The foundation of the edifice is sapped; and the superhuman glories of him, who, twenty-four hours ago, was taking his station among the demi-gods of antiquity, have dispersed and dissipated into thin air—vanishing like the baseless fabric of a vision, which leaves not a wreck behind. So much for the ornamental work; now for the rubbish.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. W.] has dwelt with much indignation upon certain supposed revilings of the New England character. He did not indicate the nature of the revilings, nor the name of the reviler. I, for one, disclaim a knowledge of the thing, and the doing of the thing itself. I deal in no general imputations upon communities. Such reflections are generally unjust, and always unwise. I am no defamer of New England. The man must be badly informed upon the history of these States who does not know the great points of the New England character. He must poorly appreciate national renown in arms and letters—national greatness, resting on the solid foundations of religion, morality, and learning, who does not respect the people among whom these things are found in rich abundance. Yet, I must say—the speech of yesterday forces me to say it—that, in a political point of view, the population of New England does not stand undivided before me. A line of division is drawn through the mass, whether "horizontally," leaving the rich and well born above, the poor and ill-born below; or vertically, so as to present a section of each layer, is not for me to affirm. The division exists. On one side of it we see friends who have adhered to us in every diversity of fortune, who have been with us in six troubles, and will not desert us in the seventh; men who were with us in '98, and in the late war; whose grief and joy rose and sunk with ours in the struggle with England; who wept with us over the calamities of the Northwest, and rejoiced in the splendid glories of the Southwest! On the other side, we see those who were against us in all these trials; who thought it unbecoming a moral and religious people to celebrate the triumphs of their own country over its enemy, but quite becoming the same people, to be pleased at the victories of the enemy, over their country; who gave a dinner to him that surrendered Detroit. The line of division exists. On one side of it stands the democracy of New England, to whom we give the right hand of fellowship at home and abroad; on the other side, all that stands opposed to that democracy, for whose personal welfare we have the best wishes; but with whom we must decline,

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

as publicly as it was proffered, the honor of that alliance which was yesterday vouchsafed to the West, if not in direct terms, at least by an implication which no one misunderstood. When, then, the people of New England shall read of these revilings, in that well delivered speech of yesterday, let them remember that an issue of fact is joined upon the assertion, and that it is contained in the same speech which supposes Nathan Dane, of Beverly, Massachusetts, to have been the author of a certain production, in the year 1786, which the Journals of Congress show to have been the work of Thomas Jefferson, of Monticello, Virginia, in the year 1784! The same speech which claims, for New England, the gratitude of the Northwestern States for passing that ordinance, when the Journals prove that it had the votes of four States from the South of the Potomac, and only one from New England! When it could have passed without the New England vote, but not without three of the Southern ones!

But I did say something which might be understood as a reproach upon some of the leading characters of New England; it was upon the subject of emigration to the West, and their opposition to it. I quoted high authority at the time—the authority of gentlemen who had served in Congress, and made their statements in the Virginia Convention, under the highest moral responsibilities. Their statement is denied. I will, therefore, produce authority from a different quarter, and of a more recent application—the letter of a son of New England, to another son of the same quarter of the Union.

The Letter—from the Boston Centinel of April 18th, 1827.

An extract from a letter written by the Hon. John Quincy Adams, while Minister at the Court of Russia, to Dr. Benjamin Waterhouse, in Cambridge, dated

"ST PETERSBURGH, 24th Oct. 1813.

[The Doctor had mentioned the vast emigration from New England to the Western Territories, about, and previously to, the time of his writing, to which portion of his letter, Mr. Adams replied as follows:]

"I am not displeased to hear that Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Louisiana, are rapidly peopling with Yankees. I consider them as an excellent race of people, and, as far as I am able to judge, I believe that their moral and political character, far from degenerating, improves by emigration. I have always felt, on that account, a sort of predilection for those rising Western States; and have seen with no small astonishment, the prejudices harbored against them. There is not upon this globe of earth, a spectacle exhibited by man, so interesting to my mind, or so consolatory to my heart, as this metamorphosis of howling deserts into cultivated fields and populous villages, which is yearly, daily, hourly, going on, by the hands chiefly of New England men, in our Western States and Territories.

"If New England loses her influence in the councils of the Union, it will not be owing to any diminution of her population, occasioned by these emigrations: it will be from the partial, sectarian, or, as Hamilton called it, clannish spirit, which makes so many of her political leaders jealous and envious of the West and South. This spirit is, in its nature, narrow and contracted; and it always works by means like itself. Its natural tendency is to excite and provoke a counteracting spirit of the same character; and it has actually produced that effect in our country. It has combined the Southern and Western parts of the United States, not in a league, but in a concert of political views adverse to those of New England. The fame of all the great legislators of antiquity is founded upon their contrivances to strengthen and multiply the principles of attraction in civil society. Our legislators seem to delight in multiplying and fomenting the principles of repulsion."

Having read this letter of Mr. Adams, Mr. B. continued. I will make no comment on the language here used. It is sufficiently significant without that trouble. "Partial—sectarian—clannish—jealous—envious—narrow—contracted—excite—provoke—multiplying, fomenting, principles of repulsion"—are phrases which need no aid from the dictionary to uncover their pregnant meaning. I will only ask for three or four concessions:

1. That the authority of the writer of the letter is canonical, and binding on the church.

2. That it goes the full length of charging the New England leaders of 1813 with opposition to Western emigration.

3. That nothing which I have said of the motives, or conduct, of those who oppose this emigration, can compare in severity of expression with the language of Mr. Adams.

4. That the political leaders of whom he spoke as opposing emigration to the West, upon such motives, and by such means, are the same who are now denying it on this floor, and wooing the West into an alliance with them.

I gave yesterday [said Mr. B.] the brief history of the great attempt, in '86, 7, 8, to surrender the navigation of the Mississippi; to surrender it in violation of the articles of confederation, by a majority of seven States, when the requisite majority of nine could not be obtained; the protracted resistance of these attempts by the Southern States; their final defeat by a movement from North Carolina; and the secrecy in which the whole was enveloped. The history of these things were given then; the proofs will be produced now; the epoch and the subject are entitled to the first degree of consideration in this inquiry into the relative affection of two great sections of the Union to a third; for, on this question of a surrender of the navigation of the Mississippi to the King of Spain, commenced that line of separation between the conduct of the Northeast, and of the South, towards the West, which has continued to this day.

The first movement upon this subject was in the winter of 1779–80. It came through the French ambassador, the Chevalier de la Luzerne, the United States having no diplomatic relations, at that time, with the King of Spain. The Chevalier, in a secret communication to Congress, informed them, by the command of the King of France, that the King of Spain would join the United States against England, upon four conditions, namely:

1. That the settlements and boundary of the United States should not extend further West than to the heads of the rivers that flowed into the Atlantic Ocean.

2. That the exclusive navigation of the Mississippi should belong to Spain.

3. That the Floridas should belong to her.

4. That the Southern States should be restrained from making settlements to the west of the Alleghanies, and that all the country beyond these mountains should be considered as British possessions, and proper objects for the arms and permanent conquest of Spain. [Secret Journals, vol 2, p. 310.]

The proffered alliance of Spain, upon these conditions, was rejected by Congress. But her alliance was an object of the first importance, and, to obtain it, if possible, without the worst of these conditions, Mr. Jay was despatched to Madrid. On the subject of the Mississippi, Mr. Jay was directed to make a sine qua non of the free navigation of that river, and the use of a port near its mouth. On the subject of the West—for I limit myself to these points—he was directed to say that the West being settled by citizens of the United States, friendly to the Revolution, Congress would not assign them over to any foreign Power. These instructions were unanimously given. This was in the commencement of the year '80. One year afterwards, to wit, the 15th of February, '81, one month before the battle of Guilford Court House, the delegates of Virginia, in pursuance of instructions from their constituents, moved to recede from so much of the previous instruction of Mr. Jay as made the free navigation of the Mississippi, a sine qua non: Provided, that Spain should "unalterably" insist upon it, and not otherwise come into the alliance against England; and that the minister be "ordered to exert every possible effort" to obtain the alliance, without the surrender of the navigation of the river. On the question to agree to this modification of the instructions, the vote stood: Yeas, Pennsylvania, Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Delaware, Maryland, (the four latter having but one member each present.) Nays, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and North Carolina. New York divided, and not counted.

This, [said Mr. B.] is the case mentioned by Mr. Madison, in the Virginia convention; the instance of willingness, on the part of the Southern States, to give up the navigation of the Mississippi, and its resistance by the Northern States, to which he alluded. The journals show the facts of the case. They control the recollections of Mr. Madison, and leave me not a word to say. But, the question of this navigation, and these instructions, did not stop here. On the 10th of August following, it was proposed to vest the minister at Madrid with discretionary power over the navigation of the Mississippi, and unanimously rejected. The proposition stands thus, p. 468, of the fourth volume of the Journal:

"That the minister be empowered to make such further cession of the right of these United States to the navigation of the Mississippi, as he may think proper; and on such terms and conditions as he may think most for the honor and interest of these United States."

Upon the question of adopting this proposition, the votes were unanimously against it, not of States only, but of members; every member of every State present voting in the negative. This was a proud instance of unanimity. The result of it was, the acquisition of the alliance of Spain without a surrender of the great right of navigation in the King of Floods.

The question of the navigation of this river then slept for four years, until the summer of 1785, when Don Gardoqui, the Spanish encargado de negocios, arrived in the United States, with powers to negotiate a treaty. Mr. Jay, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, was appointed to treat with him. The instructions to Mr. Jay limited his negotiation to two points, namely, boundaries and navigation; and, on this latter point, the last clause of his instructions made the free navigation of the Mississippi, and the use of a port near its mouth, an indispensable condition to the conclusion of a treaty. These instructions seem to have been given with entire unanimity. No division of sentiment appears on the Journal, and nearly a whole year elapsed before any thing appears upon the subject of this negotiation, thus committed to Mr. Jay and Don Gardoqui. At the end of that time, it was brought before Congress by a letter from Mr. Jay, in secret session, and gave rise to proceedings which I beg leave to read, not choosing to trust any thing to my memory, or to risk the possible substitution of my own language for that of the record, in a case of so much delicacy and moment.

The letter of Mr. Jay to the President of Congress.

"Office of Foreign Affairs, May 29, 1786.

"Sir: In my negotiations with Mr. Gardoqui, I experience certain difficulties, which, in my opinion, should be so managed, as that even the existence of them should remain a secret for the present. I take the liberty, therefore, of submitting to the consideration of Congress, whether it might not be advisable to appoint a committee, with power to instruct and direct me on every point and subject relative to the proposed treaty with Spain. In case Congress should think proper to appoint such a committee, I really think it would be prudent to keep the appointment of it secret, and to forbear having any conversation on subjects connected with it, except in Congress, and in meetings on the business of it.

JOHN JAY."

This letter was referred to a committee of three, namely: Mr. King, of New York, Mr. Pettit, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Monroe, of Virginia. They reported that the letter should be taken under consideration in Committee of the whole House. This committee resolved to hear the Secretary in person, fixed a day for his attendance, and ordered him to state the difficulties of which his letter had given intimation.

He did so, in a written statement, which, including letters from Don Gardoqui, occupies some thirty pages of the Journal. The points of it, so far as they are material to the question now before the Senate, were, that the pending negotiations for boundaries and navigation should also include commerce; that the United States should abandon to the King of Spain the exclusive navigation of the Mississippi, for twenty-five or thirty years, and that Spain should purchase many articles from the United States, of which pickled salmon, train oil, and cod fish, were particularly dwelt upon.—[Vol. 4, pages 45 to 63.] From this instant, the division between the North and South, on the subject of the West, sprang into existence. A series of motions and votes ensued, and a struggle, which continued two years, in which Maryland, and all South, voted one way, and New Jersey, and all North, voted the other. The most important of these motions were, 1. A motion by Mr. King, of New York, to repeal the clause in the instructions to Mr. Jay which made the navigation of the Mississippi a sine qua non, which was carried by the seven Northern States against the others. 2. A motion by Mr. Pinckney, of S. Carolina, to revoke the whole instruction, and stop the negotiation; lost by the same vote. 3. A motion by Mr. Pinckney, seconded by Mr. Monroe, to declare it a violation of the articles of the Confederation, for seven States to alter the instructions for negotiating a treaty, those articles requiring the consent of nine States on questions of that kind; lost by the same vote. 4. A motion by the delegates from Virginia to make it a sine qua non, that the citizens of the United States should have the privilege of taking their produce to New Orleans; the United States to have a consul, and the citizens factors there; that the vessels be allowed to return empty, and the produce to be exported on paying a small export duty: lost by the same array of votes. 5. A motion made by Mr. St. Clair, seconded by Mr. King, to make the same proposition, to be obtained, if possible, but not a sine qua non; carried by the ayes of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, seven; against the noes of Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, five; Delaware not present.

I pause a moment, in the narrative of these occurrences, to remark that the motion of the Virginia delegation, above stated, has been misunderstood; that it has been supposed that that delegation and the South, which voted with them, were then in favor of paying tribute to Spain, and abandoning forever the upward or ascending navigation of the Mississippi, and that the seven Northern States prevented that calamity to the West. Nothing can be more erroneous than this conception. The attempt of Virginia was to save, at all events to make sure, by a sine qua non, this poor privilege of exporting, paying an export duty of two and a half per cent. and returning empty; and this, after seeing that the whole right to the navigation, descending as well as ascending, was to be surrendered for twenty-five or thirty years. The vote of the seven Northern States against the Virginia proposition was to have an opportunity of doing not better, but worse, for the West; to make this same proposition not an indispensable condition to the conclusion of a treaty, but a mere proposal, to be obtained if it could, and if not, the whole right of navigation to be abandoned for twenty-five or thirty years. This is what they showed to be their disposition in adopting Mr. King's motion immediately after rejecting that of the Virginia delegation, Mr. King's being a substantial copy of the other, except in the essential particulars of the sine qua non, and for this the seven Northern States voted; the six others opposed it. I now resume my narrative.

The next motion and vote stands thus upon the Journal of the 28th Sept. '86.

"Moved by Mr. Pinckney, seconded by Mr. Carrington, that the injunction of secrecy be taken off, so far as to allow the delegates in Congress to communicate to the Legislatures and Executives of their several States, the acts which have passed, and the questions which have been taken in Congress respecting the negotiations between the United States and his Catholic Majesty.

The motion was lost by the following vote:

Massachusetts.—Mr. Gorham, no, Mr. King, no, Mr. Dane, no.

Rhode Island.—Mr. Manning, no, Mr. Miller, no.

Connecticut.—Mr. Johnson, no, Mr. Sturges, no.

New York.—Mr. Haring, no, Mr. Smith, no.

New Jersey.—Mr. Cadwallader, no, Mr. Symmes, ay, Mr. Hornblower, no.

Pennsylvania.—Mr. Pettit, no, Mr. St. Clair, no.

Maryland.—Mr. Ramsay, ay, (not counted.)

Virginia.—Mr. Monroe, ay, Mr. Carrington, ay, Mr. Lee, ay.

North Carolina.—Mr. Bloodworth, ay, Mr. White, ay.

South Carolina.—Mr. Pinckney, ay, Mr. Parker, ay.

Georgia.—Mr. Houston, no, Mr. Few, ay. (Divided.)"

In April, 1787, Mr. Madison having become a member of Congress, moved two resolutions, one to transfer the negotiation with Spain from the United States to Madrid; the other to charge Mr. Jefferson, then in France, with the conduct of it. [Secret Journals, vol. 4, page 339.] The object of these resolutions could not be mistaken. They were referred by Congress to Mr. Jay, Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and still engaged in the negotiation with Don Garloqui. He reported at large against the expediency of the transfer, treating it as a project to gain time, and complaining that the secret of the Spanish negotiations had leaked out of Congress. This report, and the motion of Mr. Madison, seemed to have been undisturbed of, when an incident in real life, and the firm stand of one of the States, brought the majority of Congress to a pause, and extricated the Mississippi from its imminent danger. This was the arrest of a citizen of North Carolina, and the confiscation of his vessel and cargo, by the Spanish Governor, Grandpré, at Natchez, and the decisive character of the appeal made by the Legislature, the Governor, and the Delegates in Congress from that State, for the redress of that outrage. Mr. Madison availed himself of the feeling produced by these incidents to make another attempt to get rid of the subject; and, in September, 1788, offered a resolution that no further progress be made in the negotiation with Spain, and that the whole subject be referred to the new Federal Government, which was to go into operation the ensuing year. This resolution was agreed to, and the Mississippi saved. Thus ended an arduous and eventful struggle. The termination was fortunate and happy, but the spirit which produced it has never gone to sleep. The idea that the Western rivers are a fund for the purchase of Atlantic advantages, in treaties with foreign Powers, has been acted upon often since: The Mississippi, the Arkansas, the Red river, the Sabine, and the Columbia, can bear witness of this. The idea that the growth of the West was incompatible with the supremacy of the Northeast, has since crept into the legislation of the Federal Government, as will be fully developed in the course of this debate.

I have already given the proof of the fact, that the South is entitled to the honor of originating the clause against slavery in the Northwest Territory: the state of the votes upon its adoption also shows that she is entitled to the honor of passing it; there being but eight States present, four from each side of the Potomac, only one from New England, and all voting for it. This shows the great mistake which is committed in claiming the merit of that ordinance for the Northeast, and founding upon that claim a title to the gratitude of the Northwestern States. The ordinance of the same epoch, for the sale of the Western lands, has also been celebrated, and deservedly, for the beauty and science of its system of surveys. The honor of this ordinance is also assumed for the Northeast. Let it be so. I know nothing to the contrary, and what I do know favors that idea. The ordinance came from a committee of twelve, of whom eight were from the north, four from the south side of the Potomac. But, as it came from that committee, it would have left the whole Northwestern region a haunt for wild beasts and savages. The clause which required that every previous township should be sold out complete, before a subsequent one was offered for sale, would have produced this result, and was intended to produce it. Virginia, the South, and some Northern States, expunged that clause; Massachusetts and some others contended for it to the last. The Northwest is therefore indebted to the South for the sale of its lands: it is also indebted to it for an unsuccessful attempt to promote the settlement of the country by reducing the size of the tracts to be sold. The ordinance, as reported, fixed six hundred and forty acres as the smallest division that might be offered for sale. Mr. Grayson, of Virginia, seconded by Mr. Monroe, moved to reduce the quantity to three hundred and twenty acres, but failed in the attempt. The Virginia delegation voted for it unanimously; South Carolina and Georgia both voted for it, but, having but one member present, the vote did not count. Maryland voted for it; all the rest of the States against it. Another attempt to benefit the settler, and promote the sale of the country, deserves a notice, though unsuccessful: it was the motion to reduce the price fixed in the ordinance from one dollar per acre to sixty-six and two-thirds cents. This motion was made by Mr. Beatty, of New Jersey, seconded by Mr. McHenry, of Maryland, and was supported by the votes of four States, to wit: New York, New Jersey, Maryland, and South Carolina; Pennsylvania divided, and counted nothing; the rest of the States, Virginia inclusive, voted against it. The motion failed, though respectably supported; the price remained at one dollar, which is twenty-five cents less than the present minimum price of the same lands after forty-five years' picking; and it is worthy of remark, that one-third of the States were then, when the lands were all fresh and unpicked, in favor of establishing a minimum price at sixty-six and two-thirds cents per acre; a fraction only over one-half of the present minimum!

I now approach the subject of most engrossing interest to the young West—its sufferings under Indian wars, and its vain appeals, for so many years, to the Federal Government, for succor and relief. The history of twelve years' sufferings in Tennessee, from 1780 to 1792, when the inhabitants succeeded in conquering peace without the aid of federal troops; and of sixteen years' carnage in Kentucky, from 1774 to 1790, when the first effectual relief began to be extended, would require volumes of detail, for which we have no time, and powers of description, for which I have no talent. Then was witnessed the scenes of woe and death, of carnage and destruction, which no words of mine can ever paint: instances of heroism in men, of fortitude and devotedness in women, of instinctive courage in little children, which the annals of the most celebrated nations can never surpass. Then was seen the Indian warfare in all its horrors—that warfare which spares neither decrepit age, nor blooming youth, nor manly strength, nor infant weakness; in which the sleeping family awoke from their beds in the midst of flames and slaughter, when virgins were led off captive by savage monsters; when mothers were loaded with their children, and compelled to march; and when, unable to keep up, were relieved of their burthen by seeing the brains of infants beat out on a tree; when the slow consuming fire of the stake devoured its victim in the presence of pitying friends and in the midst of exulting demons; when the corn was planted, the fields were ploughed, the crops were gathered, the cows were milked, water was brought from the spring, and God was worshipped, under the guard and protection of armed men; when the night was the season for travelling, the impervious forest the high-way, and the place of safety, most remote from the habitation of man; when every house was a fort, and every fort subject to siege and assault. Such was the warfare in the infant settlements of Kentucky and Tennessee, and which the aged men, actors in the dreadful scenes, have related to me so many times.

Appeals to the Federal Government were incessant and vain, during the long progress of these disastrous wars; but as the revolutionary struggle was going on during a part of the time, and engrossed the resources of the Union, I will draw no example from that period. I will take a period posterior to the Revolution—three years after the peace with Great Britain—when the settlements in the West had taken a permanent form, when the Indian hostilities were most inveterate, when the Federal Government had a military peace establishment of seven hundred men, and when the acceptance of the cessions of the public lands in the West made the duty of protection no less an object of interest to the Union, than of justice and humanity to the inhabitants. I will take the year 1786. What was the relative conduct of the North and South to the infant, suffering, bleeding, imploring West, in this season of calamity to her, and ability in them to give her relief? What was then the conduct of each? It was that of unrelenting severity on the part of the North—of generous and sympathizing friendship on the part of the South! The evidence which cannot err will prove this, and will cover with confusion the bold declarations which have imposed upon me the duty of this reply. I speak of the Journals of the old Congress, quotations from which I now proceed to read:

From the Journals of Congress, vol. 4, p. 654.

"WEDNESDAY, JUNE 21, 1786.

"The Secretary of War, to whom was referred a motion of Mr. Grayson, of Virginia, reported the following resolution:

"That the Secretary of War direct the commanding officer of the troops to detach two companies to the Rapids of the Ohio, to protect the inhabitants from the depredations and incursions of the Indians."

Mark well! the terms of this resolution to detach two companies then in service—not to raise them; for the purpose of protecting the inhabitants, not to attack the Indians. No expense in this; a mere change of position of a part of the military force then on foot. Observe the course of treatment the resolution received.

The first movement against it came from the North, in a motion to refer the resolution to a peace committee on Indian Affairs. The yeas and nays on that motion were—

Massachusetts—Ay.
New York—Ay.
Maryland—No.
Virginia—No.
North Carolina—No.
Pennsylvania—Divided.
New Jersey—Divided.
New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Georgia—But one member—not counted.
Delaware and South Carolina—Absent.

The motion to refer was thus lost for want of seven yeas.

The second movement was from the South, Mr. Lee, of Virginia, seconded by Mr. Grayson, having moved to substitute four for two, so as to double the intended protection.

The vote upon this motion was—

Massachusetts—No.
New York—No.
New Jersey—No.
Pennsylvania—No.
Maryland—No.
North Carolina—No.
New Hampshire—No.
Virginia—Ay.
Georgia—Ay.
Delaware and South Carolina—Absent.

The third trial was on the adoption of the resolution, and exhibited the following vote:

New Hampshire—Mr. Long,* ay.
Massachusetts—Mr. Gorham, no, Mr. King, no, Mr. Sedgwick, no, Mr. Dane, no.
Rhode Island—Mr. Manning,* ay.
New York—Mr. Haring, ay, Mr. Smith, ay.
New Jersey—Mr. Symmes, ay, Mr. Hornblower, ay.
Pennsylvania—Mr. Pettit, ay, Mr. Wilson, ay.
Maryland—Mr. Henry, ay, Mr. Hindman, ay, Mr. Harrison, ay.
Virginia—Mr. Grayson, ay, Mr. Monroe, ay, Mr. Lee, ay.

North Carolina—Mr. Bloodworth, ay, Mr. White, ay.
Georgia—Mr. Few,* ay.

Those marked with an asterisk, having but one member, were not counted. Six States only of those fully represented voted in favor of the resolution; it was consequently lost! Lost for want of the vote of one State, and that State was Massachusetts! The next day that vote was supplied, but not by Massachusetts. Mr. Pinckney and Mr. Huger arrived from South Carolina. Mr. Pinckney, seconded by Mr. Carrington, of Virginia, immediately moved the rejected resolution over again, and South Carolina voting with the yeas, made seven affirmative States, and carried the resolution.

This is the history of the first relief ever extended by the Federal Government to the inhabitants of Kentucky. Your State, sir, now painted as the enemy of the West, turned the scale in favor of that small but acceptable succor. It hung upon one vote; Massachusetts denied that vote! South Carolina came and gave it!

The instant this much was obtained, the generous delegates of the great and magnanimous Virginia commenced operations, to procure the real and effectual protection which the case required, namely, an expedition into the Indian territory north of the Ohio river. The Governor of Virginia, on the 16th of May, '86, in a letter to Congress, had recommended this course, and offered the militia of his State to execute it. The letter was referred to a committee of three, Messrs. Grayson and Monroe, of Virginia, and Mr. Dane, of Massachusetts. On the 29th of June, just seven days after the vote had passed for detaching two companies to the Falls of the Ohio, Mr. Grayson reported upon the recommendation of the Governor of Virginia. It was such a report as might be expected from a committee of which Virginia delegates constituted the majority. It recommended the expedition, and gave the most solid and convincing reasons for agreeing to it. The whole report is spread upon the Journal of that day, [vol. 4, p. 657.] Justice to the patriots who drew it, and justice, also, to those who supported and opposed it, would require it to be read, but time forbids. I can only repeat, in a condensed recital, its leading contents. It showed that the hostile Indians were bent on war; that they had treated with contempt the application which the United States had made to them, to meet commissioners at the mouth of the Great Miami, and conclude a peace; that, issuing from their vast forests beyond the Ohio, and returning to them for refuge, the war was to them a gratification of their savage thirst for blood and plunder, without danger of chastisement; that, while confined to defence on our side, and offence on their side, they had every motive which their savage policy required, to carry on the war, and no motive to stop it; that a march into their country was the only means of compelling them to accept peace; and it concluded with a resolution that the two companies ordered to the Falls of Ohio, and one thousand Virginia militia, drawn from the district of Kentucky, under the command of a superior officer, be ordered to march into the hostile Indian territory, armed with the double authority of Commissioner and General, to treat, as well as to fight.

We will now see the reception which this report and resolution met with. The first movement upon it was in the way of a side blow, one of those operations in legislation which have the two-fold advantage of doing most mischief, and doing it without appearing to be absolutely hostile to the measure. It was a motion to postpone the consideration of the resolution, for the purpose of considering a proposition, which was the reverse of Mr. Grayson's report in all its material facts and conclusions. This new proposition recited, that Congress had received information that small parties of Indians had crossed the Ohio, and committed depredations on the district of Kentucky; but had not sufficient evidence of the aggression, or hostile disposition of any tribes of Indians to justify the United States in carrying the war into the Indian country; and proposed a resolve, that Congress would proceed in the organization of the Indian Department! and adopt such measures as would secure peace to the Indians, and safety to the inhabitants of the frontiers.

Let it be remembered that this proposition was offered on the 29th of June, 1786, when the Indian war in Kentucky had raged for twelve years, when thousands of men, women, and children, had perished; that it was four years after the great battle of the Blue Licks—that disastrous battle, in which the flower of Western chivalry was cut down, and the whole land filled with grief and covered with mourning; that it was the very same year in which an offer to treat for peace, at the mouth of the Great Miami, had been contemptuously rejected; and, after recollecting these things, then judge of its statements and conclusions! To me it seems to class itself with the motions afterwards witnessed in the French National Convention, to proceed to the order of the day when petitions were presented to save the lives of multitudes upon the point of assassination. The motion to postpone was made; the yeas and nays were called for by Mr. Grayson; the delegations of several States voted for it, and let the Journal of the day announce their names.

New Hampshire.—Mr. Livermore, no, Mr. Long, ay.

Massachusetts.—Mr. Gorham, ay, Mr. King, ay, Mr. Sedgwick, ay, Mr. Dane, no.

Rhode Island.—Mr. Manning, no.

New York.—Mr. Haring, ay, Mr. Smith, ay.

New Jersey.—Mr. Synnnes, no, Mr. Hornblower, ay.

Pennsylvania.—Mr. Pettit, ay, Mr. Bayard, ay.

Maryland.—Mr. Henry, ay, Mr. Hindman, no, Mr. Harrison, no, Mr. Ramsay, no.

Virginia.—Mr. Grayson, no, Mr. Monroe, no, Mr. Carrington, no, Mr. Lee, no.

North Carolina.—Mr. Bloodworth, no, Mr. White, no.

South Carolina.—Mr. Pinckney, no, Mr. Huger, no.

Georgia.—Mr. Few, no.

The motion to postpone was lost, only three States voting for it. Some amendments were agreed to, the resolution put on its passage, and rejected! New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, voting no. Virginia, North Carolina, and South Carolina, ay. Delaware absent. Rhode Island, but one member present. The vote of Georgia lost, by the refusal of a member to vote, [Mr. Houston] who seemed, upon all trial questions between the different sections of the Union, to occupy a false position.

Defeated, but not subdued—repulsed, but not vanquished—invisible in the work of justice and humanity, the Virginia delegation immediately commenced new operations, and devised new plans for the relief of the West. On the very next day, June 30th, a motion was made by Mr. Lee, seconded by Mr. Monroe, to have one thousand men, of the Virginia militia, he'd in readiness, and called out, in case of necessity, for the protection of the West. Even this was resisted! A motion was made by Mr. King, of Massachusetts, seconded by Mr. Long, of New Hampshire, to strike out the number "one thousand." It was struck out accordingly, there being but five States, to wit: Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, in favor of retaining it. The resolution, eviscerated of this essential part, was allowed to pass; and thus, on the 30th day of June, in the year 1786, the Governor of Virginia obtained the privilege, from the Continental Congress, to order some militia in Kentucky to hold themselves in readiness to protect the country, in case of necessity! Thus, at the end of twelve years from the commencement of the Indian wars, Kentucky obtained the assent of Congress to the defence of herself! Tennessee never obtained that much! She fought out the war from 1780 to 1792 upon her own bottom, without the assent, and against the commands, of Congress. Expresses were often despatched to recall her expeditions going in pursuit of Indians who had invaded her settlements. The decisive expedition to the Cherokee town of Nickajac, which was framed upon the plan of Mr. Grayson, was, in legal acceptance, a lawless invasion of a friendly tribe. The brave and patriotic men who swam the Tennessee river, three quarters of a mile wide, in the dead of the night, shoving their arms before them on rafts, and stormed the town, and drove the Indians from the gap in the mountain—the Thermopylæ of the country—and gave peace to the Cumberland settlements, did it with federal halts round their necks: for the expedition was contrary to law. And now, in the face of history, which proclaims, and journals, which record these facts; in contempt of all memory that retains, and tradition that recounts them, Massachusetts and the Northeast, which abandoned the infant West to the rifle, the hatchet, the knife, and the burning stake of the Indians, are to be put forth as the friends of the West! Virginia, and the South, which labored for them with a zeal and perseverance which eventually obtained the kind protection recommended in the report of Mr. Grayson—the expedition of Harmer, St. Clair, and Wayne—are to be set down as their enemies! And upon this settlement of the account the West is now to be wooed into an alliance with the trainbands of New England federalism—the elite of the Hartford Convention—for the oppression of Virginia and the South, and the subjugation of New England democracy! History and the Journals are to be faced down with the assertion that the protecting arm of the Government was forever stretched over the infant settlements of the West, the North taking the lead of the South in its defence and protection!

Two more brief references to incidents of different characters, but highly pertinent and instructive, will complete my selection of examples from the history of the old Congress. One was a refusal, on the 25th of July, 1787, to treat for a cession of Indian lands either on the north or the south side of the Ohio; the other was a refusal, on the second of August of the same year, to let Virginia "be credited" with the expenses of an expedition which she had carried on in the winter of '86—'87, against the Indians on both sides of the Ohio river, because that expedition was "not authorized" by the United States. The Journals of the day will show the particulars, and exhibit the delegation of Massachusetts—that Nathan Dane included, who is now to be set up as the founder, legislator, and benefactor of the Northwest—as heading the opposition on both occasions. And here I submit, that, thus far, the assertion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAYNE] that the West had received hard treatment from the Federal Government, is fully sustained. His remark was chiefly directed to the hard terms on which they get lands; but it holds good on the important point of long neglect, the effect of Northern jealousy in giving protection against the Indians.

Second Day's Remarks.

I resume my speech [said Mr. B.] at the point at which it was suspended when I gave way to the natural and laudable impatience of the Senator from South Carolina, who sits on my right, [Mr. HAYNE] to vindicate himself, his State, and the South, from what appeared to me to be a most gratuitous aggression. Well and nobly has he done it. Much as he had done before, to establish his reputation as an orator, a statesman, a patriot, and a gallant son of the South, the efforts of these days eclipse and surpass the whole. They will be an era in his Senatorial career which his friends and his country will mark and remember, and look back upon with pride and exultation.

Before I go on with new matter, [said Mr. B.] I must be permitted to reach back, and bring up, in the way of recapitulation, and for the purpose of joining together the broken ends of my speech, the heads and substance of the great facts which I quoted and established at the commencement of this reply. They are:

1. The attempt of the seven Northern States, in 1786, '87, '88, to surrender the navigation of the Mississippi to the King of Spain.

2. The attempt to effect that surrender, in violation of the articles of confederation, by the votes of seven States, when nine could not be had.

3. The design of this surrender, to check the growth of the West.

4. The clause in the first ordinance for the sale of the public lands, in the Northwestern territory, which required the previous townships to be sold out complete before the subsequent ones could be offered for sale.

5. The refusal to sell a less quantity than six hundred and forty acres together.

6. The refusal to reduce the minimum price from one dollar to sixty-six and two-thirds cents per acre.

7. The opposition, in 1786, to the motion to detach two companies to the falls of the Ohio, for the protection of Kentucky against the incursions and depredations of the Indians.

8. The opposition to Mr. Grayson's unanswerable report, in the same year, in favor of sending an expedition into the hostile Indian country.

9. The refusal, at the same time, to permit Virginia to hold one thousand of her own militia in readiness to protect Kentucky.

10. The refusal, in 1787, to treat for a cession of Indian lands, on either side of the Ohio.

11. The refusal, in the same year, to let Virginia "be credited" with the expenses of an expedition, carried on in the winter of 1786, '87, by her troops, on both sides of the Ohio river, for the defence of the West.

12. The refusal, for twelve years, from 1774 to 1786, to send any aid to Kentucky.

13. The refusal, throughout the entire war, to send any aid to the Cumberland settlements, in Tennessee.

14. The opposition to Western emigration, as proved by Mr. Adams's letter.

In all these instances, and I have omitted a thousand others, having confined myself to a single and brief period, by way of example, and that period the one when the termination of the revolutionary war, peace with all the world, and a standing force of seven hundred men, made it easy to give protection to the West; and when the cession of the Western lands to the Federal Government, for the payment of the revolutionary debt, and the establishment of new States in the Northwest, devolved the business of Western protection upon the Federal Government, no less as an object of interest to themselves, than of duty to the settlers. In all these instances, I have exhibited the States of Massachusetts and Virginia as antagonist powers—the one opposing, the other supporting; the measures favorable to the West, and each supported by more or less of its neighboring States.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] has since occupied the floor two days, and has taken no notice of facts so highly authenticated, drawn from sources so wholly unimpeachable, and so pointedly conflicting with the denials and assertions which he has made on this floor. It is not for me to account for this neglect, or forbearance. Rhetoricians lay down two cases in which silence upon the adversaries' arguments is the better part of eloquence; first, where they are too insignificant to merit any notice, secondly, where they are too well fortified to be overthrown. In such cases, it is recommended, as the safest course, to pass them by without notice, and as if they had not been heard. I do not intimate which, or if either of these rules governed the conduct of the Senator from Massachusetts. I can very well conceive of a third, and very different reason for this inattention; a reason which was seen in the fulness of the occupation which the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAYNE] had given him. True, the Senator from Massachusetts tells us that he felt nothing of all that; that the arrows did not pierce; and makes a question whether the arm of the Senator from South Carolina was strong enough to spring the bow. This he repeated so many times, and with looks so well adjusted to the declaration, that we all must have been reminded of what we have read in ancient books, of the brave gladiator, who, receiving the fatal thrust which starts the cry of "hoc habet" from the whole amphitheatre, instead of displaying his wound and beseeching pity, collects himself over his centre of gravity, assumes a graceful attitude, dresses his face in smiles, bows to the ladies, and acts the unhurt hero in the agonies of death.

But admitting that the arrows did not pierce; what then? Is it proof of the weakness of the arm that sprung the bow, or of the impenetrability of the substance that resisted the shaft? We read, in many books, of the polished brass that resists, not only arrows, but the iron headed javelins, thrown by gigantic heroes. But, pierced or not pierced, we have all witnessed one thing; we have seen the Senator from Massachusetts occupy one whole day in picking these arrows out of his body; and to judge from the length and seriousness of this occupation, he might be supposed to have been stuck as full of them as the poor fellow whose transfixed effigy, on the first leaf of our annual almanacs, attracts the commiseration of so many children.

I pass by these inquiries, [said Mr. B.] and come to the things which concern me most; the renewed and repeated declarations of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. W.] that, from first to last, from the beginning to the ending of the chapter of this Government, all the measures favorable to the West have been carried by Northern votes, in opposition to Southern votes; that this has always been the case; that there are no grounds for asserting the contrary; and that the West is ungrateful to desert their ancient friends in the North for a new alliance in the South. These, sir, are the things for me to attend to. They concern me somewhat, because I have asserted the contrary: they concern the Union much more, because, upon the propagation and belief of these assertions, depends a most unhallowed combination for the government of this confederacy; commencing in the oppression of one half of it, and ending in the ruin of the whole. These considerations impel me forward, and impose upon me the high obligation to make out my case; to show the South to be the ever generous friend of the West; the democracy of the North the same; and the political adversaries of both to have been the unrelenting enemies of the West, until new views, and recent events, have substituted the soft and sweet game of amorous seduction for the ancient and iron system of contempt and hostility. In discharging this duty I shall confine myself to an elevated selection of historical facts; to the great epochs, and great questions, which are cardinal in their nature, notorious in their existence, eventful in their consequences, and pertinent to the trial of the issue joined. On this plan, skipping over many minor measures, I come to the great epoch of the Louisiana purchase, and the resulting measures connected with that event.

The first point of view under which we must look at that great measure; [said Mr. B.] is its incredible value, and the absolute necessity, then created by extraordinary events, for making the acquisition. The West at that period (1803) was filling up with people, and covering over with wealth and population. It was no more the feeble settlement which the Congress of the Confederation had seen, and whose rights, few as they were to the free navigation of the Mississippi, had given birth to the most arduous struggle ever beheld in that Congress. States had superseded these infant settlements. Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, had been admitted into the Union: the territories of Indiana, Illinois, and Mississippi, were making their way to the same station. The Western settlements of Pennsylvania and Virginia lined the left bank of the Ohio, for half the length of its course. All was animated with life, gay with hope, independent in the cultivation of a grateful soil, and rich in the prospect of sending their accumulated productions to all the markets of the world, through the great channel which conducted the King of Rivers to the bosom of the ocean. The treaty with Spain in the year 1795 had guaranteed this right of passage; had stipulated, moreover, for a right of deposit in New Orleans, with the further stipulation, that, if this place of deposit should ever be denied, another should immediately be assigned, equally convenient for storing produce and merchandise, and for the exchange of cargoes between the river and the sea vessels. This right of deposit, thus indispensable, and thus secured, was violated in the fall of 1802. New Orleans, at that time, was suddenly shut up, and locked against us, and no other place was assigned at which Western produce could be landed, left, or sold. The news of this event stunned the West. I well recollect the effect upon the country, for I saw it, and felt it in my own person. I was a lad then, the eldest of a widow's sons—was living in Tennessee, and had come into Nashville to sell the summer's crop, and lay in the winter's supplies. We raised cotton, then, in that Southern part of Tennessee, and the price of fifteen cents a pound which had been paid for it, and three or four hundred pounds to the acre, and so many acres to the hand, had filled us all with golden hopes. I came into Nashville to sell the summer's crop. I offered it to the merchant, a worthy man, with whom we dealt. His answer, and the reason, came together, and gave the first intelligence of my own loss and the calamity of the country. Not a cent could he give for the cotton, for he was not a griper to take it for a nominal price. Not an article could be advanced upon the faith of it; not even the indispensable item of one barrel of salt. The salt and the articles were indeed furnished, and upon indulgent terms, but not upon the faith of the cotton; that was recommended to be laid away, and to wait the course of events.

This was the state of one and of all—of the entire country—Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, the western counties of Pennsylvania and Virginia; the territories of Indiana, Illinois and Mississippi. Every where, at every farm, the labor of the year was annihilated; the produce of the fields seemed to be changed into dust—struck by the wand of an enchanter, which transformed cotton, tobacco, and hemp, into the useless leaves of the forests. The shock was incredible; the sensation universal; the resentment overwhelming; the cry for redress loud and incessant. Congress met. That great man was then President, whose memory it has been my grief and shame to see struck at, this day, on this floor. The energy of the people, and the blessing of God, had just made Thomas Jefferson President of these United States. It was a blessed election, and a providential one for the people of the West! Upon that event depended the acquisition of Louisiana! Congress met. The outrage at New Orleans was the main topic in the President's message. His public message to the House of Representatives, replete with the spirit which filled the West, is known to the Union. His confidential message to the Senate is not known. It has been locked up until lately, in the sealed book of our secret proceedings. That seal is now broken, and I will read the part of this confidential message which developed the means of recovering, enlarging, and securing, our violated rights, and asked the aid of the Senate in doing so. It is the message which nominated the ministers to France who made the purchase of Louisiana.

The Message—Extract.

"While my confidence in our minister plenipotentiary at Paris is entire and undiminished, I still think that these objects might be promoted by joining with him a person sent from hence directly, carrying with him the feelings and sentiments of the nation excited on the late occurrence, impressed by full communications of all the views we entertain on this interesting subject, and thus prepared to meet, and improve to an useful result, the counter propositions of the other contracting party, whatever form their interest may give to them, and to secure to us the ultimate accomplishment of our object: I, therefore, nominate R. R. Livingston to be minister plenipotentiary, and James Monroe to be minister extraordinary and plenipotentiary, with full powers to both, jointly, or to either, on the death of the other, to enter into a treaty or convention with the First Consul of France, for the purpose of enlarging and more effectually securing, our rights and interests in the river Mississippi, and in the territories eastward thereof."

The reason for sending an additional minister is here stated, and stated with force and clearness. Mr. Livingston was in Paris, and, however faithful and able he might be, he was a stranger to the feelings excited by the occasion. The addition of Mr. Monroe would only make an embassy of two persons. Embassies of three, as in the mission to the French republic in '98, and of five, as at Ghent, in 1815, have been seen in our country. An embassy of two, in such a case as the violation of our right of deposit at New Orleans, and only one of them fresh from the United States, could not be considered extraordinary or extravagant. The selection of Mr. Monroe was, of all others, the most fit and acceptable. He was a citizen of Virginia—that great State, which had been the most early, steadfast, and powerful friend of the West; he was the champion of the Mississippi in that struggle of two years, under lock and key, when seven States undertook to surrender the navigation of that river; he was the ambassador called for, by the public voice of the South and West, and Mr. Randolph was the organ of that voice on the floor of the House of Representatives, when he declared that Mr. Jefferson could nominate no other person than Mr. Monroe. He was nominated. I have shown the message that did it, and the reasons that influenced the President. Let us now continue our reading of the Journal, and see how that nomination was received by the Senators from the North and from the South.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[FEB. 2, 1830.]

The Journal.

"WEDNESDAY, 12th January, 1830.

"The Senate took into consideration the message of the President of the United States, of January 11th, nominating Robert R. Livingston to be minister plenipotentiary, and James Monroe to be minister extraordinary and plenipotentiary, to enter into a treaty or convention with the First Consul of France, for the enlarging and more effectually securing our rights and interests on the river Mississippi; and

"Resolved, That they consent and advise to the appointment of R. R. Livingston, agreeably to the nomination.

"On the question, will the Senate consent and advise to the nomination of James Monroe? The yeas were, Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Clinton, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Franklin, Jackson, Logan, Nicholas, Stone, Sumpter, and Wright—15. The nays, Messrs. Dayton, Dwight, Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Ogden, Olcott, Plumer, Tracy, Wells, and White—12."

Fifteen for, twelve against, the nomination of Mr. Monroe. A majority of three votes in his favor; which is a difference of two voters; so that the nomination of Mr. Monroe lacked but two of being rejected. Whence came these twelve? Every one from the north of the Potomac, nearly all from New England, and the whole from the ranks of that political party, whose survivors, and residuary legatees, are now in hot pursuit of the alliance of the West! If any evidence is wanting to shew that the vote against Mr. Monroe was a vote against the object of his mission, it will be found, ten days afterwards, in the same Journal, upon the passage of a bill appropriating two millions of dollars to accomplish the purposes of the mission. On this bill the vote stood:

YEAS.—"Messrs. Anderson, Baldwin, Bradley, Breckenridge, Clinton, Cocke, Ellery, T. Foster, Jackson, Logan, S. T. Mason, Nicholas, Sumpter, and Wright—14."

NAYS.—"Messrs. Dayton, Dwight, Foster, Hillhouse, Howard, J. Mason, Morris, Olcott, Plumer, Ross, Stone, Wells, and White—12."

Mr. Monroe went. Fortune was at work for the West, while nearly one half of the American Senate, and a large proportion of the House of Representatives, were at work against her. War between France and England was impending; the loss of Louisiana in that war was among the most certain of its events; to get rid of the province before the declaration of hostilities, was the policy of the First Consul; and the cession to the United States was determined on before our minister could arrive. This was the work of Providence, or fortune, which no one here could foresee; which few are lawyerlike enough to lay hold of to justify the previous opposition to Mr. Monroe, and the vote against the two millions. The treaty of cession was signed by the First Consul; was brought home, made known to the nation, and received in the South and West with one universal acclaim of joy. Throughout the South and West it was hailed as a national benefaction, prepared by fortune, seized by Jefferson, and entitled to the devout thanksgiving of the American people. Not so in the Northeast. There a violent opposition broke out against it, upon the express ground that it would increase the power of the West; and when the treaty came up for ratification in the Senate, it received seven votes against it, being so many of the same party which had voted against the nomination of Mr. Monroe and the appropriation of two millions. In the House of Representatives the money bill for carrying the treaty into effect was voted against by twenty-five members, nearly the whole from the geographical quarter, and from the political party, that had opposed the treaty in the Senate.

The crisis was over; the great event was consummated; Louisiana was acquired; the navigation of the Mississippi secured; the prosperity of the West established forever.

The glory of Jefferson was complete. He had found the Mississippi the boundary, and he made it the centre of the republic. He re-united the two halves of the Great Valley, and laid the foundation for the largest empire of free-men that time or earth ever beheld. He planted the seed of imperishable gratitude in the hearts of myriads of generations who shall people the banks of the Father of Floods, and raise the votive altar, and erect the monumental statue, to the memory of him who was the instrument of God in the accomplishment of so great a work. And great is my grief and shame to have lived to see his name attacked in the American Senate! To have been myself the unconscious instrument of clearing the way for an impeachment of his word! and that upon the recollections of memories from whose tablets the stream of time may have washed away this small part of their accumulated treasures.

Let us pause, and reflect for a moment, upon the consequences to the West, and to the Union, if President Jefferson had not seized the opportunity of purchasing Louisiana; or, having purchased it, the Senate, or the House of Representatives, should have rejected the acquisition. In the first place, it is to be remembered that France, emerging from the vortex of her Revolution, overflowing with warriors, and governed by the Conqueror who was catching at the sceptre of the world, was then the owner of Louisiana. The First Consul had extorted it from the King of Spain in the year 1800; and the violation of the right of deposit at New Orleans was his first act of ownership over the new possession, and the first significant intimation to us, of the new kind of neighbor that we had acquired. Contemporaneously with this act of outrage upon us, was the concentration of twenty-five thousand men, under the general of division, afterwards Marshal Victor, in the ports of Holland, for the military occupation of Louisiana. So far advanced were the preparations for this expedition, that the troops were ready to sail; and commissaries to provide for their reception were engaged in New Orleans and St. Louis, when the transfer of the province was announced. Now, sir, put it on either foot: Louisiana remains a French, or becomes a British, possession. In the first contingency, we must have become the ally, or the enemy, of France. The system of Bonaparte admitted of no neutrals; and our alternatives would have been, between falling into the train of his continental system, or maintaining a war against him upon our own soil. We can readily decide that the latter would have been most honorable; but it is hard to say which would have been most fatal to our prosperity, and most disastrous to our republican institutions. In the second contingency, and the almost certain one, we should have had England established on our western as well as on our northern frontier; and I may add, our southern frontier also: for Florida, as the property of the ally of France, would have been a fair subject of British conquest in the war with France and Spain, and a desirable one, after the acquisition of Louisiana, and as easily taken as wished for; the vessel that brought home the news of the victory at Trafalgar being sufficient to summon and reduce the places of Mobile, Pensacola, St. Marks, and St. Augustine. This nation, thus established upon three sides of our territory, the most powerful of maritime Powers, jealous of our commerce, panting for the dominion of the seas, unscrupulous in the use of savage allies, and nine years afterwards to be engaged in a war with us! The results of such a position would have been, the loss, for ages and centuries, of the navigation of the Mississippi; the permanent occupation of the Gulf of Mexico by the British fleet; the consequent control of the West Indies; and the ravage of our frontiers by savages in British pay. These would have been the permanent consequences, to say nothing of the fate of the late war, commenced with our enemy encompassing us on three sides with her land forces, and covering the ocean in front with her proud navy, victorious over the combined fleets of France and Spain, and swelled with the ships of all nations. From these calamitous results, the acquisition of Louisiana delivered us; and that heart must be but little turned to gratitude and devotion which does not adore the Providence that made the great man President, who seized this gift of fortune, and overthrew the political party that would have rejected it.

The treaty was ratified, and not much to spare; one-third of the Senate would have defeated it, and the votes stood seven to twenty-four. But the ratification was only one half the business; many legislative enactments were necessary to make the acquisition available and useful, and the whole of these measures received more or less of determined opposition from the same geographical quarter and political party which had opposed the purchase. I will specify a few of the leading measures to which this opposition extended.

1. The bill to enable the Senate to take possession of Louisiana: Nays in the Senate—Messrs. Adams, Hillhouse, Olcott, Pickering, Plumer, and Tracy.

2. The bill to create a fund in stock for the Louisiana debt: Nays—Messrs. Hillhouse, Pickering, Tracy, Wells, and White.

3. The bill for extending certain laws of the United States to Louisiana: Nays—Messrs. Adams, Plumer, and Wells.

Among the laws to be thus extended, were all those for the regulation of the custom house, navigation, and commerce. If it had been rejected, New Orleans could not have been used as an American port.

4. The bill to establish a separate territory in Upper Louisiana: Nays—Messrs. Adams, Olcott, Hillhouse, Plumer, and Stone.

5. The bill to extend the powers of the Surveyors General to Louisiana: Nays—Messrs. Adair, Adams, Bayard, Bradley, Gilman, Hillhouse, Pickering, Plumer, Smith, of Maryland, Smith, of Vermont, and Wright; all north of the Potomac except one.

This vote [said Mr. B.] is the connecting link between the non-settlement clause, or the sell-out-complete clause, in the ordinance of 1786, and the non-survey, and non-emigration resolution now under debate. The three acts stand at twenty years apart—a wide distance in point of time—but they lie close together in spirit and intention, and announce a never sleeping watchfulness over the prevention of Western settlement and Western improvement.

6. Various bills for the confirmation of private claims, generally opposed by the like number of votes and voters.

7. The bill for the admission of the State of Louisiana into the Union: Nays—Messrs. Bayard, Champlin, Dana, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Horsey, Lloyd, Pickering, and Reed.

8. The bill to authorize the State of Louisiana to accept an enlargement of its territory: Nays—Messrs. Bradley, Franklin, Gorman, Gilman, Lambert, Lloyd, and Reed.

This bill was passed after West Florida was reduced to the possession of the United States. Its object was to permit the State of Louisiana, if she thought proper, to include within her limits all the territory east of the lakes Pontchartrain and Maurepas, the river Iberville, and east of the Mississippi, (above that river) to the line of the Mississippi Territory, and out to Pearl river. The importance of it will be seen by knowing that the State of Louisiana, at that time, included no territory east of the Mississippi, but the Isle of Orleans.

9. The resolutions of the Legislature of Massachusetts, in June, 1813, asserting the unconstitutionality of the act of Congress which admitted the State of Louisiana into the Union, and extended the laws of the United States thereto, and instructing the Massachusetts delegation in Congress to do their best to obtain its repeal. I will read them:

THE MASSACHUSETTS RESOLUTIONS,

Reported by a committee composed of Messrs. Josiah Quincy, Ashman, and Fuller, on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. Thatcher, Lloyd, Hall, and Bates, on the part of the House, and recorded in the Boston Centinel, June 26th, 1813, appended to a long report, viz:

“Resolved, As the sense of this Legislature, that the admission into the Union, of States created in countries not comprehended within the original limits of the United States, is not authorized by the letter or the spirit of the Federal constitution.

“Resolved, That it is the interest and duty of the people of Massachusetts to oppose the admission of such States into the Union, as a measure tending to the dissolution of the confederacy.

“Resolved, That the act passed the eighth day of April, 1812, entitled An act for the admission of Louisiana into the Union, and to extend the laws of the United States to the said State, is a violation of the constitution of the United States; and that the Senators of this State in Congress be instructed, and the Representatives be requested, to use the utmost of their endeavors to obtain a repeal of the same.”

This was the solemn act of Massachusetts, governed by that political party which now seeks the command of the West, under the name of an alliance! The Senator from Louisiana, who sits on my left, [Mr. JOHNSTON] adheres with a generous devotion—I call it generous, for it survives the downfall of its object—to that party which passed these resolutions, and would have kept his State out of the Union, and by consequence, himself out of this chamber. I do not reproach such generosity, but I contend for its limitation. The heart of that Senator belongs to his country, and I trust that his country will again possess him. He and I were once together. Our separation was from a point, and by slight degrees, though now so wide, like the travellers in the desert, parting from each other on two diverging lines; for a long time within hail, a long time in view—at last completely separated, but never way-layers nor destroyers of each other. I shall hope to see him return to the right line, and join his old companions. Nothing has happened to make him or them blush, at finding themselves again together. [Mr. B. here said something to Mr. J. (who sat near him) in an under tone, and in a playful mood—en badinant—the purport of which was, that he would wish to see him laid on the shelf for a while, notwithstanding.]

The admission of the State of Mississippi into the Union furnishes me with the next example in support of my side of the issue joined. It was no part of the territory of Louisiana, but a part of the original territory of the United States. Constitutional objections could not reach it, yet it met with the usual quantum of opposition. It was a Western measure, and, what was worse, a Southwestern measure, and the Journals of the Senate exhibit eleven nays to its admission. They were Messrs. Ashmun, Dagget, Goldsborough, Hunter, King, Macon, Mason, of N. H. Smith, Thompson, Tichenor, and Varnum. The name of the venerable Macon, which appears in this list, may be seized upon to cover the motives of all the others; but to do that it should first be shown that he and they voted upon the same motive. We know that votes may sometimes be alike, and the motives be different. That the vote of Mr. Macon was unfriendly to the Southwest, is a supposition contradicted by the acts of half a century; that the vote of the others was unfriendly, may be decided by the same test, the tenor of all previous conduct. After all, the instance would go but a short distance towards proving “that every measure favorable to the West had been carried by New England votes, in opposition to Southern votes.”

I come now to the admission of Missouri, but do not mean to dwell upon it. The event is too recent, the facts connected with it too notorious, to require proof, or even to admit of recital here. The struggle upon that question divided itself into two parts; the first, to prevent the existence of slavery in Missouri; the second, to secure the entrance of free blacks and mulattoes into it. Each part of the struggle divided the Union into two parts, the Potomac and the Ohio the dividing line, with slight exceptions; the South in favor of the rights of Missouri, the North against them. In the ranks of the latter were seen all the survivors of the ancient advocates for the surrender of the Mississippi—all the survivors of those who in the Congress of the confederation opposed the protection of the West; all the opponents to the acquisition of Louisiana; all the power of the federal party; and all the gentlemen of the Northeast who are now paying their addresses to the West. The contest, upon its face, was a question of slavery, and the rights of free negroes and mulattoes; in its heart, it was a question of political power, and so declared upon this floor by Mr. King, of New York. It was a terrible agitation, and convulsed the country, and, in a certain quarter of the country, swept all before it. The gentleman who has moved this resolution—the resolution now under discussion—was the victim of that storm, [Mr. Four, of Conn.] He was then a member of the House of Representatives. He would not join in this crusade against Missouri, and he fell under the displeasure of his constituents. But he fell on the side of honor and patriotism, with his conscience and his integrity in his arms; and the consequence of such a fall is to rise again, and to ascend higher than ever. The gentleman will appreciate the spirit in which I speak. My encomiums, poor as they may be, here or elsewhere, are neither profuse nor indiscriminate. I do justice to the motive which has made him the mover of the resolution to which I am so earnestly opposed. He believes it to be right, and that belief, erroneous as I hold it to be, is the effect of that unhappy part of our political system which makes the Representatives of remote States judges of the local measures of another State, with the proprieties of which they have no means of personal information. I oppose his resolution to the uttermost, but I respect his motive; I thank him for his vote in favor of Missouri in the crisis of her struggle, and for his motion some days ago in favor of donations to actual settlers. We may contend upon points of policy; but here, and elsewhere, and above all, in Missouri, if found there, I and mine will do honor to him and his.

Yes, sir, the Missouri struggle is too recent to admit of recitals, or to require proofs. It was but the other day that it all occurred—but the other day that the Representatives and the Senators of that State, myself one of them, were repulsed from the doors of Congress, and deforced, for one entire session, of their legitimate seats among you. And, what is now incredibly strange; what surpasses imagination, and staggers credulity, is to see myself called upon to deny that scene; called upon to treat the whole as an optical illusion; to reverse it, in fact, and submit to the belief that those whose blows we felt kicking and shoving us out, were the ones that drew us in! and those whose helping hands we felt drawing and hauling us in, are the identical ones who kicked and shoved us out!

The State of Missouri, [said Mr. B.] was kept out of the Union one whole year, for the clause which prohibited the future entry and settlement of free people of color. And what have we seen since? The actual expulsion of a great body of free colored people from the State of Ohio, and not one word of objection, not one note of grief, from those who did all in their power to tear up the constitution and break the Union to pieces, because, at some future day, it might happen that some free blacks would wish to emigrate to Missouri, and could not do it for this clause in her constitution! The papers state the compulsory expatriation from Cincinnati at two thousand souls; the whole number that may be compelled to expatriate from the State of Ohio at ten thousand! This is a remarkable event, paralleled only by the expulsion of the Moors from Spain, and the Huguenots from France. Let me not be misunderstood: I am not complaining of Ohio; I admit her right to do what she did. We are informed that this severe measure was the consequence of enforcing an old law, made for the benefit of the slave-holding States, and now found to be as necessary to Ohio as to them, and by which she has relieved herself, in thirty days, of the accumulated evil of thirty years. I complain not of this. My present business is with those who kept me out of my seat, kept my State out of the Union, and did all in their power to break up this confederacy because free people of color were prohibited from coming to live in Missouri!

My occupation for the present, is with these characters—"Les Amis des Noirs"—the friends of the blacks—then so plenty, now so scarce! Where are they? Where gone? How shrunk up! Not even one friend, one voice here! Where are the crowds that then thronged the public meetings? Where the tongues which were then so fluent? The sighs then so piercing? The eyes then so wet with tears? All gone; all silent; all hushed! The thronged crowd has disappeared; the fluent tongue has cleaved to the roof of the mouth, the piercing sigh has died away, and the streaming eye, exhausted of its fluid contents, has dried up to the innermost sources of the lachrymal duct, and hangs over the pitiable scene, with the arid composure of a rainless cloud in the midst of the sandy desert. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. W.] so copious and encomiastic upon the subject of Ohio, so full and affecting upon the topic of freedom, and the rights of freemen in that State, was incomprehensibly silent, and fastidiously mute, upon the question of this wonderful expatriation—an expatriation which sent a generation of free people from a republican State to a monarchical province, to seek, in a strange land, and beyond the icy lakes, the hospitality and protection of a foreign king! For them he had nothing to say. Their condition attracted no part of his regards. They are gone; unwept and unsung; they have gone to experience the fate, and to renew the history, of the abducted slaves of the Revolution, who were taken from their homes and their masters, collected into a settlement in the British province of Nova Scotia, became a pestilence there, and were exiled to Sierra Leone, to perish under the climate and the savages. For these people, and the pitiable fate that awaits them, the eloquent disclaimer upon the blessings of liberty in Ohio had nothing to say. I thought, indeed, at one time, he was taking their track: it was when he was engaged in that lively personification of the soil of Ohio, which would not bear the tread of a slave's foot upon it; which rebelled and revolted against the servile impression, until it threw off and discharged the base, incongruous load; something like a kicking up horse when a monkey is put upon his back. I thought, at that time, that the metaphorical orator, pushing his tropes and figures to that "bourne" from which some flights of eloquence have never returned, was going to put the climax upon the regurgitative faculties of this miraculous soil, and show us, in this great emigration of free blacks, that it would not bear the tread of a foot that ever had been in slavery! But, suddenly, and to me unexpectedly, his ideas took another turn. Instead of crossing the lakes to pity the blacks, he crossed the river to pity the whites. He faced about to the South, crossed over into Kentucky, made a domiciliary visiting into the country, and fell, incontinently, to shingling the ground, and blacking the inhabitants, until they all looked like ebionics, and were mired, thirty layers deep, in conflicting land titles. When I saw that, I smote my breast, and heaved a sigh, at the sad vicissitudes of human affections. I felt, if I did not cry out, for Kentucky! Poor Kentucky! but yesterday the loved and cherished object of all affection! the engrossing theme of every praise! now scanned and criticised! her faults all told, and counted! her value cast up! the sum found less! and the late adored object thrown "as a worthless weed away!"

Third Day's Remarks.

I was on the subject of slavery, as connected with the Missouri question, when last on the floor. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAYNE] could see nothing in the question before the Senate, nor in any previous part of the debate, to justify the introduction of that topic. Neither could I. He thought he saw the ghost of the Missouri question brought in among us. So did I. He was astonished at the apparition. I was not: for a close observation of the signs in the West had prepared me for this development from the East. I was well prepared for that invective against slavery, and for that amplification of the blessings of exemption from slavery, exemplified in the condition of Ohio, which the Senator from Massachusetts indulged in, and which the object in view required to be derived from the Northeast. I cut the root of that derivation by reading a passage from the Journals of the old Congress; but this will not prevent the invective and encomium from going forth to do their office; nor obliterate the line which was drawn between the free State of Ohio and the slave State of Kentucky. If the only results of this invective and encomium were to exalt still higher the oratorical fame of the speaker, I should spend not a moment in remarking upon them. But it is not to be forgotten that the terrible Missouri agitation took its rise from the "substance of two speeches" delivered on this floor; and since that time, anti-slavery speeches, coming from the same political and geographical quarter, are not to be disregarded here. What was said upon that topic was certainly intended for the north side of the Potomac and Ohio; to the people, then, of that division of the Union, I wish to address myself, and to disabuse them of some erroneous impressions. To them I can truly say, that slavery, in the abstract, has but few advocates or defenders in the slave-holding States, and that slavery as it is, an hereditary institution, descended upon us from our ancestors, would have fewer advocates among us than it has, if those who have nothing to do with the subject would only let us alone. The sentiment in favor of slavery was much weaker before those intermeddlers began their operations than it is at present. The views of leading men in the North and the South were indisputably the same in the earlier periods of our Government. Of this our legislative history contains the highest proof. The foreign slave trade was prohibited in Virginia, as soon as the Revolution began. It was one of her first acts of sovereignty. In the convention of that State which adopted the Federal constitution, it was an objection to that instrument that it tolerated the African slave trade for twenty years. Nothing that has appeared since has surpassed the indignant denunciations of this traffic by Patrick Henry, George Mason, and others, in that convention. The clause in the ordinance of '86 against slavery in the Northwest, as I have before shown, originated in a committee of three members, of whom two were from slave-holding States. That clause, and the whole ordinance, received the vote of every slave State present, at its final passage. There were but eight States present, four from the south of the Potomac, and only one from New England. It required seven States to pass the ordinance; it could have been passed without the New England States, but not without three, at least, of the Southern ones. It had all four: Virginia, the two Carolinas, and Georgia. Compare this with the vote on the Missouri restriction, when intermeddlers and designing politicians had undertaken to regulate the South upon the subject of slavery! The report in the House of Representatives, some twenty years ago, against the application from Indiana for a limited admission of slaves, was drawn by Mr. Randolph; the same Mr. Randolph whose declaration in the House of Representatives, only three years ago, that he would hang any man who would bring an African into Virginia, was falsified, for the basest purposes, by substituting "Irishman" for African! Yes, sir, slavery, as it is, and as it exists among us, would have fewer advocates, if those who have nothing to do with it would let it alone. But they will not let it alone. A geographical party, and chiefly a political caste, are incessantly at work upon this subject. Their operations pervade the States, intrude into this chamber, display themselves in innumerable forms, and the thickening of the signs announces the forthcoming of some extraordinary movement. Sir, I regard with admiration, that is to say, with wonder, the sublime morality of those who cannot bear the abstract contemplation of slavery, at the distance of five hundred or a thousand miles off. It is entirely above, that is to say, it affects a vast superiority over the morality of the primitive Christians, the apostles of Christ, and Christ himself. Christ and the apostles appeared in a province of the Roman empire, when that empire was called the Roman world, and that world was filled with slaves. Forty millions was the estimated number, being one fourth of the whole population. Single individuals held twenty thousand slaves. A freed man, one who had himself been a slave, died the possessor of four thousand—such were the numbers. The rights of the owners over this multitude of human beings was that of life and death, without protection from law or mitigation from public sentiment. The scourge, the cross, the fish-pond, the den of the wild beast, and the arena of the gladiator, was the lot of the slave, upon the slightest expression of the master's will. A law of incredible atrocity made all slaves responsible with their own lives for the life of their master; it was the law that condemned the whole household of slaves to death, in case of the assassination of the master—a law under which as many as four hundred have been executed at a time. And these slaves were the white people of Europe and of Asia Minor, the Greeks and other nations, from whom the present inhabitants of the world derive the most valuable productions of the human mind. Christ saw all this—the number of the slaves—their hapless condition—and their white color, which was the same with his own; yet he said nothing against slavery; he preached no doctrines which led to insurrection and massacre; none which, in their application to the state of things in our country, would authorize an inferior race of blacks to exterminate that superior race of whites, in whose ranks he himself appeared upon earth. He preached no such doctrines, but those of a contrary tenor, which inculcated the duty of fidelity and obedience on the part of the slave—humanity and kindness on the part of the master. His apostles did the same. St. Paul sent back a runaway slave, Onesimus, to his owner, with a letter of apology and supplication. He was not the man to harbor a runaway, much less to entice him from his master; and, least of all, to excite an insurrection.

Slavery, which once filled the Roman world, has disappeared from most of the countries which composed that great dominion. It has disappeared from nearly all Europe, and from half the States of this Union. There and here it has ceased upon the same principle: upon the principle of economy, and a calculation of interest—a calculation which, in a certain density of population and difficulty of subsistence, makes it cheaper to hire a man than to own him; cheaper to pay for the work he does, and hear no more of him, than to be burthened with his support from the cradle to the grave. Slavery never ceased any where on a principle of religion; the religion of all nations consecrates it. Its abolition cannot be enforced among Christians on that ground, without reproaching the founder of their religion. Many who think themselves Christians are now engaged in preaching against slavery; but they had better ascertain whether they have fulfilled the precepts of Christ, before they assume a moral superiority over him, and undertake to do what he did not. To the politicians who are engaged in the same occupation, it is needless to give the like admonition. They have their views, and the success of these would be poorly promoted by following the precepts of the Gospel. Their kingdom is of this world; and to reach it, they will do the things they ought not, and leave undone the things which they ought to do. Slavery will cease, in the course of some generations, in several of the States where it now exists, and cease upon the same principle on which it has disappeared elsewhere. In some parts it is not sustainable now, upon a calculation of interest. Habit and affection is the main bond. A great amelioration in the condition of the slave has taken place. In most of the States they are as members of the family, and in all the essential particulars of labor, food, and raiment, they fare as the rest of the laboring community. Some masters are cruel; but the laws condemn such cruelty; and, what is more effectual than the law, is the abhorrence of public sentiment. But cruelty is not confined to the black slave; it extends to the white apprentice, to the orphans that are bound out, and to the children of the poor that are hired to the rich. Many of these can, and often do, tell pitiable tales of stinted food and excessive work, of merciless beatings, brutal indignities, and precocious debaucheries. The advance of the public mind has been great upon the subject of slavery. Let any one look back to the conferences at Utrecht, in 1712, when England was ready to continue the greatest of her wars for the sake of the asiento—the contract for supplying Spanish America with slaves—and see the conduct of the Virginia Assembly, in 1776, and England herself, in 1780, denouncing and punishing that traffic as a crime against God and man. It has not advanced of late, but retrograded—I speak of these United States. Witness the two epochs of the ordinance of '86, and the admission of Missouri, in 1820. Intrusive and political intermeddling produced this reverse. Such meddling can do no good to the objects of its real or affected commiseration. It does harm to them. It prevents the enactment of some kind laws, and occasions the passage of some severe ones. It totally checks emancipation, and deprives the slave of instruction, as the most merciful way of saving him from the penalties of murder and insurrection, which the reading of incendiary pamphlets might lead him to incur.

I have been full, I am afraid tedious, on the subject of slavery. My apology must be found in the extraordinary introduction of this topic by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER.] I foresee that this subject is to act a great part in the future politics of this country; that it is to be made one of the instruments of a momentous movement—not for dividing the Union—something more practicable and more damnable than that. The prevention of a world of woe may depend upon the democracy of the non-slaveholding States. The preservation of their own republican liberties may depend upon it. Never was their steadfast adhesion to the principles they profess, and to their natural allies, more necessary than at present. To them I have been speaking; to them I continue to address myself. I beseech and implore them to suffer their feelings against slavery to have no effect upon their political conduct; to join in no combinations against the South for that cause; to leave this whole business to ourselves. I think they can well let it alone, upon every principle of morals or policy. Are they Christians? Then they can tolerate what Christ and his apostles could bear. Are they patriots? Then they can endure what the constitution permits. Are they philosophers? Then they can bear the abstract contemplation of the ills which afflict others, not them. Are they friends and sympathisers? Then they must know that the wearer of the shoe knows best where it pinches, and is most concerned to get it off. Are they republicans? Then they must see the downfall of themselves, and the elevation of their adversaries, in the success of a crusade, under federal banners, against their natural allies, in the South and West.

Let the democracy of the North remember, that it is the tendency of all confederacies to degenerate into a sub-confederacy among the powerful, for the government and oppression of the weaker members. Let them recollect that ambition is the root of these sub-confederacies; religion, avarice, and geographical antipathies, the instruments of their domination; oppression, civil wars, pillage, and tyranny, their end. So says the history of all confederacies. Look at them. The Amphictyonic league—a confederacy of thirty members—received the law and the lash from Sparta, Thebes, and Athens. The Germanic confederation, of three hundred States and free cities, was governed by the nine great electorates, which ruled and pillaged as they pleased: the Imperial Diet being to them something like what the Supreme Court is proposed to be here—a tribunal before which the States and free cities could be called, placed under the ban of the empire, and delivered up to military execution. The seven United Provinces; the strong province of Holland alone deciding upon all questions of peace and war, loans and taxes, and dragging the inferior provinces into acquiescence and compliance. The thirteen Swiss cantons, in which the strong aristocratic cantons pillaged and ravaged the weak ones, on account of their religion and democracy, often calling in the Dukes of Savoy to assist in the chastisement. Let the democracy of the North remember these things, and then eschew, as they would fly the incantations of the serpent, the siren songs of ancient foes, who would enlist their feelings in a concert of a cion which is to end in arraying one-half of the States of this Union against the other. Have we no ambition in this confederacy? no means of enabling it to work as in Greece, Germany, Holland, and the Swiss cantons? Look at the fallen leaders, panting for the recovery of lost power. Look at the ten millions of surplus in the treasury, after the extinction of the public debt; at the three hundred millions of acres of public lands in the new States and Territories; at the forty millions of exports of the South; and see if there be not, in the modes of dividing these, among certain strong States, for internal improvement, education, and protection of domestic industry, ample means for acting on the feelings of avarice. Look at the excitements getting up about Indians, slaves, masonry, Sunday mails, &c. and see if there are no materials for working upon religion or fanaticism.

The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. W.] had a vision, in the after part of his second day's speaking. He saw an army with banners, commanded by the new Major General of South Carolina, the Senator who sits on my right, [General HAYNE] marching forward upon the custom house in Charleston, sometimes expounding law as a civilian, sometimes fighting as a general. It was a pleasant vision, sir, but no more than a vision. Now, I can have a vision also, and of a banner with inscriptions upon it, floating over the head of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. W.] while he was speaking: the words "Missouri Question, Colonization Society, Anti-Slavery, Georgia Indians, Western Lands, More Tariff, Internal Improvement, Anti-Sunday Mails, Anti Masonry." A cavalcade under the banner—a motley group—a most miscellaneous concourse, the speckled progeny of many conjunctions—veteran Federalists—benevolent females—politicians who have lost their caste—National Republicans—all marching on to the next Presidential election, and chanting the words on the banner, and repeating, "under these signs we conquer." Did you see it, Mr. President? Your look says, No. But I cannot be looked out of my vision. I did see something, the shade at least of a substance—the apparition of a real event—making its way from the womb of time, and casting its shadow before. I shall see it again—at Philippi—and that before the Greek kalends, about the ides of November, 1832.

I mean no disrespect, sir, to the benevolent females for whom I have found a place in this procession. Far from it. They have earned the place by the part they are acting in the public meetings for the instruction of Congress on the subject of these Georgia Indians. For the rest, I had rather take my chance, in such a cavalcade, among these benevolent females, than among the unbenevolent males; had rather appear in the feminine than in the masculine gender; had rather march in bonnet, cloak, and petticoats, than in hat, coat, and pantaloons. With the aid of the famous corset-maker, Madame Cantalo, to draw me up a little, I had rather trip it along as a Miss, in frock and pantalets, than figure as a war chief of the Georgia Cherokees, bedecked and bedizened in all the finery of paint and feathers. I had rather be on foot among the damsels, than on horse among the leaders, white, black, and red. I apprehend these leaders will be on foot on the return march, dismounted and discomfited, unhorsed and unharnessed, better prepared for the flight than the fight, and leading the ladies out of danger after having led them into it. In that retreat, I would recommend it to the benevolent females to place no reliance upon the performances of their delicate little feet. Their unequal steps would vainly strive to keep up with the "double quick time" of their swift conductors. No helping hand then to be stretched back for the "little Iulus." It would be a race that Virgil has described, a long interval between the great heroes ahead and the little ones behind. I would recommend it to these ladies, not to douse their bonnets, and tuck up their coats, for such a race, but to sit down on the way side, and wait the coming of the conquerors. The new Major General of South Carolina will then be in the field in reality; his banner will then be seen, not advancing upon a custom house, but pursuing the flying hosts of the National Republicans; and from him the "benevolent females" will have nothing to fear.

I come now to a momentous period in this Union—one well calculated to test other questions, besides that of relative friendship to the West—I speak of the late war with Great Britain. We began it for wrongs on the ocean; but the West quickly became its principal theatre, and in the beginning encountered defeats and disasters, which called for the aid and sympathy of other parts of the Union. I say nothing about the declaration of war; that was a question of opinion, and might have two sides to it; but, after the bloody conflict was begun, there was but one side for Americans. The Senator from Massachusetts has laid down the law of duty to a citizen, (when the Government has adopted a line of policy) in accounting for his support of the tariff of 1828, after opposing that of 1824. The Government had adopted the tariff policy, he says, and thereupon it became his duty to support that policy. I will not stop to inquire how far future opposition was included in such a case. It is sufficient, for my present purpose, to show that the Senator from Massachusetts has laid down this acquiescence in, and support of, the policy of the Government, in a case of common and ordinary legislation; after that, it cannot be denied, in the highest of all cases to which it can apply, that of a foreign war, and that war calamitous to his own country. New England, more accurately speaking the then dominant party in New England, opposed the declaration of war, and that after a leader of that party had declared, upon the floor of the House of Representatives, that the administration could not be kicked into war. She opposed the declaration; but I leave that out of the question. The war is declared, it is commenced, it is disastrous; and the heaviest disasters fall upon the West. Her armies are beaten; her frontier posts taken; her territory invaded. Her soil is red with the blood, and white with the bones of her sons. Her daughters are in mourning; the land is filled with grief; and cries for succor pervade the Union. Where was then relief for the West? What was then the conduct of the Northeast? What the conduct of the South? * * * The Senator from South Carolina [General HAYNE] has shown you what was the conduct of the Northeast. He has read the acts which history, and his eloquence, will deliver down to posterity, showing that the then dominant party in New England was as well disposed to aid the enemy as to aid the West. He showed that it was a main object of the Hartford Convention to exclude the West from the Union. The Senator from Massachusetts made light of these readings; he called them uncanonical collects. In one respect, a part of them were like a collect; they came from the pulpit; but, instead of being prayers, unless the prayers of the devil and his black angels be understood, they were curses, execrations, and damnation to the West. The Senator from Massachusetts denied their authority, and washed his hands of them. I will, therefore, read him something else; the authority of which will not be so readily denied, nor the hands so easily washed off. I speak of a speech delivered on the floor of the House of Representatives, about the middle of the late war, when things were at their worst, and of certain votes upon the army bill, the militia bill, the loan bill, the tax bill, and the treasury note bill. And first, of the speech. It purports to have been delivered by the Senator to whom I am now replying, in the session of 1813-14, on the discussion of the bill to fill the ranks of the regular army.

The Speech—Extracts.

"It is certain that the real object of this proposition to increase the military force to an extraordinary degree, by extraordinary means, is to act over again the scenes of the two last campaigns. To that object I cannot lend my support. I am already satisfied with the exhibition.

"Give me leave to say, sir, that the tone on the subject of the conquest of Canada seems to be not a little changed. Before the war, that conquest was represented to be quite an easy affair. The valiant spirits who meditated it, were only fearful lest it should be too easy to be glorious. They had no apprehension, except that resistance would be so powerful as to render the victory splendid. * * * How happens it, sir, that this country, so easy of acquisition, and over which, according to the prophecies, we were to have been, by this time, legislating, dividing it into States and Territories, is not yet ours? Nay, sir, how happens it that we are not even free of invasion ourselves; that gentlemen here call on us, by all the motives of patriotism, to assist in the defence of our own soil, and portray before us the state of the frontiers, by frequent and animated allusion to all those topics which the modes of Indian warfare usually suggest?

"This, sir, is not what we were promised. This is not the entertainment to which we were invited. This is no fulfilment of those predictions which it was deemed obstinacy itself not to believe. This is not the harvest of greatness and glory, the seeds of which were supposed to be sown with the declaration of war.

"When we ask, sir, for the causes of these disappointments, we are told that they are owing to the opposition which the war encounters, in this House and among the people. All the evils which afflict the country are imputed to the opposition. This is the fashionable doctrine, both here and elsewhere. It is said to be owing to opposition that the war became necessary; and owing to opposition, also, that it has been prosecuted with no better success.

"This, sir, is no new strain. It has been sung a thousand times. It is the constant tune of every weak or wicked administration. What minister ever yet acknowledged that the evils which fell on his country were the necessary consequences of his own incapacity, his own folly, or his own corruption? What possessor of political power ever yet failed to charge the mischief resulting from his own measures upon those who had uniformly opposed those measures?" * * *

"You are, you say, at war for maritime rights and free trade. But they see you lock up your commerce, and abandon the ocean. They see you invade an interior province of the enemy. They see you involve yourselves in a bloody war with the native savages: and they ask you if you have, in truth, a maritime controversy with the Western Indians; and are really contending for sailors' rights with the tribes of the Prophet."

This speech requires no comment, and will admit of none. Its own words go beyond any that could be substituted. "Valiant spirits—too easy to be glorious—tone changed—prophecies unfulfilled—frontiers invaded—assistance called for—entertainment—animated allusions to the modes of Indian warfare—bloody war with the savages—contending with tribes of the prophet for sailors' rights—weak and wicked—folly and corruption—lend no support—satisfied with the exhibition."

These phrases of cutting sarcasm, of cool contempt, of bitter reproach, and stern denial of succor, deserve to be placed in a parallel column with what we have just heard of love to the West, and of the protecting arm extended over her. I will not dwell upon them; but there are two phrases which extort a brief remark: "Satisfied with the exhibition"—"lend no support." What was the exhibition of these two campaigns, the first and second of the war, to which this expression of satisfaction, and denial of support, extends? It was this: In the southwest, the massacre at Fort Mimms; the Creek nation in arms; British incendiaries in Pensacola and St. Marks, exciting savages to war, and slaves to rebellion; the present President of the United States at the Ten Islands of the Coosa river, in a stockade of twenty yards square, with forty young men of Nashville, holding the Creek nation in check, and calling for support. In the Northwest, all the forts which covered the frontiers captured and garrisoned by the enemy; Michigan Territory reduced to the condition of a British province; Ohio invaded; the enemy encamped and entrenched upon her soil; the British flag flying over it—over that soil of Ohio, which, according to what we have just heard, could not bear the tread of a slave, now trod in triumph by the cruel Proctor and his ferocious myrmidons. This is the exhibition which the first and second campaigns presented in the West; for I limit myself to that quarter of the Union, the present question being one of relative friendship to the West. This is the exhibition which the West presented—these the scenes which called for succor, and to relieve which the extract that I have read declares that none would be lent. The author of that speech was satisfied with this exhibition; he would do nothing to change it. The political and geographical party with which he acted were equally well satisfied, and equally determined to let things remain as they were. They voted accordingly against every measure for the relief of the bleeding and invaded West; against the bill to fill the ranks of the regular army; against the bill to call out the militia; against the bill to borrow money; against the bill to lay taxes; against the bill to issue treasury notes! The Journals of Congress will show the recorded votes of those who now set up for the exclusive friends of the West, in opposition to all these bills. The reading of the yeas and nays on the whole of these measures would be tedious and unnecessary; a single set will show how they stood in every instance. I select, for my example, the vote in the House of Representatives on the passage of the bill the discussion of which called forth the speech from which an extract has been made.

Such were the votes of the North and South on the passage of this bill. Such were the votes of the then dominant party of the Northeast, in that dark hour of calamity and trial to the West. Such was their answer in reply to our calls for help—even the calls of that Ohio, which is now the cherished object of all affection, the chosen theme of highest eulogy, the worshipped star in that new constellation of superior planets, which are to shed, not their "selectest influences," but "disastrous twilight on half the States." It is not for me to trace a parallel between these votes and the words and acts of the same political party in the States from which the voters came. It is not for me to measure the difference between the conduct which gives aid to the enemy and that which denies aid to your own country. The question is a close one, and may exercise the ingenuity of those who can detect the difference between the "west side and the northwest side of a hair." It is not for me to confound these votes and the extract of the speech with the words and acts of those who received the successes of their own country with grief, and its defeats with joy; who held "soft intercourse" with the enemy, when he had established himself upon the soil, and upon the calamities of this Union; who saw, with savage exultation, the cruel massacre and dreadful burning of the wounded prisoners at the river Raisin, and gave vent to their hellish joy, from the holy pulpit, in the impious declaration that "God had given them blood to drink." It is not for me to confound these things; it may be for others to unmix them. I turn to a more grateful task: to the contemplation of the conduct of the South, in the same season of woe and calamity. What was then their conduct? What their speeches and their votes in Congress? Their efforts at home? Their prayers in the temple of God? Time and ability would fail in any attempt to perform this task; to enumerate the names and acts of those generous friends, in the South, who then stood forth our defenders and protectors, and gave us men and money, and beat the domestic foe in the capitol, while we beat the foreign one in the field. Time and my ability would fail to do them justice; but there is one State in the South, the name and praise of which the events of this debate would drag from the stones of the West, if they could rise up in this place and speak. It is the name of that State upon which the vials, filled with the accumulated wrath of years, have been suddenly and unexpectedly emptied before us, on a motion to postpone a land debate. That State, whose microscopic offence, in the obscure parish of Colleton, is to be hung in equipoise with the organized treason, and deep damnation, of the Hartford Convention: that State, whose present dislike to a tariff which is tearing out her vitals, is to be made the means of exciting the West against the whole South: that State, whose dislike to the tariff laws is to be made the pretext for setting up a despotic authority in the Supreme Court: that State which, in the old Congress, in 1785, voted for the reduction of the price of public lands to about one-half of the present minimum; which, in 1786, redeemed, after it was lost, and carried, by its single vote, the first measure that ever was adopted for the protection of Kentucky, that of the two companies sent to the Falls of Ohio: that State which, in the period of the late war, sent us a Lowndes, a Cheves, and a Calhoun, to fight the battles of the West in the capitol, and to slay the Goliaths of the North: that State which, at this day, has sent to this chamber, the Senator [MR. HAYNE] whose liberal and enlightened speech, on the subject of the public lands, has been seized upon and made the pretext for that premeditated aggression upon South Carolina, and the whole South, which we have seen met with a promptitude, energy, gallantry, and effect, that has forced the assailant to cry out an hundred times that he was still alive, though we all could see that he was most cruelly pounded.

Memory is the lowest faculty of the human mind; the irrational animals possess it in common with man; the poor beasts of the field have memory. They can recollect the hand that feeds, and the foot that kicks them; and the instinct, of self preservation tells them to follow one, and to avoid the other. Without any knowledge of Greek or Latin, these mute, irrational creatures "fear the Greek offering presents;" they shun the food, offered by the hand that has been lifted to take their life. This is their instinct; and shall man, the possessor of so many noble faculties, with all the benefits of learning and experience, have less memory, less gratitude, less sensibility to danger, than these poor beasts? And shall he stand less upon his guard, when the hand that smote is stretched out to entice? shall man, bearing the image of his Creator, sink thus low? shall the generous son of the West fall below his own dumb and reasonless cattle, in all the attributes of memory, gratitude, and sense of danger? shall his "Timeo Danaos" have been taught to him in vain? shall he forget the things which he saw, and part of which he was—the events of the late war—the memorable scenes of fifteen years ago? The events of former times, of forty years ago, may be unknown to those who are born since. The attempt to surrender the navigation of the Mississippi; to prevent the settlement of the West; the refusal to protect the early settlers of Kentucky and Tennessee, or to procure for them a cession of Indian lands; all these trials, in which the South was the savior of the West, may be unknown to the young generation, that has come forward since; and with respect to these events, being uninformed, they may be unmindful and ungrateful. They did not see them; and, like the second generation of the Israelites, in the Land of Promise, who knew not the wonders which God had done for their forefathers in Egypt, they may plead ignorance, and go astray after strange gods; after the Baals and the Astaroths of the heathen; but not so of the events of the last war. These they saw! the aid of the South they felt! the deeds of a party in the Northeast they felt, also. Memory will do its office for both; and base and recreant is the son of the West that can ever turn his back upon the friends that saved, to go into the arms of the enemy that mocked and scorned him in that season of dire calamity.

I proceed to a different theme. Among the novelties of this debate, is that part of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts which dwells with such elaboration of argument and ornament, upon the love and blessings of Union—the hatred and horror of disunion. It was a part of the Senator's speech which brought into full play the favorite Ciceronian figure of amplification. It was up to the rule in that particular. But, it seemed to me, that there was another rule, and a higher, and a precedent one, which it violated. It was the rule of propriety; that rule which requires the fitness of things to be considered; which requires the time, the place, the subject, and the audience, to be considered; and condemns the delivery of the argument, and all its flourishes, if it fails in congruence to these particulars. I thought the essay upon union and disunion had so failed. It came to us when we were not prepared for it; when there was nothing in the Senate, nor in the country, to grace its introduction; nothing to give, or to receive, effect to, or from, the impassioned scene that we witnessed. It may be, it was the prophetic cry of the distracted daughter of Priam, breaking into the council, and alarming its tranquil members with vaticinations of the fall of Troy: But to me, it all sounded like the sudden proclamation for an earthquake, when the sun, the earth, the air, announced no such prodigy; when all the elements of nature were at rest, and sweet repose pervading the world. There was a time, and you, and I, and all of us, did see it, sir, when such a speech would have found, in its delivery, every attribute of a just and rigorous propriety! It was at a time, when the five-striped banner was waving over the land of the North! when the Hartford Convention was in session! when the language in the capitol was, "Peaceably, if we can; forcibly, if we must!" when the cry, out of doors, was, "the Potomac the boundary; the negro States by themselves! The Alleghenies the boundary; the Western savages by themselves! The Mississippi the boundary, let Missouri be governed by a prefect, or given up as a haunt for wild beasts!" That time was the fit occasion for this speech; and if it had been delivered then, either in the hall of the House of Representatives, or in the den of the convention, or in the high way, among the bearers and followers of the five-striped banner, what effects must it not have produced! What terror and consternation among the plotters of disunion! But, here, in this loyal and quiet assemblage, in this season of general tranquillity and universal allegiance, the whole performance has lost its effect for want of affinity, connexion, or relation, to any subject depending, or sentiment expressed, in the Senate; for want of any application, or reference, to any event impending in the country.

I now take leave of this part of my subject, with one expression of unmixed satisfaction, at a part, a very small part, of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts; it is the part in which he disclaimed, in reply to an inquiry from you, sir, the imputation of a change of policy on the Tariff and Internal Improvement questions. Before that disclaimer was heard, a thousand voices would have sworn to the imputation; since, no one will swear it. And the reason given for not referring to you, for not speaking at you, was decent and becoming. You have no right of reply, and manhood disdains to attack you. This I comprehend to have been the answer, and the reason so promptly given by the Senator from Massachusetts in reply to your inquiry. I am pleased at it. It gives me an opportunity of saying there was something in that speech which commands my commendation, and, at the same time, relieves me from the duty of stating to the Senate a reason why the presiding officer, being Vice President of the United States, should not be struck at from this floor. He cannot reply, and that disability is his shield in the eyes of all honorable men.

Fourth Day's Remarks.

I touched it incidentally, towards the conclusion of my speech of yesterday, on the large—I think I may say despotic—power, claimed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] for the Federal Supreme Court, over the independent States, whose voluntary union has established this confederacy. I touched incidentally upon it, and now recur to it for the purpose of making a single remark, and presenting a single illustration of the consequences of that doctrine. That court is called supreme; but this character of supremacy, which the Federal constitution bestows upon it, has reference to inferior courts—the District and Circuit Courts—and not to the States of this Union. A power to decide on the Federal constitutionality of State laws, and to bind the States by the decision, in all cases whatsoever, is a power to govern the States. It is a power over the sovereignty of the States; and that power includes, in its practical effects, authority over every minor act and proceeding of the States. The range of Federal authority was large, under the words of the constitution; it is becoming unlimited under the assumption of implied powers. The room for conflict between Federal and State laws was sufficiently ample, in cultivating the clear and open field of the expressed powers; when the exploration of the wilderness of implications is to be added to it, the recurrence of these conflicts becomes incessant and universal, covering all time, and meeting at every point of Federal or State policy. The annihilation of the States, under a doctrine which would draw all these conflicts to the Federal Judiciary, and make its decisions binding upon the States, and subjected to the penalties of treason all who resisted the execution of these decrees, would produce that consequence. It would annihilate the States! It would reduce them to the abject condition of provinces of the Federal Empire! It would enable the dominant party in Congress, at any moment, to execute the most frightful designs. Let us suppose a case—one by no means improbable—on the contrary almost absolutely certain, in the event of the success of certain measures now on foot: The late Mr. King, of New York, when a member of the American Senate, declared, upon this floor, that slavery in these United States, in point of law and right, did not exist, and could not exist, under the nature of our free form of Government; and that the Supreme Court of the United States would so declare it. This declaration was made about ten years ago, in the crisis and highest paroxysm of the Missouri agitation. Since then, we have seen this declaration repeated and enforced, in every variety of form and shape, by an organized party in all the non-slaveholding States. Since then, we have seen the principles of the same declaration developed in legislative proceedings, in the shape of committee reports and public debate, in the halls of Congress. Since then, we have had the D'Au-terive case, and seen a petition presented from the Chair of the House of Representatives, Mr. JOHN W. TAYLOR being Speaker, in which the total destruction of all the States that would not abandon slavery was expressly represented as a sublime act. With these facts before us, and myriads of others, which I cannot repeat, but which are seen by all, the probability of a federal legislative act against slavery rises in the scale, and assumes the character of moral certainty, in the event of the success of certain designs now on foot. So much for what may happen in Congress. Now for the Judiciary. I have just referred to the declaration of an ex-Senator, [Mr. KING of New York] of all others the best acquainted with the arcana of his party; who was to that party, for a full quarter of a century, the law and the prophets; for a bold assertion of what the Supreme Court would do in a question of existence, or non-existence, of slavery in the United States. He openly asserted that the Supreme Court would declare that no such thing could exist! It is not to be presumed that that aged, experienced, informed and responsible Senator would have hazarded an assertion of such dire and dreadful import; an assertion so delicately affecting the judges then on the bench of that court; a majority of them his personal and political friends; and looking to such disastrous consequences to the Union, without probable, if not certain, ground for the basis of his assertion. That he had such grounds, so far at least as one of the judges was concerned, seems to be incontestable. A charge delivered to a grand jury by Mr. Justice Story, at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, in the month of May, 1820—for the date is material—it tallies, in point of time, with the assertion in the Senate, and was classed for review, as an article of politics, in the North American Review, with the substance of Mr. King's two speeches on the floor of the Senate, which were the signal for the Missouri strife—a signal as well understood, and as implicitly obeyed, as the signal for battle in the Roman camp, when the Red Mantle of the Consul was hung on the outside of the tent. This charge, to a grand jury, establishes the fact of authority for the assertion of Mr. King, so far at least as one of the judges is concerned. But as every man should be judged by his own words, and not upon the recital of another, let the charge itself be read; let the Judge announce his own sentiments, in his own language.

The Charge—Extract.

"The existence of slavery under any shape is so repugnant to the natural rights of man and the dictates of justice, that it seems difficult to find for it any adequate justification. It undoubtedly had its origin in times of barbarism, and was the ordinary lot of those who were conquered in war. It was supposed that the conqueror had a right to take the life of his captive, and by consequence might well bind him to perpetual servitude. But the position itself on which this supposed right is founded is not true. No man has a right to kill his enemy, except in cases of absolute necessity; and this absolute necessity ceases to exist, even in the estimation of the conqueror himself, when he has spared the life of his prisoner. And even if, in such cases, it were possible to contend for the right of slavery, as to the prisoner himself, it is impossible that it can justly extend to his innocent offspring through the whole line of descent. I forbear, however, to touch on this delicate topic, not because it is not worthy of the most deliberate attention of all of us, but it does not properly fall in my province on the present occasion."

"And, gentlemen, how can we justify ourselves, or apologize for an indifference to this subject? Our constitutions of government have declared that all men are born free and equal, and have certain unalienable rights, among which are the right of enjoying their lives, liberty, and property, and seeking and obtaining their own safety and happiness. May not the miserable African ask, 'Am I not a man and a brother?' We boast of our noble strength against the encroachments of tyranny, but do we forget that it assumed the mildest form in which authority ever assailed the rights; and yet there are men amongst us who think it no wrong to condemn the shivering negro to perpetual slavery."

"We believe in the Christian religion. It commands us to have good will to all men; to love our neighbors as ourselves, and to do unto all men as we would they should do unto us. It declares our accountability to the Supreme God for all our actions, and holds out to us a state of future rewards and punishments, as the sanction by which our conduct is to be regarded. And yet there are men, calling themselves Christians, who degrade the negro by ignorance to a level with the brutes, and deprive him of all the consolations of religion. He alone, of all the rational creation, they seem to think, is to be at once accountable for his actions, and yet his actions are not to be at his own disposal; but his mind, his body, and his feelings, are to be sold to perpetual bondage."

We will take the case of slavery then as the probable, and in the event of the success of certain designs now on foot, as the certain one, on which the new doctrine of judicial supremacy over the States may be tried. The case of the Georgia Cherokees is a more proximate, and may be a precedent one; but, as no intimation of the possible decision of the court in that case has been given, I shall pretermit it, and limit myself to the slavery case, in which the declaration of Mr. King, and the charge of one of the judges, leaves me at liberty to enter, without guilt of intrusion, into that sanctum sanctorum of the judiciary—the privy chamber of the judges—the door of which has been flung wide open. Let us suppose then that a law of Congress passes, declaring that slavery does not exist in the United States—that the States South of the Potomac and Ohio, with Missouri from the West of the Mississippi, deny the constitutionality of the law—that the Supreme Court takes cognizance of the denial—commands the refractory States to appear at its bar—decides in favor of the law of Congress, and puts forth the decree which, according to the new doctrine, it is treason to resist! What next? Either acquiescence or resistance, on the part of the slave States. Acquiescence involves, on the part of the States towards this court, a practical exemplification of the old slavish doctrines of passive obedience and non-resistance which the Sacheverells of Queen Anne's time preached and promulgated in favor of the King against the subject; with all the mischief, superadded, of turning loose two millions of slaves here, as the French National Convention and their agents, Santhonax and La Croix, had turned loose the slaves of the West India Islands. Resistance incurs all the guilt of treason and rebellion; draws down upon the devoted States the troops and fanatics of the Federal Government, arms all the negroes according to the principle declared in D'Auteville's case, and calls in, by way of attending to the women and children, the knife and the hatchet of those Georgia Cherokees which it is now the organized policy of a political party to retain, and maintain, in the bosom of the South.

We have read and heard much, [said Mr. B.] of late years, of the madness and violence of the people—the tyranny and oppression of military leaders: but we have heard nothing of judicial tyranny, judicial oppression, and judicial subserviency to the will and ambition of the King or President of a country. Nothing has been said on this branch of the subject, and nothing that I have ever seen, or read of, has sunk so deep upon my mind as the history of judicial tyranny, exemplified in the submission of the judges to the will of those who made them. My very early reading led me to the contemplation of the most impressive scenes of this character, which the history of any country affords—speak of the British State Trials, which I read at seven or eight years old, under the direction of a mother, then a very young, now an aged widow. It was her wish to form her children to a love of liberty, and a hatred of tyranny, and I had wept over the fate of Raleigh, and Russell, and Sydney, and I will add, the Lady Alice Lyle, before I could realize the conception that they belonged to a different country, and a different age, from my own. I drank deep at that fountain! I drew up repeated, copious, and overflowing draughts of grief and sorrow for suffering victims—of resentment, fear, and terror, for their cruel oppressors. Nothing which I have read in history since, not even the massacres of Marius and Sylla, nor the slaughters of the French Revolution, have sunk so deep upon my mind as the scenes which the British State Trials disclosed to me; the view of the illustrious of the land seized, upon the hint of the King, carried to the dungeon, from the dungeon to the court, from the court to the scaffold; there, the body half-hung, cut down half alive, the belly ripped open, and the bowels torn out, the limbs divided and stuck over gates, the property confiscated to the King, the blood of the family attainted, and widows and orphans turned out to scorn and want. Nothing which I have ever read equals the deep impression of these scenes; partly because they came upon my infant mind, more because it was a cold-blooded business, a heartless tyranny, in which the judges acted for the King, without passions of their own, and are stript of all the extenuations which contending parties claim for their excesses when either gets the upper hand in the crisis of great struggles. True, these scenes of judicial tyranny and oppression existed long since; but where is the modern instance of judicial opposition to the will of a King or President of the country for the time being? Are there five instances in five centuries? Are there four? three? two? one? No, not one! The nearest approach to such opposition, in the history of the British Judiciary, is the famous case of the ship money, when four judges, out of twelve, ventured an opinion against the Crown. In our own country no opposition from the bench has gone that length. The odious and notorious sedition law was enforced throughout the land by federal judges. Not one declared against it; and if a civil war, in that disastrous period between the Presidents Washington and Jefferson, had depended upon the judicial enforcement of that act, we should have had civil war. We have heard much of the independence of the judges, but since about eight hundred years ago, when the old King Alfred hung four and forty of them in one year, for false judgments, there have been but few manifestations of judicial independence in reference to the power from which they derive their appointment. Since that time, the judges and the appointing power have usually thought alike in all the cardinal questions which affect that power. This may be accounted for without drawing an inference to the dishonor of the judge, and as it will answer my purpose just as well to place the account upon that foot, I will cheerfully do it. I will say, then, that Kings and Presidents, having the nomination of judges, forever have chosen, and upon all the principles of human action with which I am acquainted, forever will choose, these high judicial officers from the class of men whose political creed corresponds with their own. This is enough for me; it is enough for the illustration of the subject which we have in hand. Supposing a certain design, now on foot, to succeed; supposing, some four or eight years hence, a new creation of judges to come forth, either under a new law for the extension of the judiciary, or to fill up vacancies; supposing the doctrine to be established which is now announced by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] and that court has to pass upon a slavery law, or an Indian law, which the States hold to be void, and decree it to be binding, where is then the legitimate conclusion of the gentleman's doctrine? Passive obedience and non-resistance to the Supreme Court, and the President that made it, or civil war with Indians and negroes for the allies of the Federal Government. Sir, I do not argue this point of the debate; I have a task before me—the rectification of the assertions of the Senator from Massachusetts—which I mean to execute. I have turned aside from that task to make a remark upon the doctrine, and to illustrate it by an example which would make the Supreme Federal Court despotic over the States. I return to my task, with repeating the words of him [Mr. RANDOLPH] whose words will be the rallying cry of liberty and patriotism in ages yet to come; I repeat them, then, but without the magical effect of that celestial infusion which God vouchsafed to him, divine eloquence, the words which, three months ago, electrified the Virginia Convention: "The chapter of Kings, in the Holy Bible, follows next after the chapter of Judges."

I will now take up the instances, I believe there are but few of them, and that I can make short work of them, quoted by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. W.] in support of his assertion, that all the measures favorable to the West have been carried by northern votes in opposition to southern ones. He asserted this to be the case from the beginning to the ending, from the first to the last, of the chapter of this Government; but he did not go back to the beginning of the chapter, nor even to the middle of it, nor, in fact, further than some ten leaves of it. He got back to the year 1820, just to the edge of the Missouri question, but not a word of that, and began with the reduction of the price of public land from two dollars to one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. That he proclaims as a western measure, and dwells upon it, that New England gave thirty-three votes in favor of that reduction, and the four Southern States but thirty-two! Verily, this is carrying the measure in opposition to the votes of the South, in a new and unprecedented sense of the word. But was it a Western measure? The history of the day tells us no; that the Western members were generally against it, because it combined a change of terms from the credit to the ready money system, with the reduction. This made it unacceptable to the Western members, and they voted against it almost in a body. The leading men of the West opposed it; Mr. Clay in a speech, with great earnestness. Mr. Trimble and Mr. Metcalfe, of Kentucky, voted against it; both the Kentucky Senators did the same; both the present Senators from Indiana; the Representative from Illinois, and many others. The opposition, though not universal, was general from the West; and no member lost the favor of his constituents on that account. The Senator's first instance, then, of New England favor to the West, happens to be badly selected. It fails at both points of the argument; at the alleged victory over the South, in behalf of the West, and at the essential feature of favor to the West itself. This is a pity. It knocks one leg off of the stool which had but two legs to it from the beginning. The Senator had but two instances of New England favor to the West, prior to the coining and billing of the Presidential election in the House of Representatives in 1825. One of these is gone; now for the next. This next one, sole survivor of a stunted race, is the extension of credit to the land debtors in the year 1821. This I admit to be a measure of cherished importance to the West. Let us see how the rival parties divided upon it. The Senator from Massachusetts stated the division loosely, and without precision as to the numbers. He said that New England, with forty members in the House of Representatives, gave more affirmative votes than the four Southern States with their fifty-two members. How many more he did not say; and that want of precision induced me to cause the matter to be looked into; and the result appears to be that in the list of yeas, New England, on that occasion, beat the South two votes, and in the list of nays, she beat three votes; that is to say, she gave two votes more than the South did for the passage of the bill, and three votes more than the South against the passage of it! This leaves a majority of one in favor of the South, and so off goes the other leg of the two legged stool; and the Senator from Massachusetts, according to my arithmetic, is flat upon the ground.

I think, sir, it was in the triumph of his soul at having two instances, and those the ones I have dissected, in which New England gave favorable votes to the West, prior to the honey moon of the Presidential election of 1825, that the Senator from Massachusetts broke out into his "time when," "manner how," and "cause why," which seemed to have been received as attic wit "by some quantity of barren spectators" that chanced to be then present. I think it was in reference to these two instances that the Senator from Massachusetts made his address to the Senator from South Carolina, [General HAYNE] and still ringing the changes upon the when, the how, and the why, said to the Senator from South Carolina that, if this did not satisfy him of the disinterested affection of the Northeast to the West, prior to the scenes of soft dalliance which accompanied the Presidential election of 1825, that he did not know how he ever would be satisfied. Good, sir, let us close a bargain—pardon the phrase—on that word. The Senator from Massachusetts knows of nothing to prove affection in the Northeast to the West prior to the sweet conjunction and full consummation of 1825, except these two instances. They seemed to be but a poor dependence—a small plaster for a large sore—when he brought them forward. What are they now? Reduced to nothing—literally nothing—worse than nothing; an admitted acknowledgment that the case wanted proof, and that none can possibly be found.

But the tariff! the tariff! That is a blessing, at least, which the West must admit it received from the Northeast! Not the tariff of 1824: for against that, it is avowed by the Senator from Massachusetts that the New England delegation voted in solid column. It is the tariff of 1828 to which he alludes, and for the blessings of which to the West he now claims its gratitude to the Northeast. Upon this claim I have two answers to make: First, that this instance of affection to the West is posterior to the election of 1825, and falls under the qualification of the entire system of changes which followed, consequentially, upon the approximation and conjunction of the planets which produced that event. Secondly, that almost the only item in that tariff of any real value to the West—the increased duty on hemp, was struck at from the Northeast, and defended from the South. The Senator from Massachusetts, to whom I am now replying, himself moved to expunge the clause which proposed to grant us that increase of duty. True, he proposed to substitute a nominal and illusory bounty on the insignificant quantity of hemp used on the ships of war of the United States, being the one twentieth part of what is used on the merchant vessels, and undertook to make us believe that the one twentieth part of a thing was more than the whole. He could not make us believe it. We refused his bounty; we voted eighteen against him, being every Senator from the West; New England voted ten out of twelve against us; the South voted eight out of eight for us; and the increased duty on hemp was saved—saved by that South, in opposition to that New England, which the Senator from Massachusetts has so often declared to be the friend of the West, and to have carried every measure favorable to it, in opposition to the votes of the South!

Internal Improvement was the last resort of the Senator's ingenuity, for showing the affection of the Northeast to the West. It was on this point that his appeal to the West, and calls for an answer, were particularly addressed. The West will answer; and, in the first place, will show the amount, in value, in money, of the favors thus rendered, in order to ascertain the quantity of gratitude due and demandable for it. On this point we have authentic data to go upon. A resolution of the Senate, of which I was myself the mover, addressed to the ex-administration in the last year of its existence, called upon the then President to exhibit to the Congress a full statement of all the money expended by the Federal Government, from 1789 to 1828, in each of the States, upon works of Internal Improvement. The report was made, authenticated by the signatures of the President, Mr. Adams, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Rush, and several heads of Bureaus. It is No. 69 of the Senate documents, for the session 1828—1829; and at page thirteen of the document the table of recapitulation is found, which shows the amount expended in each State. Let us read some items from it.

The Table.

1. Kentucky,	-	-	-	$ 90,000
2. Tennessee,	-	-	-	4,200
3. Indiana,	-	-	-	nothing.
4. Illinois,	-	-	-	8,000
5. Mississippi,	-	-	-	23,000
6. Missouri,	-	-	-	nothing.
7. Louisiana,	-	-	-	do.

A most beggarly account! [said Mr. B.] About one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars in seven Western States, up to the end of that administration which assumed to be the exclusive champion of Internal Improvement. A small sum truly, for the young and blooming West to take, for the surrender of all her charms to the ancient and iron-hearted enemy of her name. Ohio, it is not to be dissembled, has received something more; but that depends upon another principle—he the principle of governing the West through her.

But the Cumberland road—that great road, the construction of which, as far as the Ohio river, cost near two millions of dollars. Sir, the man must have a poor conception of the West who considers the road to Wheeling as a Western object, to be charged upon the funds and the gratitude of the West. To the Eastern parts of Ohio it may be serviceable; but to all beyond that State, it is little known except by name. A thousand Eastern people travel it for one farmer or mechanic of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Kentucky, or Tennessee. It is, in reality, more an Eastern than a Western measure, built in good part with Western money, taken from the Western States, as I humbly apprehend, in violation of their compacts with the Federal Government. These compacts stipulate that two per cent. of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands shall be laid out by Congress in making roads or canals “to” the States, not towards them. The laws for building the Cumberland road have seized upon all this fund, already amounting, in the four Northwestern States, to three hundred and twenty-six thousand dollars, and applied it to the Cumberland road. The same laws contain a curious stipulation, not to be found in any other law for making a road, which stipulates for the future reimbursement, out of the two per cent. fund, of all the money expended upon it. This truly is a new way of conferring a favor, and establishing a debt of gratitude! But when did the New England votes in favor of this road, and other Western objects, commence? How do they compare before and since the Presidential election of 1825? Let the Journals tell. Let confronting columns display the contrast of New England votes upon this point, before and after that election.

THE CONTRAST.

5. April 24, 1824. Bill for survey of roads, &c.—Nays, 9 out of 12.

1. February 24, 1825. Motion to postpone appropriation for Cumberland road.—Yeas, 5 out of 12.

3. January 2, 1827. Bill to extending the Cumberland road.—Nays, 5 out of 12.

4. March 28, 1828. Bill to give land to Kenyon College.—3 out of 12.

5. December, 1828. Bill for making compensation for Indian depredations in Missouri.—Yeas, 4 out of 12.

Yes, [said Mr. B.] the Presidential election of 1825 was followed by a system of changes. There seems to have been a surrender and sacrifice of principles on that occasion somewhat analogous to the surrender and murder of friends which followed the conjunction of Antony, Lepidus, and Cæsar. It would seem that some guardian genius had whispered, the “Tariff, Internal Improvement, and Slavery, are the questions to govern this Union. Now let us all agree, and throw up old scruples, and work together upon Slavery, Tariff, and Internal Improvement.” They did throw up! Old scruples flew off like old garments. Leading politicians came “to the right about;” the rank and file followed; and the consequence was, the confronting votes and conduct which five years of explanations and justifications leave at the exact point at which they began.

The canal across the Alleghanies is mentioned. I utterly disclaim and repudiate that canal as a Western object. And here, [said Mr. B.] I take up a position which I shall fortify and establish on some future occasion. It is this: That every canal, and every road, tending to draw the commerce of the Western States across the Alleghany mountains, is an injury to the people of the West. My idea is this: That the great and bulky productions of the West will follow the course of the waters, and float down the rivers to New Orleans; that our export trade must, and will, go there; that this city cannot buy all, and sell nothing; that she must have the benefit of the import trade with us; that the people of the West must buy from her as well as she from them; that the system of exchange and barter must take effect there; that if it does not, and the West continues to sell its world of productions to New Orleans for ready money, and carries off that money to be laid out in the purchase of goods in the Atlantic cities, the people of the West are themselves ruined; for New Orleans cannot stand such a course of business; she will fail in supplying the world of money which the world of produce requires; and the consequence will be the downfall of prices in every article. This is somewhat the case now. New Orleans is called an uncertain market; her prices for beef, pork, flour, bacon, whiskey, tobacco, hemp, cotton, and an hundred other articles, is compared with the prices of like articles in the Atlantic cities, and found to be less; and then she is railed against as a bad market; as if these low prices was not the natural and inevitable effect of selling every thing and buying nothing there. As to the idea of sending the products of the West across the Alleghenies, it is the conception of insanity itself! No rail roads or canals will ever carry them, not even if they do it gratis! One trans-shipment, and there would have to be several, would exceed the expense of transportation to New Orleans, to say nothing of the up-stream work of getting to the canal or rail way; itself far exceeding the whole expense, trouble, and delay, of getting to New Orleans. Besides, such an unnatural reversal of the course of trade would be injurious to the Western cities—to Cincinnati, Louisville, St. Louis, and to many others. It would be injurious and fatal to our inland navigation—the steamboats of the West. They are our ships, their tonnage is already great, say thirty thousand tons; the building of them gives employment to many valuable trades, and creates a demand for many articles which the country produces. To say nothing of their obvious and incredible utility in the transportation of persons, produce, and merchandise, each steam boat has itself become a market, a moving market, that comes to the door of every house on the rivers, taking off all its surplus fowls, and vegetables; all its surplus wood: the expenditure for this single object in the past year, in two calculations made for me, ranged between nine hundred thousand and one million of dollars. No, sir, the West is not going to give their steam boats—their ships, not of the desert, but of noble rivers. They are not going to abandon the Mississippi, mare nostrum—our sea—for the comfort of scaling the Alleghany mountains with hogsheads of tobacco, barrels of whiskey, pork, and flour, bales of hemp, and coops of chickens and turkeys on their backs! We are not going to impoverish New Orleans, by selling our produce to her, and buying our merchandise elsewhere, and in that impoverishment committing suicide upon ourselves. Nor am I going to pursue this subject, and explore it in all its important bearings, at this time; I have that task to perform, but it will be reserved for another occasion.

I resume the subject of Internal Improvement. I say, and I say it with the proof in hand, that this whole business has been a fraud upon the West. Look at its promise and performance. Its promise was to equalize the expenditure of public money, and to counterbalance, upon roads and canals in the West, the enormous appropriations for fortifications, navy yards, light houses, and ships, on the Atlantic board; its performance has been to increase the inequality of the expenditures; to fix nearly the whole business of Internal Improvement on the east of the Alleghany mountains; to add this item, in fact, to all the other items of expenditure in the East! Such was the promise; such has been the performance. Facts attest it; and let the facts speak for themselves.

The Facts.

1. Cumberland Road to Wheeling,	$2,000,000
2. Delaware Breakwater, (required)	2,500,000
3. Canal over the Alleghany, (subscribed)	1,000,000
4. Baltimore Rail Road, (demanded)	1,000,000
5. Delaware and Chesapeake Canal,	450,000
6. Nantucket Harbor, (demanded)	900,000

Here we go by the millions, while the West, to whom all the benefits of this system were promised, obtains with difficulty, and somewhat as a beggar would get a penny, a few miserable thousands. But, sir, it is not only in the great way, but in the small way also, that the West has been made the dupe of this delusive policy. She has lost not only by the gross but by retail. Look at the facts again. See what her partner in this work of Internal Improvement, the Northeast, which commenced business with her in 1825, has since received, in the small way, and upon items that the West never heard of, under this head of Internal Improvement.

The Facts—again.

1. Preservation of Little Gull Island,	$30,000
2. Preservation of Smutty Nose Island,	15,000

3. Preservation of Plymouth beach,	49,000
4. Preservation of islands in Boston harbor,	63,000
5. Improvement of the Hyannis harbor,	10,000
6. Improvement of Squam and Gloucester,	6,000
7. Preservation of Deer Island,	87,000
8. Removing a sand bar in Merrimac river,	32,000
9. Building a pier at Stonington,	20,000
10. Making a road to Mars hill,	57,000

Near $400,000 actually paid out in this small way, and upon these small items, in New England, while seven States in the West, up to the last day of the coalition administration, had had expended within their limits, for all objects, great and small, Indian roads and the light house at Natchez included, but $125,000. And this, sir, is the New England help for which the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. W.] stood up here challenging the gratitude of the West! But this is not all; the future is still to come; a goodly prospect is ahead; and let us take a view of it. The late administration, in one of its communications to Congress, gave in a list of projects to be selected for future execution. I will recite a few of them.

The Projects.

1. Improvement at Saugatuck.
2. do at Amounisuck.
3. do at Pausmic.
4. do at Winnipisseogee.
5. do at Piscataqua.
6. do at the Ticonic Falls.
7. do at Lake Memphrymagog.
8. do at Conneaut Creek.
9. do at Holmes' Hole.
10. do at Lovejoy's Narrows.
11. do at Steele's Lodge.
12. do at Cowhegan.
13. do at Androscoggin.
14. do at Cobbisecontee.
15. do at Poncaupechaux, alias Soapy Joe.

Such are a sample of the projects held in abeyance by the late administration, and to be executed in future. They were selected as national objects!—national! and not a man in the two Americas, outside of the nation of New England, who can take up the list and tell where they are, without a prompter or a gazetteer. And now, sir, what are the results of this partnership, of five years' standing, between the West and the Northeast, in the business of Internal Improvement? First: Nothing, or next to nothing, for Kentucky, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Illinois, Indiana, and Missouri. Secondly: Eight or nine millions of dollars for large objects east of the Alleghany mountains. Thirdly: Near $400,000 for small neighborhood objects, in New England. Fourthly: A selection of objects in the Northeast, for future national improvement, the very names of which are unknown in the neighboring States. These are the results. Let any one weigh and consider them, and say whether this business of Internal Improvement has not been a delusion upon the West; if our partners in the East have not kept the loaf under their own arm, and cut off two or three huge huncks for themselves for every thin and narrow slice which they threw to us? What is worse, that is to say, what is truly mortifying to our pride, is, that we are not allowed to choose for ourselves. It is in vain that we contend that Western objects should be somewhere in the valley of the Mississippi; our partners, assuming the office of guardians, tell us it is a mistake; that every true, genuine, native-born, full-blooded western improvement must begin upon the Atlantic coast, and if one end of it points towards the setting sun, that is enough. It is now six years since I made a movement upon an object actually Western; one which, being completed, will produce more good for less money, according to my belief, than any other of which the wide extent of this confederacy is susceptible. It is the series of short canals, sir, amounting in the aggregate to twenty-seven miles, which would unite New Orleans and Georgia; which would connect, by an inland steam boat navigation, safe from storms, pirates, privateers, and enemy's fleets, the Chatahoochee and the Mississippi, the bays of Mobile, Pensacola, and St. Marks; and enable the provisions of the Western country to go where they are exceedingly wanted, to the cotton plantations on the rivers Amite, the Pearl, and Pascagoula, in the State of Mississippi; the Tombecbee and Alabama rivers, in the State of Alabama; the Conecuh and Escambia, in West Florida; the Chatahoochee, for five hundred miles up it, on the dividing line of Georgia and Alabama. The Senator from Louisiana, who sits on my left, [Mr. JONKSTON] moved the bill that obtained the appropriation for surveying this route, four years ago; the Senator from the same State, who sits on my right, [Mr. LIVINGSTON] has sent a resolution to the Road and Canal Committee, to have the work began; and the fate of this undertaking may illustrate the extent to which the voice of the West can go, in selecting objects of improvement within its own limits, and for itself.

Such are the results of the Western attempts to equalize expenditures, to improve their roads, and enrich themselves upon public money by means of the Internal Improvement power exercised by the Federal Government. The South, we are told, and told truly, has voted no part of these fine allowances to the West. And thence it is argued, and argued incorrectly, that she is an enemy to the West. Sir, the brief answer to that charge of enmity is, that she has voted nothing on this account for herself; she has voted for us as she did for herself; the argument should be, that she loved us as well as she did herself; and this is all that conscientious people can require. But another view remains to be taken of this affection, which is to be tried by the money standard. It is this: That, if the South has voted us no public money for roads and canals, they have paid the West a great deal of their own private money for its surplus productions. The South takes the provisions of the West, its horses and mules besides, and many other items. The States south of the Potomac, south of the Tennessee river, and upon the lower Mississippi, is the gold and silver region of the West. Leave out the supplies which come from this quarter, and the stream that Missouri is drawing from Mexico, also to the South of us, and all the gold and silver that is derived from other places—from any places north of Mason's and Dixon's line—would not suffice to pay the postage of letters, and the ferrage of rivers. This Southern trade is the true and valuable trade of the West; the trade which they cannot do without; and with these States it is proposed that we shall have a falling out, turn our backs upon them, and go into close connexion with a political caste in a quarrel of the Union from which the West never did, and never can, find a cash market for her surplus products. I know that the West is not credited for much sagacity, and the result of her Internal Improvement partnership goes to justify the Boetian imputation to which we have been subject; but there are some things which do not require much sagacity, nor any book learning, to discover how they lie. Little children, for example, can readily find out on which side their bread is buttered, and the grown men of the West can as quickly discover from which side of Mason's and Dixon's line their gold and silver comes. We hear much about binding the different sections of the Union together; every road and every canal is to be a chain for that purpose. Granted. But why break the chains which we have already? Commerce is the strongest of all chains. It is the chain of interest. It binds together the most distant nations; aliens in color, language, religion, and laws. It unites the antipodes; men whose feet are opposite, whose countries are separated by the entire diameter of the solid globe. We have a chain of this kind with the South, and we are to the politician that shall attempt to cut it or to break it. The late Presidential election was an affair of some interest to the West. The undivided front of the Western electoral vote tested the unity and the intensity of her wishes on that point. Was that election carried by Northern votes in opposition to Southern ones? Was the West helped out by the North, in that hard struggle of four years duration? Yes, to the extent of one electoral vote from the republican district of Maine; to the extent of many thousand individual votes; but these came from the democracy, some few exceptions; but nothing from that party which now assumes to be the friend of the West, and so boldly asserts that every Western measure has been carried by Northern in opposition to Southern votes.

The graduation bill, [said Mr. B.] is a Western measure: there is no longer any dispute about that. It came from the West, and is supported by the West. Memorials from eight Legislatures have demanded it; seventeen out of eighteen Western Senators have voted for it. Has the Northeast carried that bill in opposition to the South? It has repeatedly been before both Houses—was once on its final passage in this chamber, and wanted four votes, which was only a change of position in two voters to carry it. Did the Northeast, out of her twelve voters present, give us these two? She did not. Did she give us one? No, not one. There was but one from the North of Mason's and Dixon's line, and that of an honorable Senator—I do not call him honorable by virtue of a rule—who is no longer a member of this body—I speak of Mr. Ridgely, of Delaware, that little State, whose moral and intellectual strength on this floor has often kept her in the first rank of importance. How was it to the South? A brilliant and powerful support from the Senator of Virginia, not yet in his seat, [Mr. TAZEWELL] whose name, for that support, is borne with honor upon the legislative page of Missouri and Illinois; a firm support from the two Senators from Georgia, [MESSRS. CORB and BERRIN] since ceased to be members. A motion for reconsideration from the venerable MACON—the friend of me and mine through four generations in a straight line—to reconsider the vote of rejection with a view of passing the main part, the first section, which contained the whole graduation clause. Several other Senators from the South, who then voted against the bill, expressed a determination to examine it further, and intimated the pleasure it would give them to vote for it at another time, if found, upon further examination, to be as beneficial as I supposed. Thus stood the South and West upon that greatest and truest of all Western measures; and we shall quickly see how they stand again; for the graduation bill is again before the Senate, and next in order after the subject now in hand.

How stand the North and South on another point of incalculable interest to the West—the motion now under discussion—no, not now under discussion—the motion now depending, to stop the surveys, to limit the sales of public lands, and to abolish the offices of the Surveyors General? How stand the parties on that point? Why, as far as we can discover, without the report of yeas and nays, the Northeast, with the exception of the Senator from New Hampshire, on my right, [Mr. WOODBURY] against us; the South unanimous for us. And thus, the very question which has furnished a peg to hang the debate on, which has brought out the assertion that every measure friendly to the West has been carried by New England votes, in opposition to Southern votes, is itself evidence of the contrary, and would have placed that evidence before the West in the most authentic form, if the ingenious Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] had not evaded that consequence, by moving an indefinite postponement, and thereby getting rid of a direct vote on the resolution, which has become current under the name of the Senator who introduced it, [Mr. FOOTE, of Connecticut.]

How stand the South and North upon another point,

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[FEB. 2, 1830.]

also of overwhelming concern to the West—the scheme for partitioning out the new States of the West among the old ones? Whence comes that scheme? Who supports it? What its real object? The West will be glad to know the when, the why, and the how, of that new and portentous scheme. But, first, what is it? Sir, it is a scheme to keep the new States in leading strings, and to send the proceeds of the sales of the public lands to the States from which the public lands never came. It is a scheme to divide the property of the weak among the strong. It is a scheme which has its root in the principle which partitioned Poland between the Emperors of Russia and Germany and the King of Prussia. Whence comes it? From the Northeast. How comes it? By an innocent and harmless resolution of inquiry. When comes it? Contemporaneously with this other resolution of innocent and harmless inquiry into the expediency of limiting the settlement, checking emigration to the West, and delivering up large portions of the new States to the dominion of wild beasts. These two resolutions come together, and of them it may be said, “these two make a pair.” A newspaper in the Northeast contained a letter written from this place, giving information that the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Foot] was brought in to anticipate and forestall the graduation bill. I saw it in that light, [said Mr. B.] before I saw the letter. I had announced it in that character long before I received the letter, and read it to the Senate. This resolution then was to check-mate my graduation bill! It was an offer of battle to the West! I accepted the offer; I am fighting the battle: some are crying out and hauling off; but I am standing to it, and mean to stand to it. I call upon the adversary to come on and lay on, and I tell him—

“Darned be he that first cries out enough.”

Fair play and hard play is the game I am willing to play at. War to the knife, and the knife to the hilt; but let the play be fair. Nothing foul; no blackguardism. This resolution, then, from the other end of the capitol, twin brother to the one here, comes from the Northeast; is resisted by the South, and is ruinous to the West. New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, New Jersey, and Delaware, were unanimous for it: Massachusetts, nine to one for it; South Carolina and Georgia were unanimously against it; Virginia, ten to one against it; North Carolina, eight to four against it. This scene presents itself to my mind, [said Mr. B.] as a picture with three figures upon it. First, the young West, a victim to be devoured. Secondly, the old North, attempting to devour her. Thirdly, the generous South, ancient defender and savior of the West, stretching out an arm to save her again.

Let these two resolutions pass, and ripen into the measures which their tenor implies to be necessary, and the seal is fixed, for a long period, on the growth and prosperity of the West. Under one of them the sales of the lands will be held back; under the other, every possible inducement will arise to screw up the price of all that is sold. From that moment the West must bid adieu to all prospect of any liberal change in the policy of the United States in the sale and disposition of the public lands; no more favor to the settler, no justice to the States; no sales on fair and equitable terms. Grinding avarice will take its course, and feed full its deep and hungry maw. Laws will be passed to fix the minimum price at the highest rate; agents will be sent to attend the sales, and bid high against the farmer, the settler, and the cultivator. Dreadful will be the prices then run up. The agents will act as attorneys for the plaintiffs in the execution. The money is coming to the States they represent; they can bid what they please. They can bid off the whole country, make it the property of other States, and lease or rent small tracts to the inhabitants. The preservation of the timber will become an object of high consideration to these new lords proprietors; and hosts of spies, informers, prosecutors, and witnesses, will be sent into the new States, to waylay the inhabitants, and dog the farmers round their fields, to detect and persecute the man who cuts a stick, or lifts a stone, or breaks the soil of these new masters and receivers. While the land is public property, and the proceeds go into the treasury, like other public money, there is less interest felt in the sales by the individual States; but, from the moment that the proceeds of the sales are to be divided out by a rule of proportion which would give nearly all to the populous States, from that moment it would be viewed as State property, and every engine would be set to work to make the lands produce the utmost possible farthing for the individual States. Each would calculate, in every question of sale or gift, how much his State, and how much he himself, as a unit in that State, was to gain or lose by the operation. And who are to be the foremost and most insatiable of these new lords proprietors? Let the vote, on the reference of the resolution, answer the question; let it tell. They are the States which never gave any land to the Federal Government! Massachusetts and Maine, which retained their thirty thousand square miles of vacant territory, and are now selling it at twenty-five, at twenty, at ten, and at five cents per acre. Connecticut, which seized upon two millions of acres of the land which Virginia had ceded to the Federal Government, and held fast to the jurisdiction as well as the soil, until the Congress agreed to give her a deed “to all the right, title, interest, and estate, of the United States” to the soil itself. Who are our defenders? They are the States south of the Potomac, which were, themselves, the great donors of land to the Federal Government. Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia—these are our defenders! And without their defence, the West would fare now as she would have fared without it forty years ago, in the times of the old confederation.

I have now, [said Mr. B.] gone through the “chapter” of the conduct of the Federal Government, and the relative affection of the North and South to the West. I commenced without exordium, and shall finish without peroration. On two points more, and only two, I wish to be understood.

First, As to the reason which has induced me to enter, with this length and precision of detail, into the question of relative affection from the North and South towards the West. That reason is this: that having been accustomed, for the last five years, to see and hear the South represented as the enemy of the West, and the Northeast as its friend, and in the very words used by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] on this floor, and having always maintained the contrary in the West, I could not, without suffering myself to be gagged hereafter with an unanswerable question, sit still and hear the same things repeated on this floor, without entering my solemn dissent, supported by authentic references to its truth; especially when I labor under the thorough conviction that the object of these statements, both in the West and in this chamber, is to produce a state of things hostile to the well being of this confederacy. Secondly, That in repeated reference, in the course of my speech, to the federal party in the United States, I mean no proscription of that party in mass. I have a test to apply to each of them, and according to the proof of that test does the individual appear fair or otherwise before me. The test is this: Is he faithful to his country in the hours of her trial? As this question can be answered, so does he stand before me a fair candidate or otherwise for a ratable proportion of the offices, subordinate to the highest, which this country affords. This declaration, I trust, sir, will not be received as arrogant, but taken in its true spirit, as a qualification due to myself of things said in debate, and which might be misunderstood. I am a Senator; have a voice upon nominations to office; and the country has a right to be informed of my principles of action.

Mr. BURNET said that he did not rise for the purpose of engaging in the debate; but merely to explain a law of the State of Ohio, which had been referred to by the Senator from Missouri; and to state, for the information of the Senate, the circumstances which induced the Legislature to pass it. One of the motives, and, perhaps, the principal motive, which actuated them, was a desire to prevent runaway slaves from seeking shelter within the State, and evading the pursuit of their masters. On that subject, frequent and loud complaints had been made by the citizens of neighboring States, and particularly by those of Kentucky; and, if his memory was not incorrect, there was a correspondence between the Governors of the two States on the same subject. The Legislature of Ohio, desirous of removing the cause of these complaints, and of checking the evil complained of, passed the law which has been referred to in the debate, by which all persons of color, on coming into the State, were required to bring with them authentic record evidence of their freedom, and to exhibit it to the clerk of the county court, whose duty it was to record it, and give a certificate of the fact. The law also imposed a severe penalty on every citizen who should harbor or employ persons of color, who have not complied with its requirements. Thus far [said Mr. B.] it will be admitted that the law was well calculated to guard the rights of property in the neighboring States. But, sir, the Legislature had another object in view, of great importance to themselves and their constituents. They found it necessary to take steps to guard the State, as far as possible, against the evils of pauperism; and, for that purpose, they introduced a provision that no black or mulatto should be permitted to reside in the State without giving bond and security, in the sum of five hundred dollars, to indemnify the township against any expense that might be incurred in consequence of their own inability to support themselves. These [said Mr. B.] were the provisions of the law in question; and he submitted it to the Senate whether they were not both justifiable and commendable. The people of Ohio had excluded slavery, with its advantages, if it had any, and it was natural for them to desire, as far as was practicable, to escape its evils. Knowing the general character of free people of color, they were desirous of having as few of them as possible, and of having some indemnity against the charge and expense of supporting such as might settle in the State. Mr. B. further stated, that the law, which he understood the gentleman from Missouri as complaining of, had been in force more than twenty years; and that the movement at Cincinnati, to which he had referred, was nothing more than the giving of a notice, under that law, to those persons on whom it operated, and who had not complied with its directions, that they must do so, within a stated time, or leave the State.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1830.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. FOOT.

Mr. SPRAGUE rose, and concluded the speech which he commenced yesterday. His remarks were as follows:

Mr. S. said it was with reluctance that he entered into this extraordinary debate. The gentleman who had just resumed his seat [Mr. BENTON] had most gratuitously given to it an unpleasant sectional character. Some portion of his remarks related merely to measures of a party in opposition to the administrations of Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison. Had he confined himself to those acts, I should not have felt myself constrained to participate in the discussion; because I was, from the first, politically opposed to them, and have never changed my sentiments. I mention this, that the position which I occupy may be distinctly understood. Animadversions upon party measures affect no particular geographical division of the country, but only the individuals who sustained them, wherever they may reside. But the gentleman has assailed all the Northern States, and particularly those of New England; accusing them of narrow views, and systematic hostility and injustice towards the West; while, on the other hand, he has lauded the South, as her generous, liberal, and magnanimous friend. Such assertions, in order to gain any credence, must be supported by proof. Of this, the gentleman seems to have been aware, and has, accordingly, attempted to sustain them by a recurrence to historical facts. I shall endeavor, concisely, to remark upon such as appear to be of importance enough to deserve attention, and which have been stated with sufficient distinctness to render them susceptible of being followed.

He has gone back to the days of the Old Confederation, and the records of the Continental Congress; and dwelt upon certain proceedings, in 1786, relative to the defence of what was then the western district of Virginia, now the State of Kentucky. A proposition was made to send two companies of Federal troops to the rapids of the Ohio. It is to be recollected that we had just then emerged from the war of the Revolution, that tremendous struggle, in which we had strained every nerve to agony, and had sunk down to a state of exhaustion; destitute of money, without revenue, and without credit. To send two companies to the then distant wilderness on the Ohio, was a severer burthen on the public finances than to send thousands now to the mouth of the Columbia. Upon this proposition, the votes of New England were equally divided. During its pendency, on the twenty-first of June, a motion was made by Mr. Lee, a delegate from Virginia, to add two companies more, making four in all, for her defence; which was supported by that State alone; all the delegates from the other States, excepting one from Georgia, answering in the negative.

It was upon his stating this vote, that the gentleman exclaimed, in tones of delight and exultation: Magnanimous Virginia, ay!

She is a great and magnanimous State. I would not retract aught from her merits. New England seeks not to prostrate the fabric of others' fame, in order to erect her own from its fragments; she is rich enough in her own splendid materials. But the gentleman has not been fortunate in selecting this vote, given for her own exclusive benefit against all the other States, as an illustration of her disinterestedness and liberality. To attribute in this instance so great merit to her, is an implication of demerit in all the others, which I leave to be repelled by their older and abler representatives around me.

On the 29th of June, eight days only after the almost unanimous refusal of Congress to send more than the two companies to the defence of Virginia, a committee, consisting of two members from that State, and one from Massachusetts, made a report in favor of authorizing the commander of those two companies to march into the Indian country and make war, or treat for peace, as he should see fit; and, also, to call, at his pleasure, upon the Governor of Virginia, for one thousand militia. This report being under debate, a motion was made to postpone it for the present, in order to take up another proposition, which, after reciting that there was not sufficient evidence of Indian depredations "to justify carrying war into their country," recommended the adoption, "without delay," of "such measures as shall effectually secure peace to the Indians, and safety to the citizens inhabiting the frontiers of the United States." This motion the Senator from Missouri pronounced "cold blooded, cruel, and inhuman; equalled only by the National Assembly of the French Revolution, which, when their fellow-citizens were falling around them by the daggers of assassins, passed to the orders of the day." It was made by Mr. Pettit, of Pennsylvania, and there were more votes for it out of New England than from within it.

But if the gentleman's sensibilities were so much outraged by the idea of passing over that report in favor of war and bloodshed, even for a moment, in order to take up a substitute of peace and security, what will he say, how will he bear the shock, when he finds that a motion was made, not by a delegate from New England, nor even from the north of the Potomac, but from the South, from Georgia, to postpone the whole for six days; and that there were no less than fifteen voices in the affirmative, and two-thirds of them from without the limits of New England! Nay, more, that this very report, which it was so monstrous and horrible to hesitate even for a moment in adopting, was, upon the final question, absolutely rejected, and that, too, not by a bare majority of the Congress, but by a vote of two to one—six States to three; and of the six, two only being from the Northeast! And of the individual delegates, seventeen voted in the affirmative, and nine only in the negative; Mr. Houston, of Georgia, being excused at his own request!

I have been accustomed, sir, from my earliest recollections, to cherish the memory of those who composed the Continental Congress with reverence and gratitude. I have supposed that the very existence of this great, prosperous, and happy republic, demonstrated the elevation of their intellectual and moral character, their wisdom, purity, and beneficence; that their monuments were every where but over their graves. Is all this illusion? Is their epitaph still to be written? And shall we now inscribe upon their tomb, Here lie the members of the Continental Congress of 1786—those cold blooded, cruel, inhuman monsters, who are to be paralleled in all history only by the fiends of the French Revolution, who washed their hands in the blood of their brethren?

There are some exaggerations too extravagant even for the figures of rhetoric or the fictions of poetry. My own section of country might be well content to appear sombre and unlovely to that vision which can present the revered patriots of the Revolution in colors so dark, and with features so distorted.

The next topic of crimination against our forefathers was a clause originally inserted in the ordinance for ascertaining the mode of disposing of lands in the western country, when it was reported by a committee, in 1785, and which prohibited the sale, by the public officer, of a second township, by sections, until after all the first should have been disposed of. It arose from an evident solicitude for the security of the frontier settlers, and a desire to keep them in some measure compact, that they might be competent to their own protection, instead of scattering over immense forests, beyond the reach of timely succor. This is well known to have been the policy of Washington. It is not a little singular that the gentleman should have made this a theme of reiterated and vehement condemnation, when he had just before complained so loudly of an alleged indifference to the safety of the new settlements. He insists that a majority of the committee lived north of the Potomac, and that their object was to stint the growth of the West. He did not tell us who composed it. [Mr. BENTON explained by reading the names of a committee consisting of one from each State, A. D. 1785.] Mr. S proceeded. The committee, which the gentleman had just named was not that which originally reported the ordinance, but one to whom it was subsequently referred, and who do not appear to have made any amendments or alterations. It was, I believe, first reported in May, 1784, by a committee consisting of Mr. Jefferson, of Virginia, Williamson, of North Carolina, Reed, of South Carolina, Howell, of Rhode Island, and Gerry, of Massachusetts; and its paternity is thus transferred to the south side of the Potomac. It was not finally acted upon during that session; and at the commencement of the next session, in November, 1785, all the unfinished business of the preceding was taken up, and this appears to have been subsequently referred to the large committee which the gentleman has mentioned. But the justice and charity with which sinister motives are attributed to the North, is further illustrated by the fact, that upon the motion of Mr. McHenry to strike out this obnoxious clause, every member, with the single exception of Mr. Howell, of Rhode Island, answered in the affirmative; and yet it is insisted that the North, who had the whole perfectly in their power, were wickedly intent upon it as a means to cramp the growth of the West, and were defeated only by those of a more magnanimous region.

By the same ordinance, one-third part of all the mines of gold, silver, copper, and lead, were in all sales to be reserved to the Government. Upon a motion to strike out this reservation, and thus leave the whole to the purchasers, Massachusetts was divided, Rhode Island divided, and all the other States and all the other delegates, excepting Mr. Monroe, answered in the negative. This instance of comparative liberality seems to have wholly escaped the gentleman's observation.

Strange as it may seem, it has, in this debate, been made matter of loud and bitter complaint, that the United States had sold the public lands for money; have coined the soil into gold and silver, as it was expressed. The right and the obligation of the Government to do this have been so unanswerably established by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] that I shall not discuss it. It would be useless, indeed, for me to follow where is seen the giant's track. I shall endeavor, throughout, to avoid the ground which he has occupied. I will only now add, that however illiberal some persons may now consider the selling, instead of giving away this common property of the nation, it is not a mere Yankee notion, nor even confined to the wrong side of Mason's and Dixon's line; but has, from the first, been insisted upon by the statesmen of the more congenial South. In February, 1786, a committee of Congress, consisting of Messrs. Pinckney, of South Carolina, McKean, of South Carolina, Monroe, of Virginia, King, of Massachusetts, and Pettit, of Pennsylvania, held the following language: We "contemplate with great satisfaction the prospect of extinguishing a part of the domestic debt, by the sales of the western lands, but a considerable time must elapse," &c. And in the Virginia convention, in 1788, Mr. Harrison said, "the back lands and imposts will be sufficient for all the exigencies of Government." Mr. Grayson spoke of the "domestic debt being diminished by the sale of western lands;" and Mr. Madison, speaking of the Mississippi, said, "a material consideration was, that the cession of that river would diminish the value of the western country, which was a common fund for the United States, and would consequently tend to impoverish their public treasury. These, sir, were rational grounds." And in 1786, the Virginia delegation to Congress, with reference to the same subject, say, "the States who have ceded it, and the confederacy at large, look up to the western lands as a substantial fund for the discharge of the public debt."

The navigation of the Mississippi occupied a large space in the gentleman's contrast of sectional liberality and illiberality. It is, indeed, a subject of importance, and vastly more worthy of attention than most of those upon which he has expatiated.

The specification of charge is, that, in the year 1786, Mr. Jay, then Secretary for Foreign Affairs, proposed the making of a treaty with Gardoqui, the Spanish minister, by which the navigation of that river should be relinquished to Spain, for twenty-five or thirty years, in consideration of certain commercial stipulations, for mutual interchange of commodities, by which all the productions of this country, with the exception of tobacco, were to be received into the Spanish dominions. This proposition was supported by the States of the North; and the gentleman charitably supposes, from a desire to deprive their fellow-citizens of the West of that great highway so essential to their prosperity.

It is to be recollected that Spain, being then in possession of Louisiana and the Floridas, most positively and peremptorily denied that we had any right to participate in the use of that river. Prostrated as our strength and finances then were, the country was not in a condition to enforce our claim by arms. Thus situated, it was apparent that we could have no immediate enjoyment of the waters of the Mississippi, and it was believed that the best mode for securing the future permanent possession of them was to lease it, for a while, to the Spanish Government, for a valuable consideration; and that, by assenting to such an arrangement, and holding it by our permission, Spain would unequivocally acknowledge our right, which would revert to us, accompanied by the possession, at the expiration of the stipulated term. And it was thought, moreover, that it would be dishonorable to the country to suffer a foreign nation to withhold it from us in a hostile attitude. It was also apprehended that Great Britain would unite with Spain in resisting our claim, and excluding us forever from the enjoyment of our right.

These facts rest upon no doubtful authority; they are supported by the disinterested testimony of high minded and honorable men, actors in the scenes which they describe, and who, in 1788, were willing to do that justice to their associates which is now attempted to be withdrawn.

General Lee, in the Virginia convention, made the following statement:

"I feel myself called on, by the honorable gentleman, to come forward and tell the truth about the transaction respecting the Mississippi." "There are men of integrity and truth here, who were also then in Congress. I call on them to put me right with respect to those transactions. As far as I could gather from what was then passing, I believe there was not a gentleman in that Congress who had an idea of surrendering the navigation of that river. They thought of the best mode of securing it. Some thought one way, and some another. I was one of those who thought the mode which has been alluded to the best to secure it. I shall never deny that it was my opinion. I was one peculiarly interested. I had a fortune in that country, purchased, not by paper money, but by gold, to the amount of eight thousand pounds. But private interest could not have influenced me. The public welfare was my criterion. In my opinion, I united private interest to public interest, not of the whole people of Virginia, but of the United States. I thought I was promoting the real interests of the people."

Mr. Madison said:

"There were seven States who thought it right to give up the navigation of the Mississippi for twenty-five years, for several reasons, which have been mentioned. As far as I can recollect, it was nearly as my honorable friend said; but they had no idea of absolutely alienating it. I think one material consideration which governed them was, that there were grounds of serious negotiation between Great Britain and Spain, which might bring on a coalition between those nations, which might enable them to bind us on different sides, permanently withhold that navigation from us, and injure us, in other respects, materially. The temporary cession, it was supposed, would fix the permanent right in our favor, and prevent that dangerous coalition."

For these transactions, as affecting the interests of the region beyond the Alleghanies, the gentleman has cast unmeasured opprobrium upon the North, and bestowed a corresponding eulogium upon the South, particularly Virginia; with what justice or candor may be seen, not only from what has just been stated, but from the facts which I shall hereafter adduce, and to which he has made no allusion.

That a majority of the delegates from Virginia were opposed to the contemplated treaty, is unquestionably true; but is there not reason to believe that this was occasioned, in some degree, at least, by the circumstance that her great staple, tobacco, was not provided for; especially when we find that one of her most eminent citizens [Mr. Monroe] disapproved of it merely for its commercial regulations.

But the delegation from that State, in the same year, 1786, themselves proposed to enter into permanent stipulations with Spain, by which we should relinquish, forever, all right of transporting any articles up the Mississippi, from its mouth; and New Orleans should be made an entrepot, at which our produce, carried down the river, should be landed, and pay duties to the Spanish Crown; and a consul of the United States there should be responsible for every violation of these engagements. Now, sir, compare these renunciations and sacrifices, to endure through all time, with the mere temporary relinquishment for twenty-five or thirty years, and let the candid and intelligent declare which would have been most wise, and have best secured the true and permanent interests and safety of the Western country.

But the comparison ends not here. There was a time when the Southern States, and Virginia with the rest, were disposed to make an absolute and perfect surrender of all right to the waters of the Mississippi, but the Northern and Eastern States opposed it. It was at the period of their greatest distress, and for the purpose of obtaining succor from Spain. For this we have the high authority of Mr. Madison himself, who says,

"It was soon perceived, after the commencement of the war with Great Britain, that, among the various objects that would affect the happiness of the people of America, the navigation of the Mississippi was one. Throughout the whole history of foreign negotiation, great stress was laid on its preservation. In the time of our greatest distresses, particularly when the Southern States were the scene of war, the Southern States cast their eyes around to be relieved from their misfortunes. It was supposed that assistance might be obtained for the relinquishment of that navigation. It was thought that, for so substantial a consideration, Spain might be induced to afford decisive succor. It was opposed by the Northern and Eastern States. They were sensible that it might be dangerous to surrender this important right, particularly to the inhabitants of the Western country. But so it was, that the Southern States were for it, and the Eastern States opposed to it."

And Mr. Monroe, after speaking of the constant efforts of Virginia to preserve this navigation, says,

"There was a time, it is true, when even this State, in some measure, abandoned the object, by authorizing this cession to the court of Spain."

It is not my purpose to censure those who advocated that surrender. They felt themselves constrained by the necessities of the war. But the Northern States, more unyielding in their purpose, never despaired of the republic; they sent their own sons to fight the battles of their distant brethren, and freely furnished, from within themselves, that succor which others were willing to purchase from foreign hands, at so great a price; and now they are, even here, rewarded with contumely and reproach!

Such is the effect of partial or distorted views of distant events; of resting upon insulated parts of remote transactions; of seizing and following the mere shreds of history, which lead to error and injustice, instead of light and truth.

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

By the terms of the treaty proposed by Mr. Jay, and which have been so much reprobated, Spain was to receive all the productions of the United States, with the exception of a single article; and yet the gentleman has, somehow, fallen into the error of asserting that the privilege was confined to fish and oil, which he several times repeated, adding, in a particular tone, "id est, from New England." Sir, whatever the manner in which that gentleman may choose to allude to the fruits of their labor, it is not in his power to depreciate the merits or importance of our hardy fishermen—of that class of men who, with John Manly, in 1773, first unfurled the American banner upon the ocean, and first caused the proud cross of St. George to bow to it in submission.

Yet even the fisheries, the right which Heaven gave, wherever the winds would waft, or the waves would bear us, which were deemed so highly of that Mr. Grayson denominated them the cornfields of the East; even these were so far abandoned, that the Congress refused to make their preservation a sine qua non of a treaty, but authorized peace to be concluded without any stipulations for their security. Thanks to the wisdom and firmness of the commissioners who saved us from that calamity.

In January, 1803, President Jefferson nominated Robert R. Livingston and James Monroe co-ministers to the French republic, for the purpose of obtaining, from the First Consul, an extension of our rights on the Mississippi. Upon the question of confirmation, by the Senate, of the nomination of Mr. Monroe, there were fifteen affirmatives, and twelve negatives. And this opposition is made food for accusation against the States of the Northeast, as evincing hostility to the objects of the mission and the interests to be affected by it. Yet, sir, without the affirmative votes which were given from those States, Mr. Monroe's nomination could not have been confirmed: for, if you subtract the three votes which their Senators gave in favor, and place them in opposition to the confirmation, there would have been but twelve for, and fifteen against it. But, on the same page of the Journal, and in the sentence next preceding the statement of the question of Mr. Monroe's appointment, we find that the nomination of Mr. Livingston was confirmed without a division. The mission and its purposes were thus unanimously approved. The votes against Mr. Monroe must have arisen from the conviction that the expense of a second minister was unnecessary; and when we consider the ability of Chancellor Livingston, and the subsequent history of the negotiation, that opinion may not appear to have been wholly unfounded. On the same page, too, we find that Mr. Monroe was immediately, without a division, confirmed as minister to Spain, in conjunction with Mr. Pinckney, the object of that mission being also, avowedly, to secure and extend our rights to the Mississippi. It is strange, indeed, that these facts should have escaped the gentleman's scrutiny.

When the Louisiana treaty was presented to the Senate, in October, 1803, there were twenty-seven votes in favor of its ratification, and seven only against it; and this, too, is made a topic of crimination against those on our side of the Potomac. Yet, of those yeas, one half were by Senators north of that river, and four of them from New England; and, as it required two-thirds to ratify, these four had it in their power to have rejected the treaty. Is this evidence of Northern hostility to the West? Mr. Jefferson, in 1805, attributed the little opposition which did exist, to higher and purer motives—to a "candid apprehension that the enlargement of our territory would endanger the Union." And we shall presently see that there may have been other reasons also in accordance with his own opinions.

The gentleman inveighed vehemently against the North, for its alleged opposition to the admission of Louisiana into the Union, the evidence of which was, that, when the bill for that purpose was before the Senate, an amendment was proposed by Mr. Dana, providing that it should not take effect until the consent of each State should have been obtained. Yet this proposition was defeated by Northern Senators: if they had voted in the affirmative, it would have prevailed by a vote of eighteen to ten. The whole amendment of Mr. Dana consisted of two alternative propositions, providing that the act should not take effect until the consent of each State should have been obtained, or the constitution have been so amended as to authorize Congress to pass the act. A division of the question being required, a distinct vote was taken on the first proposition; which alone seems to have been selected for special animadversion. I marvel much that the gentleman's vision should have been confined to one half of the amendment, especially when he was in search of motives, and they would have been clearly disclosed by a glance at the other half. Doubts were entertained of the constitutional power of Congress to admit Louisiana. And were not those doubts entitled to respect? Is it not known that Mr. Jefferson himself, to whose opinions the gentleman bows with such profound reverence, repeatedly declared, in his letters to Mr. Dunbar and others, that Congress had no such power? and, if I mistake not, Mr. Madison, in March, 1803, then Secretary of State, framed his instructions to Messrs. Livingston and Monroe upon the basis of this constitutional disability. He was so particular as to give a formula of some of the articles to be inserted in the proposed treaty for the acquisition of Louisiana, one of which is prescribed in these words:

"To incorporate the inhabitants of the newly ceded territory with the citizens of the United States, on an equal footing, being a provision which cannot now be made, it is to be expected, from the character and policy of the United States, that such incorporation will take place without unnecessary delay. In the mean time they shall be secure in their persons and property, and in the free enjoyment of their religion."

Here, sir, our negotiators were unequivocally warned not only to make no agreement for the admission of the inhabitants of the ceded territory into the Union, but to declare that such a stipulation could not then be made. By what was it prohibited except the limits of the constitution? And what was the necessary delay, but to obtain the requisite authority by amendment? On the 12th of August, 1803, after the formation of the treaty, and before its ratification, Mr. Jefferson holds the following strong and explicit language, in a letter to Mr. Breckenridge:

"This treaty must, of course, be laid before both Houses, because both have important functions to exercise respecting it. They, I presume, will see their duty to their country in ratifying and paying for it, so as to secure a good which would otherwise probably be never again in their power! But I suppose they must then appeal to the nation for an additional article to the constitution approving and confirming an act which the nation had not previously authorized. The constitution has made no provision for our holding foreign territory, still less for incorporating foreign nations into our Union. The Executive, in seizing the fugitive occurrence which so much advances the good of the country, have done an act against the constitution."

It is not my intention to enter into the argument, or even to express an opinion upon the subject, but merely to show that it is not strange, that seven Senators, or even a Committee of the Legislature of Massachusetts, should have doubted the existence of a constitutional power which President Jefferson so peremptorily denied.

The Missouri question has been invoked upon this occasion. It is not a correct representation, to say that the North were opposed to the admission of that State; they proffered her their cordial embrace. But they wished to exclude involuntary servitude from her limits; and, believing it, as they did, most sincerely and conscientiously, to be a great moral and political evil, they were actuated by no feelings of unkindness, but the purest motives of justice and benevolence, in endeavoring to secure what to them seemed a great blessing to her citizens. That it was a disinterested effort, is attested by the Senator from South Carolina, who declares it to be for their interest that slavery should exist at the South.

As to the admission of Mississippi, the preparatory act, authorizing the formation of her constitution, passed without a division, through the various stages, in the Senate, until it came to the question of engrossment, to which there were eleven negatives. Those gentlemen might have thought the application premature. But I shall not stop to inquire into their motives, because I perceive among them the name of the venerable Macon, of North Carolina, who so recently occupied a seat here, and to whose successor, now near me, it belongs, to vindicate him from any aspersion upon his intention; and also, the name of an honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [MR. SMITH] now in his seat, for whose conduct it would be presumptuous in me to assign reasons, he being so eminently able to answer for himself.

The resolution for the final admission of that State was reported by a Committee on the 3d of December, 1817, being the third day of the session; was, forthwith, by unanimous consent, read a first, second, and third time, and actually passed on the same day, although any one member might have required its postponement. This shows how far there was a disposition to retard her progress into full communion with the American family.

I do not intend to exhaust the patience of the Senate, by following the gentleman through all the little, trifling incidents to which he has resorted, to sustain his general position. Their importance and pertinency may be illustrated by his thrice told story of an illumination at the surrender of Detroit, which flashed upon the world for the first time, in the gentleman's speech. I have not been able to find any one who ever heard of it before. [Here Mr. BENTON spoke to Mr. S. in an under tone.]—He now tells me it was in a small village in New Hampshire. I doubt the fact; but even if some individual there had the folly to put an extra candle in his window, is it to be gravely attributed to a general animosity of the people towards their fellow-citizens, who were thousands of miles distant?

Another matter, of almost equal gravity, was, that General Hull, a few years ago, was actually invited to dine with some of his friends; and the convivialities of the festive board are, by the gentleman's imagination, converted into the acrid humors of inveterate hostility. This occurrence took place long since the termination of the last war. General Hull had just then presented to the public some new explanatory statements in an appeal, well adapted to excite commiseration. Some persons, who had known that veteran officer of the Revolution in other and better days, listening only to his own story, were convinced that he had been wronged. Their sympathy was excited, and they extended the hand of charity and friendship to sooth the feelings of his estimable family, as well as to alleviate his own sufferings, and smooth his path to the grave. And this act of personal friendship and benevolence is adduced as proof that not only those individuals, but the inhabitants of New England generally, are actuated by unhallowed passions of enmity towards others. After Aaron Burr's conspiracy, and subsequent to his arrest as a criminal, he was invited to a dinner at Richmond, and sat down at the same table with the Chief Justice, before whom he was soon to be arraigned upon a charge of high treason. Did any one ever imagine that this was to be charged as a State offence, for which the people of Virginia were responsible? Nay, may not circumstances have existed, which would exempt even the individuals from imputation! Sure I am that not the slightest shade rests upon the fame of (that wonderful man, to whose intellect the most powerful minds, and to whose goodness the purest hearts, do willing homage.

It has been broadly and strongly asserted, that "the North have, from the beginning, done all in their power to cripple and strangle the West;" and all historical facts, no matter how various or opposite their character, which pass through the alembic of the gentleman's speech, are made to yield the bitter spirit of Northern hostility. If the act be in any degree doubtful in its appearance, it is of course viewed in its most offensive aspect; and if it be one of unmixed wisdom and beneficence, still its brightness is to be overshadowed by the ascription of impure and sombre motives. When the stream fertilizes and gladdens every thing in its course, still it may be insisted that the invisible fountain is corrupted and poisonous.

At one time, to decline a reduction of the price of the public lands, or even to require any price whatever, is crying and unheard of injustice—the poverty of the people is portrayed to us in glowing colors, and we are told that we are grinding them into the dust by our exactions. But when we do reduce the price, or even relinquish existing debts, we are answered by the gentleman that no thanks are due to us; so far from a favor, it is an offence, because it carries with it an implication of poverty and inability to pay, which should be repelled as an insult. Even the system of Internal Improvements has, in his view, ceased to be beneficial to the West—nay, positively injurious. All its fruits have been blasted by the friendly salutations of the Northern breeze. He tells us that, if a road or canal be of any utility to a State, its benefits are to be measured only by the distance which it passes within her limits; and thus the one million seven hundred and twenty-one thousand eight hundred and forty-five dollars expended upon the Cumberland road, this side of Ohio, although projected as a Western measure, urged as a Western measure, and adopted and sustained as a Western measure, is, in fact, only for the benefit of the East. But, unfortunately for his argument, that East lies wholly on the south side of Mason's and Dixon's line. By this criterion, no matter what great avenues and markets are open to our citizens, they are of no value to them, if beyond the limits of their own particular State. By this means, too, he charges all the works for public defence and improvement of harbors to the particular section in which they are located. He might have extended the principle, and considered a fortification to be for those merely who inhabit the little island upon which it is placed; or a light house, for the sole accommodation of its keeper, the only tenant of the rock where it stands.

Sir, every man who produces or consumes any thing that is transported along our coast, or imported from, or exported to, any foreign country, is interested in these facilities to our commerce and navigation. If we owned not a ship in the United States, but depended solely upon foreigners for the vehicles of our commerce, still we must afford these accommodations, or pay more than their expense in the enhanced price of transportation, and rate of freight and insurance. Suppose we had adopted the gentleman's new criterion of the benefit of avenues of inter-communication, when we were securing the navigation of the Mississippi, that great highway of nature, and had said that the productions of each State may float upon its majestic current, to its own borders, but no farther, and that even this privilege is to be extended to those only whose territory is actually washed by its waters. Would this have satisfied the demands of the inhabitants and secured to them the benefits which they now enjoy?

The gentleman undertook a comparison of the appropriations for the improvement of certain sections of country, but entirely overlooked the immense donations of public lands to his own favorite region, which, at the minimum price, have amounted to no less than nine millions seven hundred and fifty-nine thousand five hundred and four dollars, as appears by a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury—an amount far greater than the aggregate of all the sums embraced by his enumeration.

"The North," says the gentleman, have, "from the beginning, done all in their power to cripple and strangle the West." Sir, before such an assertion was hazarded, all our history should have been dispassionately examined. It should have been recollected that, of the old thirteen States, nine were north of the Potomac; that in their hands was the whole Western country, to be moulded at pleasure; that they could have sealed up the magnificent Mississippi, and devoted the immense regions upon its borders to beasts and savages; or, if populated, they could forever have refused to receive them into the American family, or extended to them the rights and privileges of American citizens. Even the five New England States, constituting, as they did, more than one-third of the whole number, might forever have excluded Louisiana and Florida, and have rejected every treaty for enlarging or confirming the privileges of the West. The power of the North was ample, complete, and irresistible, over the whole region beyond the Alleghanies; and instead of being employed to wither and destroy, it has been assiduously exerted to cherish, sustain, and strengthen. Its inhabitants were regarded as children—bone of our bon, flesh of our flesh; their infant steps were sustained, and their path defended, by the strong arm of the nation. We rejoiced in their prosperity; the blessed fruit of our own benignant care. We received them cordially to the full communion of all the inestimable blessings of free government and republican institutions, which had been purchased by the blood of our fathers. We parted to them our inheritance; we gave them of our strength; we resigned to them our power. From being more than two-thirds of the whole number, we have voluntarily, by our own generous acts, made ourselves a minority of the States. And now we are told, here, in the Senate chamber of the United States, that "the North have, from the beginning, done all in their power to cripple and strangle the West!"

Sir, I deeply deplore the cause, be it what it may, which can at any time, or in any place, give birth to declarations of such a character, tending to alienate the affections, and poison the mutual confidence, of different portions of our country. Heaven itself has made them for union and happiness; and man and woman might as well quarrel with each other for the difference of their formation, as the great geographical divisions of our republic for the features and adaptations which their Creator has given them.

Mr. S. said he would now turn his attention to some of the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAYNE.] That gentleman, after expressing his regret that the controversy should become sectional, and lamenting the supposed necessity of assuming an unfriendly attitude, proceeded to present the Southern States and New England in hostile array against each other. He [Mr. S.] believed that the responsibility of giving the debate that character must rest principally upon the gentleman himself; for there had been nothing in any previous speech which called for the attack which he had made upon the Northeastern States. I [said Mr. S.] will not follow his example; but, as far as possible, consistently with my duty, avoid every unpleasant allusion. From my earliest recollections, I have been deeply impressed with the sentiments inculcated by the Farewell Address of the Father of his Country, in which we are taught "to frown indignantly upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate one portion of our country from the rest," and to lament that geographical discriminations of Northern and Southern, Atlantic and Western, should ever occasion the belief that there could be any distinction of views or interest. But if these distinctions are insisted on by the citizens of one portion of our country—if the line of the Potomac is to be constantly drawn by those who live south of it, must they not expect that those who live north will sometimes remind them that there are two sides to that line? Or, if they point to a still narrower circle, and, making the six Northeastern States their line of demarcation, constantly allude to them in ungracious tones, must not New England of necessity assume a corresponding attitude, and poise herself upon her own energies? Sir, we do firmly believe that we have exercised towards our distant brethren that "charity" which "suffereth long and is kind;" which "envieth not;" which "vaunteth not itself;" "doth not behave itself unseemly;" "is not easily provoked;" "thinketh no evil;" "rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth."

The gentleman's attack upon New England has rested almost exclusively upon the transactions of the late war. If his only object had been to condemn certain measures of the leaders of a party there in opposition to the war, I should not deem it necessary to make a single remark in reply. I resisted them to the utmost of my ability at the time of their greatest strength, and my opinions are still unchanged. But I can assent to no indiscriminate censure. If it was intended to fix any stigma upon the general character of the people of New England, I, although the humblest of their representatives here, feel bound to repel it. We have the explicit declaration of Mr. Monroe himself, then Secretary of War, and since deliberately made, that the confidence of the Government in the people of Massachusetts was never shaken for a moment.

[Here Mr. HAYNE explained, by saying that he never intended to cast any reproach upon the people of New England. That his remarks were confined to a particular party, which he had designated and described.]

Mr. S. resumed. Although such were the ideas conveyed by one portion of the gentleman's speech, yet, taken in connexion with his declaration of war, at its commencement, a different result would seem to follow. He at first regretted that the contest should be sectional; and then arrayed the South against New England, as opposing sections of country; and having thus proclaimed the war by geographical lines, he of course assumed a hostile attitude towards the people of that territory which he assailed. Why should he regret the peculiar character of the contest as sectional, if it was merely one of old political parties? I am quite willing, however, to receive the explanation which the gentleman has just given, and shall omit some of the remarks which I had contemplated. If his only object, in entering the territory of New England, was to thrust at the dead, or wave his sword in triumph over their graves, I do not envy him either the glory or the magnanimity of the achievement. But there are some topics to which I shall advert, because they have been treated in a manner calculated to produce an injurious effect, whatever may have been the purpose of their introduction.

The Hartford Convention has filled no small space in this discussion; it is wielded as a powerful engine against the Northeastern States. I remember it well, and have never spoken of it but in terms of decided condemnation. It had but few friends while living, and still fewer mourners to follow it to the grave; and if its skeleton is now dug up, and held on high to the view of the whole nation, it will cast its shade upon a small part only of the fair surface of New England.

The sermons of Osgood and Parish have been produced here, and inflamed passages read, avowedly as evidence of public sentiment, and the gentleman called the writers "pious and good men." So do not I. Sir, they were infuriated fanatics, political madmen; condemned by the sober-minded of their own party; and I would as soon produce the outpourings of Bedlam as proof of public opinion, as effusions such as theirs.

FEB. 3, 1830.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

The honorable Senator told us, with great emphasis, that the enemy was permitted to establish himself, and to open a custom house upon the soil of Massachusetts; and so much reliance did he place upon this as a cause of reproach, that it was reiterated three times in the course of his speech. It is most unjust. The people of that State, without distinction of party, were at all times resolved to defend their territory, and prompt in resisting the approach of the enemy. The gentleman's allusion could not be misunderstood: it was to the capture and detention of Castine, a small village situated on a little peninsula, on the eastern side of the Penobscot river, in the remote parts of Maine, where the adjacent country contains but a sparse population. It is connected with the main land only by a narrow neck, and is surrounded on its various sides by water deep enough to float ships of the largest class, which might, within point blank shot, command every part of the village. I verily believe that a large naval force might bring more guns to bear upon that place than there were men in it at the time of its capture. So situated, and destitute of the means of efficient defence, an overwhelming British fleet captured and took possession of it. I would ask the gentleman what resistance he himself would have made? Could he have withstood the batteries of that fleet with nothing but his sword or his musket? The idea of successful resistance would have been mere fatuity. But it is said the enemy retained the place, and opened a custom house. It was not taken until about the first of September, 1814, and the treaty of peace was signed in December of the same year, of which information reached us in February following. Could it have been retaken? The British had there a large military and naval force. The neck which connects the peninsula with the main land is so low and narrow, that a canal was dug across it, and Castine was thereby converted into an island. All access to it was completely commanded by the guns of the enemy's fleet, and we had not a single ship to aid us; beside which, the whole sea-board of Maine, for more than two hundred miles, and its numerous rivers, bays, and inlets, containing millions of shipping, were constantly harassed by the enemy ranging along the coast, and requiring the presence of the militia at every point to repel his threatened depredations. And, even if the militia could have been spared for the enterprise, and it had been possible to recapture the place, the British might easily have taken possession of any of the numerous adjacent islands in the Penobscot bay, and carried on all their operations with great facility.

Are we then to be repeatedly reproached with the capture of Castine, and that too, here—in this capitol—within these walls, which have but just risen from the conflagration of the enemy, and are hardly yet purified from the pollution of hostile feet; and having at this moment at your public navy yard here, a monument bearing an inscription perpetuating the presence and the barbarism of the British? And these acts done, not under the guns of their ships, but by a few thousand men marching fifty miles by land, through a population of two hundred thousand persons; and you having here, in aid of the militia, a thousand regular troops, a public armory, and the brave little band of sailors commanded by the gallant Barney!

The gentleman from South Carolina, himself, told us, (I would not otherwise have alluded to the fact) that his own State was completely overrun during the war of the Revolution. It was so, indeed. The British considered it entirely subdued, and, for a time, held over it restless sway. I mention it not as a reproach; it was inevitable. But that gentleman should have been the last to suggest the idea that the presence of an enemy upon the soil is a necessary impeachment of the patriotism or gallantry of the people.

Maine, from its local position, was more exposed than any other State in the Union; having Lower Canada on the north, New Brunswick on the east, and from two to three hundred miles of sea coast, which the enemy commanded, on the south. She owned one-ninth part of all the tonnage of the United States, and at the commencement of the war there were not two hundred regular troops in the State. Her citizens did not wait to be solicited, but voluntarily tendered their services to their country, and three regiments were immediately organized, by which her territory was defended at all points, until, in 1813, all the troops raised for the defence of Maine, even those in the garrisons, were, by order of the Secretary of War, marched to the Niagara frontier. The British having a strong force in each of the adjacent provinces to the north and the east, and a powerful armament on the sea, were, by that withdrawal of the troops, tempted to annex the lower and unsettled parts of the country to their colony of New Brunswick; and, with this view, took possession of Castine, in September, 1814. It was immediately determined to compel the adversary to withdraw, by carrying the war into his own territory. An army of ten thousand men, commanded by a distinguished citizen of Maine, was to invade New Brunswick at the opening of the spring; and such progress was actually made, and with such zeal and alacrity did the people offer their services, that it was well ascertained that the whole number of troops would be raised within the limits of Maine and New Hampshire. The peace alone prevented the plan from being carried into execution; and I hazard nothing in saying that, had the invasion been made, with such troops and such a commander, it would have been no second edition of the campaigns of Hampton and Wilkinson.

Notwithstanding all that has been said of the late war, as derogating from the character of New England, I boldly ask, from what part of the country was it sustained with more efficient aid? The gentleman tells us that money was withheld by a combination of all the banking interest. One bank, sir, in the town of Boston, alone, advanced the Government two millions of dollars; and a single individual there a million more. The large amount loaned in the town of Salem, my friend from Massachusetts now before me, [Mr. SILSBEE] whose ample fortune was entrusted to his country, can well attest. Sir, without the hard money—not the depreciated paper of broken banks, but the gold and silver which the citizens of New England caused to be paid into the treasury from loans and the customs, your tottering credit must have fallen completely prostrate. And when clouds of despair lowered around you, and thick darkness enveloped your whole horizon, it was the gleams of glory from the ocean that dispelled the gloom and illumined your path. That sun of glory arose in the East, and was lighted up by the mariners of New England. You manned not a ship; you fired not a gun upon the lakes or upon the ocean, without the aid of the sons of New England; and in every battle upon the water, they poured out their blood in your defence. Upon land, too, their achievements were unequalled. Those who, having voluntarily tendered their services, were not permitted to defend their own homes, but marched to the frontiers of New York, constituted the regiment which well earned their expressive appellation of the bloody ninth; which stood alone against twice their force of British veterans, whilst half their own numbers had fallen upon the field! They composed, too, the twenty-first regiment, which, at the battle of Niagara, by a desperate effort, in face of a blazing battery of deadly artillery, took the eminence which it commanded, and, meeting the foe man to man, repulsed and defeated him in successive onsets, and destroyed forever the boasted invincibility of the British bayonet.

I would not have inquired what services South Carolina rendered during the war, had not the Senator from Missouri, in contrast with the East, made it a theme of praise and gratitude. When he introduced that topic, I was, indeed, somewhat curious to hear his enumeration of her exploits; and what were they? Why, sir, that she sent her able and eloquent representatives to raise their voices in Congress. I trust that I fully appreciate their services, and that no one is more cordially disposed to award them their full measure of honor and gratitude. But I believe that the enemy would rather that we should have sent thousands of our most eloquent orators, to make their most eloquent speeches upon the floor of Congress, than to have met the single crew of that frigate which compelled the haughty and boastful Dacres to strike the flag of the Guerriere, and bow in submission to Isaac Hull.

When the gentleman from South Carolina spoke in terms of commendation of the merits and exertions of the republicans of the East, I was relieved and gratified. I supposed that he was willing to embrace, with him that description, all who cherished true republican principles. But what was my astonishment when he afterwards narrowed down his description; and confined his approbation to the few who united with him in the last Presidential election. He told us, that the "democracy of New England" had always acted with the South; not only in the war of 1812, but, "in the civil contest of 1828," that it was then, as now, the ally of the South. This is, indeed, restricting our republicanism to very narrow limits; by the test of the electoral votes, to one-fiftieth, and by any other just criterion, to a small part only of the people. And thus veterans of the democratic party, those who sustained it in the darkest times, and have been ever true to their principles and to their country—who were its fearless and unwavering champions, during embargoes, non-intercourse, and war, are now denied the name of republican, because they have dared to think for themselves, as to the qualifications of a candidate for the Presidency, and bowed not down to the idol which others had set up. While, on the other hand, some of their most violent opponents, even aiders and abettors of the Hartford Convention, those ultra federalists, who opposed Mr. Adams, because their unforgiving spirits could never forget that he had once left their party, are received into full communion, and cordially embraced by those who claim to be, by their own appointment, exclusive guardians of pure, primitive, unspotted democracy.

The gentleman seems to have no other criterion of republicanism than adhesion to the South. Not the assertion of principles, but devotion to Southern men. He told us, in so many words, that "the South had made New England," and it seems that, in his view, those only are of the true faith who will bow down and worship this new creator!

A very considerable portion of the speech of the Senator from Missouri was devoted to a comparison of the liberality of the North and the South, and he yesterday reminded us that, in the last election of President, there was but one vote in all New England for the Southern and Western candidate. Since he has chosen to introduce this test of sectional disinterestedness and magnanimity, let us bestow upon it a moment's attention. The whole number of votes which have been given for President in the electoral colleges since the organization of this Government, has been two thousand and nineteen, of which nine only have been thrown, in all the States south of the Potomac, for candidates residing north of that river, viz: one in Virginia and one in North Carolina, in 1796; four in North Carolina, in 1800; and one in Illinois, and two in Louisiana, in 1824. While, during the same period, the States north of that river have given no less than seven hundred and nineteen votes for Presidential candidates living south of it. They have supported southern men three times unanimously; at another time with but a single dissenting vote; and in another instance with but six; and again by a large majority. Upon these facts I make no comment.

The subject of slavery, incidentally touched by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] has been taken up and dwelt upon with great zeal by those who followed him. It is a topic of such delicacy and difficulty, that I have always abstained from referring to it in debate; and others from the North have, very generally, practised the same forbearance.

I have deeply lamented that the sensitiveness of the slaveholding States should have been so often operated upon, out of this House, to produce unkind feelings and unjust accusations against their brethren. We have been told that it can always be made a bond of union in political warfare, and I much fear that the cry of hostile designs to their rights and property has been too often rung as a larum to rally the whole slaveholding population in one array against those who have never indulged an unfriendly thought.

The people in the North do, undoubtedly, condemn slavery in the abstract, and deeply deplore its existence in our country; but they have not the remotest intention of disturbing this domestic relation, by thrusting themselves between the master and his bondmen. They know that, as the institution actually exists, they have no right, by the constitution, to attempt to overturn it; that to do so might dissolve the Union; and that their interference, so far from relieving the slave from bondage, would probably aggravate his condition, and rivet his chains more firmly. The gentleman has spoken of the prejudices of the East. Sir, what he has thus denominated are disinterested, pure, benevolent, and elevated principles. They wish, indeed, that their friends of the South could be relieved from what they deem a great moral and political evil; but they are aware that the remedy is to be found and applied by those only among whom the evil exists, and have no disposition to touch it with inexperienced hands.

Had the gentleman been content to express, in general terms, his approbation of involuntary servitude, and his exultation at its existence, I should have made no reply. He might even have insisted, as he did, that it added to the physical strength of the country; although I cannot well understand how withdrawing one-half of the whole population from the contest can strengthen the common arm in the hour of battle; and although such was not the opinion even of Southern statesmen after the experience of the Revolution. Mr. Madison, in 1788, said, "what parts of the United States are most likely to need protection? The weak parts, which are the Southern States."

And again, sir, "it was said, and I believe with truth, that every part of America does not stand in equal need of protection. It was observed that the Northern States are most competent to their own security." But the gentleman has chosen to make this very topic the ground of a comparison degrading to the republicanism of the East. He asserted that, from the possession of slaves there had always been a greater love of liberty in the South than in the North; and rested his assertion upon the authority of Mr. Burke. What kind of love of liberty is it which Burke says is generated and fostered by the institution of slavery? He says that to slaveholders liberty is not only an enjoyment, but "a rank and privilege," and subsequently speaks of their "haughtiness of domination."

Who does not perceive that this love of liberty is but the love of rank, of power, of absolute and uncontrolled dominion, and that too over their fellow men, extorting from them the most abject submission? It is the same love of liberty which is possessed by the privileged classes; the aristocracy, in other countries; an attachment to their own immunities, to arbitrary control and domination over others, and impatient of all restraint upon themselves. Let it be remembered that this delineation is not mine, but was furnished by the Senator from South Carolina. If I had imputed such sentiments to any portion of our country, I should have felt myself obnoxious to the charge of unkindness. I trust, sir, that he has done himself and his friends injustice; and that such is not the democracy of the South. It was not that of Mr. Jefferson, as is shown not only by the proposition against involuntary servitude which he made to the old Congress, but by the general tenor of all his political writings. It is not the democracy of New England. We have heard, in this debate, of the oligarchy and aristocracy of New England; and they are so often spoken of elsewhere, as terms of general application, that I fear very erroneous opinions are prevalent as to the character and institutions of that people.

I thank the Senator from South Carolina for reminding us of the oppression which drove our forefathers from their native land: for I delight to recur to the patriarchal founders of Massachusetts, the puritans; who, for the enjoyment of civil and religious liberty, left their country, friends, civilization, plenty, and security, for exile in a wilderness, across a world of waters, exposed to every suffering, and every danger; those indomitable spirits who would yield to no usurped dominion, but resolved to live free or cease to live. When they landed upon the rock of Plymouth, it was with the bible in their hands, and its precepts in their hearts; and they laid deep the foundations of a Christian commonwealth. From the sacred volume they imbibed the true spirit of all our institutions; the native equality of the human race; formed of the same materials, fashioned by the same hand, animated by the same breath, and destined to the same grave. 'Do unto others as ye would that they should do unto you, was, to them, the impressive command by which Heaven itself placed all mankind upon the common level of moral right and mutual obligation, and declared that "man was not made the property of man."

They acted upon the principles which they professed, and constituted one society of equals and brethren. As their numbers increased, and spread over a greater area, it became impracticable for all to unite in transacting the public business at one place; and they therefore formed territorial districts, of convenient extent, by some called townships, but there denominated towns, which continued to be multiplied as population advanced. These towns were then, and are still, throughout New England, pure democracies, in which the whole people, in their original sovereign character, assemble at one place, to order their own business in their own way, each free man having an equal voice, and every man being free. In these primary assemblies they choose their own agents, prescribe their duties, call them to account, and censure or approve, as their conduct may seem to deserve. They raise money, direct its expenditure, and order and control all measures of general concernment.

Here, too, are supported our free schools—an institution unrivalled in the history of human education; by which children of all classes are brought together, upon the basis of perfect equality, and receive instruction from the same source, without distinction or partiality. The funds for the support of these schools are annually raised by vote, in the primary assemblies of the towns, where the poor man, having, perhaps, a dozen children, but wholly destitute of property, has an equal voice in determining the amount, and its appropriation, with him who has hundreds of thousands, and is childless. The sums thus ordered are directly assessed upon property. The annual amount, in my own State, is not less than one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. A system more perfectly democratic, in its immediate character and ultimate tendencies, was never devised by man. It is upon this broad foundation of universal instruction that all our political institutions rest; it sustains, too, our colleges, our academies, our hospitals, asylums, and all those benignant charities whose streams extend to the uttermost regions of the earth.

I thank the gentleman, too, for his reference to the American Revolution. He told us that the South had no ships, nor commerce, to cause them to resist Great Britain. Sir, that resistance was not for ships and commerce merely, but against the principle of taxation without representation, which extended equally to all the colonies. It was the claim of the Imperial Parliament to "bind us in all cases whatsoever;" and, if we had not resisted, they would have bound our infant giant limbs in fetters. And Massachusetts has the enviable distinction—that glory of which nothing can deprive her, to the end of time—of having been the first to make this resistance, alone and unaided, in defiance of the whole power of the British Empire. Lord North himself declared, on the floor of Parliament, that Massachusetts alone was to blame; that, but for the evil example of her violent opposition, the obnoxious tea would have been every where else quietly received, and that she should be visited with exemplary vengeance. And Col. Barre, who has been sometimes called the friend of America, declared, that her conduct, as the prime mover of all the disturbances, had been so reprehensible, that the Boston port bill, which was intended to reduce thousands to starvation, was a measure of mercy. While another member thundered forth, against Massachusetts, the anathema which was, not long since, uttered, at the other end of this capitol, against New England—"delenda est Carthago."

The true character of a people is best ascertained by their conduct at those times when, rising against oppression, and absolved from the restraints of law, they are a law unto themselves. With this view, look at the destruction of the tea, by what has been called a Boston mob. They assembled in the night, went on board the ships, hoisted the chests upon deck, and poured their contents into the sea, with the order and regularity of an ordinary business operation. No other article of property was touched; not an act of violence committed; but, when the work was done, the multitude who had assembled to witness the scene quietly and peaceably retired to their respective homes.

Since gentlemen are fond of introducing their reminiscences, they will indulge me in another exemplification of the conduct of an educated, moral, fearless, republican people. After what has been denominated the Boston massacre, an event calculated to inflame the multitude to the highest degree of excitement; when, as the historian tells us, they seemed utterly regardless of personal danger, and immovable by the bayonets of the soldiery, did they resort to tumult and outrage, to conflagration and bloodshed? No: they assembled in town meeting, and chose a committee of citizens to require of the royal Governor the removal of the troops. When they came into his presence, he was surrounded by his high officers, civil and military, and spoke in such lordly language as became the viceroy of a king. "They must go!" was the firm and laconic reply. Seeing this spirit, and lowering his tone, he attempted to compromise, by offering to send away one regiment. The chairman, the venerable Samuel Adams, fixing upon him his piercing eye, and stretching forth his tremulous hand, exclaimed, "all—or none, sir!" The mock majesty of artificial creation shrunk before the native dignity of true republicanism. The mandate was obeyed; the troops were removed.

Such were the people who constituted the militia that fought the battles of Lexington, of Bunker's Hill, and of Bennington. "This night (said a Grecian commander to his soldiers) we shall sup with Pluto." A speech which has been thought worthy to be handed down to us through many centuries. How immeasurably more elevated and touching was the simple address of the gallant Stark to the husbands and fathers, his neighbors and friends, whom he commanded at Bennington: "There are the enemy; we conquer them; or this night Mary Stark is a widow!"

I shall not attempt to enumerate the worthies or the achievements of New England. Time, indeed, would fail me to delineate her character, or speak of her services. They stand out in brilliant colors upon every page of your history. She may be followed through every section of our country, by the blood and exploits of her sons; to your own native South Carolina, where Green and Sullivan fought, and "Scammel fell;" to the West, where their bones rest on the battle grounds of St. Clair's defeat, and of Harrison's victory. Every valley is vocal with the voice of her children; her blood swells every vein of this great republic; her fame is reflected from the whole bright surface of this wide spread and mighty nation. I glory in such a blessed parentage, and in the brotherhood of her hardy, educated, enlightened, virtuous, generous, brave, republican population.

With deep felt gratitude, I reverently thank God that, of all places upon his earth, he gave me my birth in the land, and among the descendants, of the Puritan Pilgrims of New England.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1830.

INDIAN AGENCIES.

The bill authorizing the President of the United States to divide Indian agencies in certain cases was read the second time; when

Mr. WHITE, the Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, said, that the bill originated from a resolution submitted by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BARRON] and was framed by the Committee after an examination into the subject, together with such information as the Committee had before them. The bill contained nothing which would compel the President to divide any of the Indian agencies; it merely provided that he might do it, when the public good, and the convenience and comfort of the agents themselves, might, in his opinion, require it; there being no additional expense created by the provisions of the bill, as the compensation now given to one agent was to be divided when the agency was divided. It appeared to the Committee that many of the Indian tribes were divided into different bands, residing at remote points from each other, and the consequence was, that the agents for such tribes, selecting their own places of residence, either located themselves in one of the frontier towns, or resided with one of the separate bands, and thus the business of the Government could not be as well transacted as if the agent had all the Indians under his care, placed immediately within his own view. If the agent selected the town of one of the bands belonging to the tribe placed under his superintendence, for his place of residence, instead of the other, jealousies and heart burnings were engendered; and the band that believed itself to be neglected were too apt to accuse him of partiality and injustice. In some instances, agents had two distinct tribes placed under their superintendence, and thus a greater inconvenience was created than where one tribe was divided into two bands. Under every view which the Committee had been able to take of the subject, they were of opinion that the adoption of the measure proposed in the bill would be productive of much good, without the possibility of any disadvantage resulting from it.

Mr. BARTON said that, from the information he had received from those who had been employed among the Indians, and who had, therefore, an ample opportunity of judging of the policy of the proposed measure, he was inclined to the opinion that it was a bad one. He thought it impolitic to create further division of the Indian tribes by extending statutory discretion to the Executive of the United States. One of the greatest evils which now afflicts the Indian tribes, may be traced to the ambition, divisions, and dissensions, of petty chiefs, who claimed distinction, presents, and power, from their respective tribes. Mr. B. stated that the more closely the Indians were brought together in their relations with the General Government the better: for the experience of those engaged in Indian affairs proves that consolidation is much more desirable than separation. The latter encouraged that ambitious spirit by which the Government was already too much harassed; the disunion of small chiefs, forming separate bands to promote their own evil purposes. Each of these wished to be head of his little band; and this may be considered one of the greatest evils which the Indians and the Government had to contend with. Under these views he had come to the conclusion that it would be better to consolidate the Indians, than to pass a law by which they would be separated. The truth is, said Mr. B., a general complaint has long prevailed against our Indian agents. Instead of living with the tribe or nation for which they are appointed agent, they settle themselves in one of our frontier towns, at a great distance from many of those Indians who have to transact business with them. This evil, Mr. B. thought, would be increased by the proposed law; as it was not to be supposed that an agent could bestow as much attention to the business when the compensation is to be so reduced, as they would devote when receiving a more liberal salary. The President, under the operation of the law, will be constantly harassed with the broils of little chiefs and petty agents.

Mr. WHITE replied that he thought, with the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BARRON] that the soundest policy would be to pursue that course which tended to concentrate the individuals belonging to the same tribe of Indians, in preference to permitting them to be divided in various bands; and he was inclined to think that the adoption of the measure before the Senate would produce a result contrary to that apprehended by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BARRON] who had last addressed the Senate. Under the present state of things, it might be the policy of individuals residing with the Indian tribes (consulting their own comforts) to encourage their division into distinct bands, as they would, in such case, be sure of finding an apology for residing with neither subdivisions of the tribe; while, on the other hand, if the bill should pass, they would find it their interest to prevent any separation of the tribe under their care; knowing that, if the President did divide the agency, he would divide, also, the emoluments attached to it. It was highly probable that, if the Indian agents themselves were consulted, a variety of opinions would be received from them in relation to the measure; some would believe it would produce much good, while others would be of a contrary opinion. Take, for instance, the case of the Chippewas, who were divided into three bands; one of which had, when necessary to transact its business with the Indian agent, to travel a considerable distance, and through the borders of the country of the Sioux, with whom they were frequently at war: a division of the agency, therefore, in this case at least, would tend to prevent collision, and perhaps bloodshed. Under all these circumstances, Mr. W. was of opinion that placing the power proposed by the bill in the hands of the President, would be the means, not only of providing against disunion among the Indians themselves, but of making it the interest of the agents to use all the influence they might possess to discourage discord, and of taking away any excuse they might have for residing at a distance from the tribes placed under their superintendence. He [Mr. W.] had no personal intercourse, it was true, with those tribes which were to be affected by the bill; gentlemen who lived nearer doubtless possessed more information, in relation to them, than he did; but he had seen letters from several Indian agents, recommending the measure now under discussion, though the gentleman from Missouri might have received information of a contrary nature; and from these and other information which had been before the Committee, he was perfectly satisfied with its expediency.

Mr. BENTON observed that it was, perhaps, unnecessary for him to say any thing on the subject, after the explanation that had been given by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, [Mr. WHITE.] Mr. B. said that there was no doubt but agents would be opposed to the present arrangement; that they were opposed to living among the Indian tribes, and this was one of the greatest causes of jealousy and hatred. One band of the Osages separated from their nation on the last day of receiving their donation, charging the agent with partiality. Evils of a similar character were constantly occurring; besides, one tribe, in passing to and from the agency, comes in collision with another tribe, and thus irritations and quarrels were continued. He, Mr. B., knew of no plan by which these evils would be more effectually prevented than by the operation of the proposed measure. He observed that the bill does not authorize the President to divide the Indian tribes, but merely, when a division already exists, to appoint a separate agent. He thought that a division of salary corresponding with the division of labor would have a salutary tendency, both with regard to the Indians themselves, and the agents appointed to regulate their concerns.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time—yeas 30, nays 9.

MR. FOOT'S RESOLUTION.

Mr. ROWAN addressed the Senate about an hour and a half, in continuation and conclusion of the remarks which he commenced on Thursday last.

The entire speech follows:

Mr. R. said that, in the share which he proposed to take in the debate, he should enter into no sectional comparisons. He should not attempt to detract from the just claims of any one of the States, nor would he disparage his own by any attempt to eulogize it. A State should be alike uninfluenced by eulogy and detraction. In his opinion, she could not be justly the subject of either. There existed, necessarily, among the States of the Union, very great diversities. It would be strange if there did not. The habits, manners, customs, and pursuits of people would be different, as they should be found to be differently situated, in reference to climate, soil, and various other causes, which exerted a powerful influence over their condition: for he held that we were more influenced by pride, than reason or philosophy, when we asserted that it was competent to any people to shape their condition according to their will. We were all more or less affected by the force of circumstances; and while we seemed to be under the direction of our will, were under the influence of the causes which, though they were imperceptible, were unceasing in their operation upon our inclinations. The fluids which sustain the life of man [said Mr. R.] are not less of atmospheric or solar concoction, than those which sustain life in other animals, and even in vegetables. Can any man say, upon any other hypothesis, why the tropical fruits do not grow in the New England States; why certain animal and vegetable growths are peculiar to certain climates, and found in no other; and why the stature and complexion of man is different in different climates; and why there is a corresponding difference in his temper and appetencies?

Now, would it not be as reasonable for men to taunt each other with these differences, which are obviously the effect of physical causes, as to indulge in the jeers and taunts which have characterized this debate? I would not ascribe to physical causes all the differences which are found to exist in the political, moral, and religious sentiments of people situated in different climates; but I would not deny to the heavens their legitimate influence upon people differently situated in reference to that influence. I suppose that an infinity of causes combine to diversify the human condition. The pursuits of a people possessing commercial facilities, will be very different from those of a people remote from the ocean, or any navigable stream. Their manners will take their hue from their pursuits; nor will their sentiments escape a tincture from the same cause. The truth is, that, with every people, their first and great object is their own happiness. To that object all their thoughts and all their exertions are directed. For those who inhabit a fertile country and a temperate or warm climate, nature has more than half accomplished this great object. The manners, habits, and notions, (to use a phrase of our Eastern brethren) of such a people will be very different from those of a people who have to win, by strenuous and unintermitted industry, a meagre subsistence from a sterile soil, in a rigorous climate. We all know that the soil of a southern is more prolific than that of a northern climate; that in the first the people are almost literally fed by the bounty of nature; while in the latter, a subsistence has to be conquered from her parsimony, by the most unceasing toil. The climate of the North imposes upon those who inhabit it the duty of obtaining, by much labor, a competent subsistence. It invigorates, by its rigors, the power of the muscular exertion, which it requires. That of the South inflicts languor, and with it an aversion from that labor which its prolific influence has rendered almost unnecessary. Frugality and economy, as the consequence of their necessary industry, characterize the Northern people: Those of the South are almost as profuse as their soil is prolific. In a Northern climate the labor of all is necessary to their sustenance and comfort. In the Southern the labor of a few will sustain all comfortably; and hence the labor of the South has fallen to the lot of slaves. Yes, sir, that slavery which the gentleman from Boston [Mr. WEBSTER] has, in a spirit of implied rebuke, ascribed to Kentucky, in the contrasted view which he took of that State and the State of Ohio, has, if it be an evil, been thrown upon Kentucky by the destinies. That Kentucky has been somewhat retarded in its advances by the perplexity of its land titles, and its toleration of slavery, is, in his estimation, the misfortune of that State; and the exemption of Ohio from those evils has accelerated her march to the high destiny which awaits her. That she may be prosperous, great, and happy, is, I am sure, the wish of the people of Kentucky. They do not repine at their own condition, nor envy that of Ohio. The two States are neighbors, and have much intercourse, social and commercial. Nothing that can be said in relation to either of the States, by that or any other gentleman on this floor, can in the least affect the subsisting relations between them, or the internal police of either. The Senators from Ohio may have been gratified with the eulogy which he bestowed upon their State. Those of Kentucky were not in the least chagrined by his animadversions upon the condition of their State. They make no complaint that they were not assisted by the East in their wars with the savages. They feel a just pride in having triumphed over their savage enemies, without much assistance from that or any other quarter. Notwithstanding the imputed weakness of slavery, they were strong enough for their foes. Kentuckians never complain: complaint is the language of weakness—a language in which they never indulge. The Kentucky Senators perceived that the object of the Senator from Massachusetts, in complimenting Ohio so profusely, was really to compliment his own State: for, in the sequel, he ascribed all the fine attributes of character possessed by Ohio, and all their blissful effects, to the wisdom of New England statesmen.

It is true, that the people of Kentucky have been a good deal harassed by an unhappy perplexity in the titles to land in that State. The titles were derived mainly from Virginia, and the perplexity in them, to which allusion has been made, could not, at that time, and under the circumstances which then existed, have been avoided by any wisdom or foresight whatever. No blame attaches to Virginia or Kentucky on that account. A few years more and that perplexity will yield to the sacred force of proscription, the condition to which all titles to land must ultimately be reduced.

Yes, sir, perplexity of land titles and slavery have both existed in Kentucky; they both still exist. The former will, with the permission of the Supreme Court, soon cease to exist. But will those evils be at all mitigated by their introduction into this debate? Will the gratuitous mention made of them by the honorable Senator even alleviate them? Slavery must continue to exist in that State, whether for good or for evil, for years yet to come, notwithstanding his kind solicitude on the subject. And I have only to tell him that it is a subject which, so far as that State is concerned, belongs exclusively to herself, as a sovereign State. But, as the gentleman has mentioned that subject, (and it is one about which no gentleman from a non-slaveholding State can ever speak with any good effect, or for any good purpose) I must be permitted to talk a little about it. Sir, while I do not approve of slavery in the abstract, I cannot admire the morbid sensibility which seems to animate some gentlemen upon that subject.

It would appear, from the agony which the very mention of slavery seems to inflict upon the feelings of the two Senators who have discoursed about it, that it was a new thing in our land; that it had never been noticed or discussed before; or that those who had noticed and discussed it, were remarkable for the callousity of their feelings, or the obtuseness of their intellect. They seem not to be aware, that slavery has been not only tolerated, but advocated by the wisest and ablest jurists that ever lived; and that too upon first principles; upon the principles of natural justice.

The jurists deduce its justification from war; as a right which the captor has over the captive, whom he might have slain. From crime; that a life forfeited by crime may be justly commuted for, or rather transmuted into, slavery. From debt; that the debtor may justly enslave himself, in payment of a debt, which he cannot otherwise pay. From subsistence; that, in a state of population so dense as to reduce labor to its minimum price, that of mere subsistence, those individuals who cannot otherwise live, may justly enslave themselves for subsistence. In that state of things, the female who has thus enslaved herself becomes pregnant; during a portion of the period of gestation, she is unable, by reason of her pregnancy, to earn her subsistence by her labor; for subsistence during that period, both she and her offspring are hopeless debtors—the child, on account of the incapacity of the mother, during that time of gestation and parturition, of which it was the occasion—the mother on her own account; so that the infant was indebted before it was born, and becomes further indebted for its support during that period of its infancy in which it was incapable to earn its subsistence by its labor: and that thus, after laboring its whole life for its subsistence, it dies indebted for the support of itself and mother, during their respective incapacities.

Whether this reasoning be sound or fallacious, it is needless to inquire. It has the sanction of very high names. Without being able to refute it, my feelings have always been opposed to the conclusion to which it conducts my mind. But I have not been able, while I deprecated slavery, to perceive any practicable mode of weeding it out from among us. The condition of free people of color is infinitely worse than that of the slaves. Shunned by the whites, and not permitted to associate with the slaves, they are in a state of exile in the midst of society, and hasten through immorality and crime to extinction. I would ask the gentlemen if the States of New England would agree to receive into their society the emancipated slaves of the South and West? Sir, slavery has been reprobated throughout all time, but has never ceased to exist. It has prevailed through all time, and been tolerated by philosophers and Christians, of every sect and denomination, Jews, Gentiles, and Heathens. But if slavery be an evil, is there not some consolation in the reflection that it is not unmixed—that with a large portion of mankind it is connected with the very greatest good which they enjoy. It is a fact, verified by observation, that those who tolerate slavery are uniformly the most enthusiastic in their devotion to liberty. Montesquieu, whose name is, upon all subjects of this kind, very high authority, tells us that slavery is the natural state of man in warm, and liberty his natural state in cold climates. This sentiment is unhappily but too well supported by history.

The barrenness of the soil in high latitudes, the quantity of labor required of all, to produce a comfortable subsistence for all, and the rigors of the climate in which they live and toil, impress upon the people great vigor and hardihood of character; and qualify them to maintain and vindicate their liberty, whenever, and under whatever circumstances, it may be assailed. Amid the severity and gloom of the climate, and the penury of nature, they find nothing so valuable, nothing which they estimate so highly, as their liberty. It is to them the greatest good, and compensates for the absence of all those bounties which nature has lavished upon the people of a warmer climate. They are necessarily free, and necessarily impressed with the value of their freedom, and possess the inclination as well as the power to maintain it.

In Southern climates, nothing is so much dreaded as exposure to the fervid rays of the sun; and scarcely any thing is more unfeeling and oppressive than that exposure is, to those who are not habituated to it. The special kindness of Heaven to man is illustrated in holy writ, by reference to the refreshing influence of "the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." In such a climate none will labor constantly, but those who are forced to do so; and those who are constrained by the force of circumstances to labor, soon become reconciled to their condition. The languor inflicted by the climate disqualifies them to conquer their condition, and fits them for it; and, owing to the bounty of nature, the labor of a comparatively small portion of the people will support them all. Those who do not labor, while they enjoy the refreshing influence of the shade, are left in the possession of liberty, with leisure to cultivate its theory, and contemplate its charms, until they become enamored with it. Liberty is the beau ideal of the Southern and Western slave-holders; and indeed is more or less so with all the white population. Their devotion to it partakes of the spirit of idolatry; and this sentiment is heightened by the constant presence of slavery, and is more and more strengthened by the contrast which every day exhibits between their own condition and that of the slaves. So that, if this reasoning be correct, the cause of civil liberty is gainer by the numerical amount of her votaries, thus rescued from the fervors of a Southern climate. But a few, instead of all the people in such a climate, are slaves; and our Northern brethren, if this theory be correct, have only to lament, in common with all the disciples of liberty, that nature exacts from the people of the South the toleration of slavery, as the only condition upon which they can themselves be free.

Then, sir, the toleration of slavery ought not to be imputed by our Northern, to their Southern brethren, as matter of reproach: for if, according to the jurists, it be justifiable upon principles of natural justice, the people of each State are at liberty to tolerate it or not, as they may choose. It is, in that case, a mere question of policy. But if the writers on public law should in this case have erred, and slavery is not in accordance with the laws of nature, the slave-holders of the South are excusable, because they have been reduced, by the climate which they occupy, to the necessity of submitting to it, as the least evil; and that, at last, is the alternative presented to man, in his progress through life, whether in his individual or aggregate capacity. His choice is, in no instance, perfect good; it is between a greater and a less evil.

But is not the theory which I have been urging affirmed and illustrated by the history of the condition of mankind in all ages? Of what instance to the contrary does history furnish any account? Of what Southern country were the people ever free, who did not tolerate slavery? There are many instances of Southern people, who tolerated slavery without being free themselves; but I believe there is no instance on record, of a Southern people being, and continuing to be, free, who did not tolerate slavery. The Jews, the Greeks, the Romans, were respectively the freest people of the periods in which they lived, and they each tolerated slavery in its most repulsive form. They, too, were greatly in advance of other nations in civilization and all the arts which embellish life. They gave important lessons on the science of free government to their cotemporaries, and to succeeding generations. They, who but for the slavery which they tolerated, would have been slaves themselves, taught mankind how to live free, and, what was greatly more important, how to die for the maintenance of their liberty. I do not mean that the science of free government was thoroughly understood by either of them. They were greatly in advance of their contemporaries in that science, perhaps as much so as we are in advance of them. And we, I regret to believe, are yet far short of perfection in it.

Whether the principles of free government will ever be so simplified as to be comprehended and understood by the people generally, and whether it will be possible, even if such should be the fact, for them to resist successfully the unceasing and almost imperceptible enactments of aristocracy upon their rights, is a problem of the very deepest interest, and remains to be solved. But I have been led away by this subject. It is one of great delicacy and deep interest. It must not be meddled with from abroad. The Southern and Western States cannot agree that it shall be discussed by those who can have no motives, of even a philanthropic cast, to meddle with it at all. It is exclusively their own subject, and must be left to them and the destinies.

The gentleman seemed to think that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAYNE] was looking out for Western allies; that his object was to conciliate the West. The sentiments uttered by the Senator from the South, [Mr. HAYNE] in relation to the public lands in some of the Western States, were elevated and just, and such as in my opinion might be expected from an enlightened statesman. There are no lands belonging to the United States in the State of Kentucky, and I thank heaven that such is the case. The slavery and perplexity of land titles, which have been imputed to Kentucky, may be very great evils, and the first of them has been felt as such by the people to an afflicting extent. But in my judgment both together are a very little matter, compared with the evil experienced by a State whose territory belongs to the United States. In Kentucky, however perplexed the titles of her citizens to their lands were, the title of the State to all the territory within her limits is unperplexed, simple, and sovereign. The Senator from South Carolina, therefore, could not, in all that he said in reference to the public lands, have expected to operate upon Kentucky, nor could he justly be suspected of an intention to propitiate the States in the valley of the Mississippi, by any thing he said; because it was what they had a right to expect from him, and every other member of this body. And they ought not to be supposed to take as a favor, what they have just cause to demand as a right. No, sir; if there was any indication given of illicit love, it was most obviously on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts, towards the State of Ohio. That he had no love towards Kentucky, was very obvious, and that his regards for Ohio were of the tenderest sort, was most obvious. Whether she will reciprocate his love, is, I think, somewhat problematical, but about that matter I have no concern. I can only say that, whatever may be the inclination of the East, or the South, towards Kentucky, in regard to alliance, it may be abandoned. She is not in a woobable condition; she is wedded to the Union, and will not hear of any other alliance.

The Senator from Maine, too, [Mr. SPRAGUE] has given us a most glowing description, or rather depiction of New England. He does not, as the gentleman from Massachusetts did, speak of New England through Ohio. He speaks right at her, and directly of her. He has told us of the first colonists, of the manner of their landing, and of the place at which they landed. He has described them, not as hardy puritans, but as venerable pilgrims, landing upon the rock at Plymouth, with the Bible in their hands; yes, sir, the Holy Bible in their pious hands!! He has told us, too, that they extracted the model of their free and happy governments from that sacred volume, and that they got from that same holy book those pure principles of morality and piety, and that love of order, which so signally characterizes them at this day. And he has taken special care to inform us, that they were inspired with an emphatic abhorrence of slavery, by the divine injunction of that same sacred volume, "to do unto others as they would that others should do unto them."

While the Bible furnishes the very best rules by which to regulate the conduct of individuals towards each other and their Maker, I must be allowed to say, that the pilgrims of Plymouth must have been very ingenious to have discovered in it either the model of a free government, or the political principles upon which a free government can be predicated—with the exception of what is called a theocracy—in which the priests ruled; all the governments of which it treats, were those of kings and judges. At present, the representatives of the people of New England seem to have a very decided preference for the judges. No man can read in the Bible of a republic. Those pilgrims only took their government from the Bible, until they found leisure to make a better, and they did make, and do now enjoy, a much better government than any of which that good book speaks.

Sir, I was so charmed with the eloquence of the gentleman, that I fancied for the while that New England was a very elysium; that its surface was gently undulating, without any abruptness, carpeted with verdure of the deepest hue, interspersed with flowers of every tint and flavor; that the forests were composed of sacred growths—the palm, the cedar, the fir tree, and olive; tenanted by birds of the most varied and vivid plumage, and of exquisite notes. That the music of the grove was rendered somewhat more solemn, by the plaintive cooing of the dove, perched, not upon the withered limb of a thunder-scathed oak, but upon the verdant bough of its own olive, the tree from which it plucked the emblematic sprig which it bore in its beak to the patriarchal voyager. That the venerable pilgrims sauntered upon the surface, or reclined, in graceful recumbency, upon the green banks of the pellucid streams, which meandered in every variety of curve, through the stately groves, and discoursed sweet music with the pebbles, except on Sundays. That in this posture of graceful recumbency, they inhaled the odoriferous breezes, which gently agitated the balmy air, and occasionally quaffed nectar from the hand of the obsequious Ganymedes. But when the gentleman had closed his description, and the illusion produced on my fancy by his eloquence had subsided, or, in other words, when the poetry of his description was reduced to plain prose, I found it was all a notion. That he had been talking about the hardy New Englanders, and about the poor broken scrubby lands of New England, out of which the virtuous yeomanry of that country, by the dint of persevering industry, extract not only comfort, but wealth. That the fancied nectar was neither more nor less than plain New England rum; and that, in the generous use of it, each man was his own Ganymede, and helped himself with an alacrity proportioned to his thirst.

Now, sir, I am willing to admit that the people of New England have many virtues; they are honest, industrious, enlightened, enterprising, and moderately pious. I admire their free school system, and have no doubt that it conduces greatly to the diffusion of much useful knowledge among the mass of the people. But, after all, they are no better than they should be; no better than their Southern or Western neighbors. The people of every State have their respective advantages and inconveniences; and are all of them more or less under the control of circumstances, over which they have themselves no control. They are all aiming at the same object, and all employ such means to promote it as their condition permits. To be happy is not less the aim of the people of the other States, than of New England; and they perhaps have not been less successful than she. Let her not be so weak as to suppose that none can enjoy it who do not conform to her standard. Let all the States unite in maintaining the freedom of each, and let each be free to pursue its own happiness in its own way. Comparisons, taunts, and reproaches, can produce no good effect, and may tend to disturb those good relations which ought to subsist among the people of our Union.

Let me not be understood as disparaging New England in any, the slightest degree. I rank her with her sisters of the Union; neither more nor less fair or accomplished than either of them; they are all virtuous. The only freckle which I can discern on the face of New England, is, that she is sometimes a little too vain of her beauty, and too much disposed to trumpet it. I have never been in that region; but if I were to take their late representative in this body [Senator Lloyd] as the criterion by which I should judge of them, I would certainly rate them very high. He would have filled the character of Senator in the proudest days of the Roman republic; no man ever occupied a seat in the Senate of the United States who was his superior in all that constitutes excellence of character in the Senator and the gentleman. I have no prejudices against, but rather partialities for, New England. Of one thing I am satisfied, and that is, that New England can, and will, take care of herself. My inclination is, that the other States should do the same; and that neither should unnecessarily, or wantonly, intermeddle with the concerns of the others.

But I did not rise, let me assure you, to discuss the subjects which I have cursorily noticed. I could not have been tempted, by them, to encounter the embarrassment which speaking in this body has always inflicted upon me. I rose mainly to enter my solemn protest against some of the political doctrines advanced by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER.] He has asserted, in the course of this debate, that the constitution of the United States was not formed by the States; that it is not a compact formed by the States, but a Government formed by the people; that it is a popular Government, formed by the people at large; and he adds "that, if the whole truth must be told, they brought it into existence, established it, and have hitherto supported it, for the very purpose, among others, of imposing certain salutary restraints on State sovereignties."

He asserts farther, that, in forming the General Government, the people conferred upon the Supreme Court of the United States the power of imposing these certain salutary restraints upon the sovereignty of the States. Now, sir, believing, as I do most solemnly, that these doctrines strike at the root of all our free institutions, and lead directly to a consolidation of the Government, I cannot refrain from attempting, however feeble the attempt may be, to expose their fallacy and their dangerous tendency. It is the first time they have been openly avowed (so far as I have been informed) in either House of Congress. They were thought to be fairly inferrible from the tenor and import of the first message of the late President Adams to the Congress; but they were left to inference, and were not explicitly avowed. The recommendation of Secretary Rush, that the industry of the people should be regulated by Congress, must have been predicated upon his belief, and that of Mr. Adams, in these doctrines. But still, the friends of Mr. Adams, when these doctrines were imputed to him, and his message quoted in support of the imputation, resisted it with warmth, and ascribed the inferences from the message, and from the report of Secretary Rush, to unkind or party feelings. Now, the explicit avowal of the honorable Senator [Mr. W.] removes all doubt from the subject. We can no longer doubt as to what was the political faith of Mr. Adams. His most zealous and most distinguished apostle has avowed it. The two parties are now clearly distinguishable by their opposite political tenets; the one headed by our illustrious Chief Magistrate, who is the friend and advocate of the rights of the States; the other party is now headed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] and is, as I shall contend, and attempt to prove, in favor of a consolidation of the Government—of a splendid empire. The doctrine avowed is neither more nor less than that the State sovereignties are merely nominal, and that the Government was consolidated in its formation. How it has happened that this essential characteristic of the Government was so long kept a secret from the people of the States, is a matter of some mystery. Why was it not avowed at the time the constitution was formed? Why was this disclosure reserved until this time, and for this occasion? Is there any thing in the message of the President, or in the political condition of the people of the States, which demands its promulgation at this time? Are the people prepared, think you, to receive an entire new version of their constitution? Will they give up their dependence upon their States, respectively, and rely upon the great central Government for the protection of their lives, liberty, and property? Sir, I think not; they are not yet sufficiently tamed and subdued by the aristocracy of the land, and the encroachments of the General Government upon the rights of the States, to submit just at once.

I would ask the honorable Senator [said Mr. R.] how his doctrine can be correct, consistently with the known state of facts at the time the constitution was formed. What was the condition of the people at that time? Were they at large, and unconnected by any political ties whatever? Or, were they in a state of self-government, under distinct political associations? It is known to every body that the people consisted of, and constituted, thirteen distinct, independent, and sovereign States. And those

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

States were connected together by a compact of union; and that the great object of the people of the States, in forming the constitution, was that declared in its preem, to make the Union more perfect. What union, I would ask, or union of what? Most certainly of the States, already united, whose union was thought to be imperfect. To give more compaction, and render more perfect, the Union of the States, was the great desideratum. To consolidate the Union of the States was the object of the constitutional compact.

But I desire to be informed how the people could absolve themselves from their allegiance to their respective States, so as to be in a condition to form a National Government? And what need could they have for a National Government, before they had formed themselves into a nation; and how they could form themselves into a nation, one nation, without abandoning, or throwing off, their State costume, and even dissolving the compacts by which they were formed into States?

We all know that there are but two conditions of mankind. The one natural, the other artificial, or pactional. And we know that, in a state of nature, there is no government; that all are equal in that condition; and when all are equal, there can be no government. The laws of nature are the only rules of human conduct in that condition, and each individual is his own expounder of those laws. He is the arbiter of his own rights, and the avenger of his own wrongs. Such was not the condition of the people when the constitution was formed. They were not at large, and at liberty to improve their condition by their confluent voice or agency. And if they had been so situated they would not have formed such a constitution as they did, as I shall attempt hereafter to show. The constitution is not adapted to the people, in any condition, which, as one people, they could occupy, while it is admirably adapted for their use, in their State capacities—the purpose for which it was formed.

I desire further to know in what sense the words State, and people, are used by him, when he says, "The people brought it (the constitution) into existence, for the purpose, amongst others, of imposing certain salutary restraints upon State sovereignties." Indeed, I should like to know in what sense he uses the word sovereignties, in that connexion. Now, sir, I understand State to mean the people who compose it—that it is but a name by which they, in their collective capacity, are designated. By the people of the United States I understand the distinct collective bodies of people who compose the States that are united by the Federal Constitution. And by the United States I understand the distinct collective bodies of people of which the States are composed. But I shall make myself better understood by a short analysis of the process by which a State is formed.

The power which is exerted in governments must either have been willingly conceded by the people, or taken from them against their will. If it could only be obtained in the latter mode, there could be no free governments. In a state of nature, there is no power (I mean moral power) in one man, to direct, control, or govern another—all are free. The evils inseparable from this condition need not to be enumerated by me: they have been portrayed by all other elementary writers on the science of politics. It suffices to say that they are such as to induce those in that condition to hasten to escape from it. All political doctors agree in telling us that the transition from a state of nature to a state of civil society is effected by an agreement among all who are to compose the society—of each with all, and all with each, that each, and its concerns, shall be directed by the understanding, and protected by the force or power of all. The agreement is reciprocal on each with all, and of all with each. The right which each man possessed, in a state of nature, to direct himself and his own concerns, by his own will, is voluntarily surrendered by him to the society; and he agrees that he and his concerns shall thereafter be subject to the direction and control of the understanding or will of the society. This contract is either express or implied, but most frequently implied, and is necessarily supposed to have been formed by every people among whom laws and government are found to exist. I say necessarily: for the power to make a law, or to govern, can be obtained upon no other supposition. It is denominated the social compact. It is the charter by which civil society is incorporated; by which it acquires personality and unity; by which the action of all the people, by a majority, or in any other mode which they may designate in their constitutional compact, is considered as the action of a moral agent—of a single person. This moral agent is, in reference to its own condition and concerns, called a State—probably from the fixed and stable condition of the people, compared with their variable and fluctuating condition in a state of nature. In reference to other States it is called a nation, and acts and holds intercourse with them as an individual person. Much confusion has arisen from the indiscriminate application of the word State to different and distinct subjects. Sometimes it is used to mean the Government of the State, instead of the people in their political capacity.

There is nothing more common than to hear men, who are even distinguished for their political knowledge, say, that, in forming government, men surrender a portion of their natural rights to secure the protection of the balance. Yet there is no error more palpable. If that notion were correct, the legitimate power of the State (and throughout this argument I shall use that word to mean the people of the State) would be too limited for any beneficial purpose. Then, indeed, a State would not possess sovereign power. The State, in that case, could not protect either the citizen or his property. He would not even be a citizen: for it is in consequence of his having surrendered, not a part, but the whole, of his self-control, that he is a citizen: and it is only as a citizen that a State can demand any public service from him, or control him in any way. Neither could his property be subject to the control of the State, even in reference to its protection, if the control of it all had not been surrendered in the social compact. Now this individuality of the people, produced by the social compact, subsists while that compact lasts, and it confers upon the State which it has formed, the self-preserving power to the extent of the moral and physical energy of all. The motives which lead to the formation of a State can never cease to exist; a state of nature is, at all times, equally infested with insecurity and wretchedness; and, of course, there will always be the same motives for shunning it, and it can only be avoided by remaining in a state of civil society. Hence, we have no account in history of the voluntary dissolution of the social compact. Civil societies have been destroyed by earthquakes, by deluge, and by the exterminating ravages of war, but never by a voluntary dissolution of their social compacts. They have, to be sure, been often subdued into vassalage, or reduced to the condition of provinces. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive how they could be dissolved by the will or agency of the people who compose them. The will of the whole is the will of one political body, of one corporate agent; and a self-destroying will, or purpose, would be as unnatural in a body corporate as in a body natural.

Again: any attempt by any of the members of the society to thwart or counteract the self-preserving will of the whole, would be highly criminal, would be treason, and subject those who made the attempt to the fate which they meditated against the body politic.

The States, therefore, remained in full vigor while the constitution of the United States was forming. They were not even shorn of any of their sovereign power by that process: for the gentleman says that that instrument was brought into existence, amongst other reasons, for the purpose of imposing certain salutary restraints upon State sovereignties.

Now, that which does not exist cannot be restrained. He therefore admits the existence of the sovereignties of the States, not only at the time, but ever since the formation of the constitution. If the sovereignty of each State was separate and distinct, and consisted in the concentrated will of the people of each, by what authority could the people of the State of Georgia interfere in the reduction or modification of the sovereign power of the State of Virginia? and if they could not interfere in the regulation of the power of the State of Virginia, by what mode could the people of Virginia itself, other than their collective, their State capacity, diminish or modify the sovereign power of that State? The people of no one State could interfere with the rights of another, nor with its own, in any other capacity than as the collective body which composed the State. But, upon the supposition that the people of all the States, not in their State capacities, but at large, and by their confluent voice or agency, formed the constitution, the difficulty still presents itself: by what authority did all unite in modifying the constitution of each? They had not entered all into one general compact, and thereby conferred power upon the majority to form the constitution, by the adoption of the State machinery which they had thrown off. This Government is not formed by the people at large, out of the cœvix of the States. But will the gentleman have the goodness to tell us what is the power, and where does it reside, which is employed in altering the constitution of a State? Does it not reside, exclusively, in the people of the State, and in their collective capacity, and must it not be exerted in that capacity, to produce any alteration in their constitution? And must it not be exerted according to the mode prescribed in the constitution? Can the people, pursuing that mode, be viewed in any other than their State capacities? The gentleman, I am sure, will answer these questions in the affirmative. Well, the State constitutions were all affected, and seriously, too, by the constitution of the United States. Now, if none but the people of a State, in their distinct State capacity, could affect its constitution, then their action, in forming the constitution of the United States, must have been exerted in their State capacity. The States, whereby I mean the people of each, as a distinct political body, then, must have formed the constitution, and not the people at large. If these views are correct, how can the gentleman reconcile his idea that the constitution was formed by the people, and not by the States, with his other idea that it was formed by the people to impose certain restraints upon State sovereignty? If the people acted in their distinct State capacities, then they could consistently impose restraints upon the exercise, by the States, of their sovereign power; but then they acted as States, and imposed the restraints by compact; and in no other capacity could they act, nor by any other mode than by compact could they achieve that object. The social compact gives, as I have urged, unity, compaction, and oneness, to the people. It gives the power to the State which it forms, of expressing its will by a majority. And thus it acts in forming its constitutional compact, and in the exercise of its legislative power. This power of acting by a majority would be tyranny over the minority, if it had not been conceded by the social compact. Upon this ground, it must be obvious that the social must precede the constitutional compact, and that the power to form the latter must be derived from the former. But, until there be a State, there can be neither need for a government, or the power to form it. So that, if the people had not, at the time the constitution was formed, existed in distinct political bodies, they must all have existed in one political body, before they could either need a government, or possess the power to form one.

Sir, I know that the discussion of the elementary principles of government is dry and uninteresting; indeed, all abstract discussion is so: but the Senator from Massachusetts has led the way. He has made it necessary for me, either to acquiesce in doctrines which I consider dangerous to the liberties of the people, or to attempt to refute them. Indeed, I think it is greatly to be regretted that the true principles of our free institutions have not been more frequently the subject of discussion. The clear comprehension and maintenance of them is essential to the liberty of the people. To obliterate or obscure them will always be, as it always has been, the purpose of those who would misrule and oppress the people.

That the constitution must, of necessity, have been formed by the States, and not by the people at large, I have attempted to prove by referring to natural principles, and to the existing state of things at the time it was formed. I will refer you to that instrument itself for further proof of that fact. I have already called your attention to the preamble. It is in these words: "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union," &c. Let me ask again, if the words "we, the people of the United States," meant we, the people not of the United States? Why were they termed people of the United States, if they considered themselves as absolved from their State relations, and at large? Can we construe the words "United States," in this connexion, to mean the people within the outer boundaries of the exterior States, without reference to the States and State institutions in any other sense? Are we not forbidden to give them this meaning by the words which follow, viz: "to form a more perfect union?" The word union can relate to nothing but the States. The object, as I have before stated, was to unite them, not the people, more perfectly: Besides, a more perfect union of the people cannot be produced by a constitutional than by the social compact. It is not the object of a constitution to unite the people. It pre-supposes their most perfect union under the social compact. It is owing, alone, to that pre-existing union, that they can form a constitution, or have any need for it. It would have been inappropriate, therefore, in the preamble to the constitution, to have said "in order to form a more perfect union," in reference to the people: besides, there was not then, nor had there existed, any political union among the people, merely as people. The union which existed under the articles of confederation was a union of the States. To form a union of the States, more perfect than the one which then existed, was the object, I repeat, of the present constitution.

That such was the intention of those who framed the constitution, is obvious from the structure and phraseology of that instrument. In the 2d section of the 1st article we find this provision: "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year, by the people of the several States." And again, "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union." We see, from what I have read, that the members were to be chosen, not by the people at large, but by the people of the several States, and this shows what was meant in the preamble, by the words "we, the people of the United States." It shows that these words meant "the people of the several States." The people who formed the constitution were to elect their members in the same character in which they formed that instrument—as the people of the several States. This idea is confirmed by the provision "that representation and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States." What several States? The answer is given in the same sentence—those "which may be included within this Union." Then the Union was of States: they were to be represented as States, and taxed as States; and only the States which might be included within the Union were to pay taxes and be entitled to be represented. Here, too, the word State most evidently means the people who compose it. They are to choose representatives and they are to be taxed as the collective bodies who constitute the State. Again the same provision, farther on, reads thus: "The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for thirty thousand; but each State shall have at least one Representative, &c.; and, until such enumeration shall be made, New Hampshire shall be entitled to choose three, Rhode Island one," &c. Here it is very evident that the word "State" is used to mean the people of the State; population is made the basis of representation; the ratio is fixed at thirty thousand; but whether thirty thousand, or a smaller number of the people, composed a State, it should have one Representative.

So, too, the provision that the State of New Hampshire should, until the next enumeration, be entitled to choose three Representatives, means, that the people who composed that State should choose, and implies that their number was at least ninety-thousand, and so of the other States. But hear this provision of the constitution still further to the same effect: "When a vacancy happens in the representation from any State, the Executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election," &c. Who can misunderstand this language? Who does not see, from the clauses of the constitution which I have read, that that instrument was made by the people of the States, in their State capacity? That the States made it? In the last clause there is an evident distinction between the State, and the Government of the State; "to fill a vacancy happening in any of the States, the Executive authority thereof should issue writs of election," &c. A State was to have one Representative for every thirty thousand composing it, and the Executive authority of the State was to issue writs to fill vacancies happening in the State. Now, the State is formed by the social compact; the Executive authority was formed by the constitutional compact; the constitution, in all its references to the people, and in all its requisitions on them, refers to them either by the term "State," or by the terms "people of the State," as is evident from the clauses which I have read. But this distinction between the State and the Government thereof, is obviously displayed in the third section of the first article: It relates to the creation of the Senate, the body which we now compose, and reads thus: "The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof." Here the word State, as in the other instances which I have read, means the people incorporated by the social compact; and the Legislature which was created by the constitutional compact must be referred to the constitution by which it was created.

The social compact created the State; the State created, by its constitutional compact, its government; and, hence we say, the Government of the State, the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial authority of the State. The people of the State can speak or act only through their constitutional functionaries, or by convention.

The prevailing idea that, when the constitution of a State is abolished, the people are thrown back into a state of nature, is erroneous, and one which, as used by aristocrats and office-holders, does much harm. It is urged to deter the people, who are often duped by it, from that reasonable resort to first principles which is essential to the preservation of their liberty. Now, we all know that the abolition by a State of its constitution, no more affects the social compact, or the existence of the State, than the repeal of a statute affects it. The State made its constitution, and enacted the statute. The same sovereign power was exerted in both instances, alike in the creation and the abolition of both: and exists in the unimpaired efficacy of the social compact. Every State has its fixed and its variable attributes of character. The former is political, and identified with the social compact; the latter exists on the changeable qualities or habits of the people. Thus a nation is said to be brave or cowardly, sincere or faithless. The people of Spain were at one time remarkable for their fine chivalric spirit. Not so now. Punic faith is a lasting stigma upon Carthage. But that the compression of the people, by the social compact, into the unit called a State, remains, under all the changes of character which the people undergo, and all the changes of its government which choice or accident may produce, or war or convulsion inflict, itself unchanged. If a republic becomes a monarchy, or, if a monarchy becomes a republic, these are but changes of government; the civil society, or State, remains unaltered, and is sovereign, while ever it manages its own affairs by its own will. It is upon this principle that States are not absolved from their debts by revolution. The State, and not "the Government," is the contracting party, and nothing but the dissolution of the social compact, and consequent extinction of the State, can absolve from its payment.

Now, sir, unless I am wrong as to the formation and character of States, and unless I have read the constitution wrong, that instrument not only was not formed by the people at large, but could not, as I have before said, have been formed by them. It could not have been formed by the people in any other capacity than as States. It was, we know, formed by Representatives from the States, and it was adopted by the Representatives of the States, severally: for the members of the conventions in the several States were not less representatives of the States severally, than their legislative representatives. I contend, therefore, that the States made the constitution, and thereby rendered the Union greatly more perfect than it was under the articles of confederation. I contend, also, that the individuality and sovereign personality of the States were not at all impaired by that instrument. That the States remain plenary sovereigns as much so as they were before the formation of the constitution. That they have not by that instrument parted with one jot of their sovereign power. You seem to startle; but hear me: I contend that the States as plenary sovereigns, agreed by the constitution (which is but their compact of Union) that they would unite in exerting the powers therein specified and defined, for the purposes and objects therein designated, and through the agency of the machinery therein created. The power exercised by the functionaries of the General Government is not inherent in them, but in the State whose agents they are. The constitution is their power of ally to do certain acts, and contains, connected within their authority to act, their letter of instructions as to the manner in which they shall act. They are the servants. The power which gives validity to their acts is in their masters, the States. Where, let me ask you, is the power of Congress during the recess of that body? Certainly not in the individual members—they do not carry it about with them. Suppose the Judges of the Supreme Court were by some fatality thrown out of existence, where would be the judicial power which they exercised, until others were appointed? Upon the death of the President, where is the supreme executive power of the Union? You may tell me in the Vice President. But between the death of the President, and induction of the Vice President, where is it? The answer to these questions is most obvious. It is, that they possessed no sovereign power; that they were but the agents of the sovereign States; that the States retained all their sovereign power, and still retain it. That it is inherent in them; not in three fourths of the States, but in all of them. In amending, or altering the constitution, they have agreed that the voice of all shall be expressed by three-fourths. The sentiment that the States, by the formation of the constitution, divested themselves of a large portion of their sovereign power, is, in my humble opinion, as erroneous as it is unhappily prevalent. And this error will be advocated by all who are hostile to State sovereignty, and friendly to a consolidated Government.

I have attempted to prove, in a previous part of my argument, that a State could not, without dissolving its social compact, divest itself of its sovereign power. To suppose that a State could be dependent and sovereign at the same time, would be to suppose it destitute of that unity which is of the essence of its nature. It would be not only to misconceive the character of a State, but to ascribe to it two inconsistent modes of existence. Nor is it more admissible to suppose that a State is sovereign, and, at the same time, subject to certain salutary restraints upon the exercise of its sovereignty by any other power. For I lay it down as a truism in political science, that whenever a State is subject to the control of the will of any other power, it has ceased to be sovereign, and is the province of the power that may control it. I say, may control it: for its objection does not consist in the actual exertion upon it, of the controlling power, but in its subjection to that control. Slaves are not always under the controlling action of their master's will. Indeed they are but seldom so. Yet they are not the less slaves when they are not, than when they are, under his actual control, because their slavery consists in their subjection to his will, and not in their actual continuous conformity to it.

It is for that reason that slaves cannot form or enter into a social compact. They lack that exemption from control, that freedom of will, of which the sovereign power of the State is created by the social compact. Then, if it is essential that the component parts of sovereignty, that the will of each member of the social compact, shall be free from subjection, does it not follow that the sovereignty itself should be alike free from subjection? The sovereign power of the State (as I have before urged) consists in the free will of all the members of civil society, compacted by the social compact into a corporate person. The elements of this power being free, the aggregate must be so. There is, therefore, no law obligatory upon a sovereign State but that which was obligatory upon its constituent parts. The laws of nature were alone obligatory upon man in a state of nature, and no other laws are obligatory upon a sovereign State: for all the rights, powers, and privileges, which were possessed in a state of nature, by the individuals who compose the State, are concentrated, by the social compact, in the State, and constitute its sovereignty. Control implies superiority on the part of the controlling, and inferiority on the part of the controlled. But sovereigns are equal; and it is of the essence of sovereignty that it cannot admit of salutary restraints abunde. It is a governing and self-governed power. Besides, a State would be unfit, indeed disqualified, to protect its citizens according to its stipulation in the social compact, if it were, as the Senator supposes, subject to those salutary restraints, by the judicial functionaries of the General Government. It would indicate, by its weakness, that, instead of protecting it needed protection. The reciprocal duties and obligations which now exist between the States and their citizens, would vanish. But the gentleman is kind in subjecting the States to none but salutary restraints. The Supreme Court are to judge whether the restraints are or are not salutary, which they will, no doubt, seasonably impose upon State sovereignties. The sovereign State is not to form any opinion on this subject, and therein, and by its passive acquiescence, display, according to its own opinion, its sovereignty. I can form no idea of a sovereignty subject to such restraints. It is illusive, and but the precursor, as I fear, of a declaration hereafter to be made, that the States are not sovereign. Indeed it is to my mind nothing short of a virtual declaration to that effect now: for there is no such thing as half, or three-quarters, or seven-eighths sovereign. Every State being a unit, must be entirely of one character—must be either sovereign or vassal; and I repeat that a State, subject to be controlled by any other power, is the vassal of that power.

I admit that a sovereign State may forbear to exercise her sovereign power in relation to given objects, or classes of objects. She may stipulate thus to forbear the exertion of her sovereign powers, or she may stipulate to exercise her sovereign powers in conjunction with other States, in relation to a certain class of subjects, and to forbear to exert them individually upon any of those subjects. But the very stipulation, instead of renouncing the powers which are to be jointly exercised, implies their retention. Such a stipulation I consider the constitution to be. I view it as an agreement between the sovereign States to exert, jointly, their respective powers, through the agency of the General Government, for the purposes and in the manner delineated in that instrument of compact. Each State exerts its plenary sovereign power jointly, for all the legitimate purposes of the Union; and separately, for all the purposes of domiciliary or State concerns. An individual citizen may stipulate to transact a portion of his business by agent, and the balance by himself; and that he will forbear to exert his moral faculties or physical energies upon that class of subjects which, by his stipulation, are to be acted upon by his agent; has he, by his stipulation, lessened, impaired, or diminished his moral or physical powers? Certainly not. The validity of the agency depends upon his retaining those faculties: for if he shall become insane, or die, the agent cannot act, because the power of his principal has become extinct. So it is the power, the full subsisting sovereign power of the States, which gives validity to the acts of the General Government. The validity of those acts does not result from the exercise of a portion of the sovereign power of each State.

Sir, we cannot conceive of a sovereign act, without the consciousness that it must have been performed by a sovereign power. An atom is a very small part of a globe, and yet the creation of that implies the exertion of as plenary sovereign power as the creation of the globe. The power in the State, which is exerted in taking from a citizen an acre of his land for a public highway, is not less sovereign than that which is exerted in taking his life for crime—nothing less than plenary sovereign power can effect either; and there are no degrees of comparison in sovereign power; there is not sovereign, more sovereign, and most sovereign power. The States were, before the formation of the constitution, equal, for they were sovereign; since that instrument was formed, they are not less equal; because they are still sovereign, as much so now as then; and because the powers which they stipulated in that compact to forbear to exercise separately, and to exercise jointly, were equal. So that, if the powers which they exercise jointly, under the constitution, be considered, they are equal, and equally exerted, by the joint action of all the States, through their agents; and the powers which each may, consistently with their constitutional compact, exert separately, are equal; and whether viewed in their joint or separate action, they are equal. And when a new State is admitted into the Union, it enjoys, by constitutional stipulation, an equality with the other States of the Union. And here I would ask the honorable Senator, if the constitution was formed by the people, as he alleges, and not by the States, how it happened to be provided, in that instrument, that the enlargement of the Union should be by the admission of States, and not of people, as such; and why the stipulation as to equality should have related to the States and not to the people? And, while on this point, I would ask him why the provision in that instrument, for its adoption, referred it to the States and not to the people; and why, under that provision, the little State of Delaware had as much weight in its adoption as the great State of Virginia?

FEB. 8, 1850.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

But, sir, I fear that I am fatiguing you and this honorable body; my object has been to show that the constitution was not, could not, have been formed by the people; that it must have been formed by the States; that the States acted as plenary sovereigns in forming it; that their sovereign character and individuality was not impaired by that instrument; that it is now administered by them in the character in which they made it, that of full and perfect sovereigns; that the constitution is nothing more nor less than a compact between sovereign States, who are parties to it; that the union of the States produced by it is more perfect than that which existed under the articles of confederation; and that its increased perfection consists mainly in the stipulation that the States may exert their joint legislative, executive, and judicial power upon the people of each. This is a stipulation of each with all the others, and of all the others with each; and this is the stipulation to which the illustrious Washington alluded when he spoke of the consolidation of the Union. But still, in this stipulation, the people are regarded as citizens, as collective bodies, constituting the States respectively. The States, in the joint exercise of power, through the agency of the General Government, must confine themselves to the powers stipulated in the bond of union—to the constitution; and in doing that they must consider the people as citizens of their respective States. Thus, the constitution provides that all trials for crime shall be in the State where the crime is alleged to have been committed; and so in the exercise of the power which allowed to Congress to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as shall be employed in the service of the United States, they are regarded as the militia of the States severally; and each State has the right to appoint the officers for its own militia. So, also, it is stipulated that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

Now, if I have been correct in my sentiments as to the process of forming a State, and as to the relation which the people of a State bear to each other, and their duties resulting from that relation to the State, and the obligation of the State to them; and as to the origin, extent, and character, of the sovereign power of a State, I think it will follow, that the sovereign power of a State is an unfit subject to be disposed of by judicial decision; and that the Supreme Court is an unfit tribunal to dispose of the sovereignty of the States; or, in the language of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] "to impose certain salutary restraints upon State sovereignties." It will follow, too, that his views and mine are loco carlo apart. He thinks that this is a consolidated Government. His denial that it was formed by the States, and assertion that it was formed by the people at large, cannot, whatever he may say upon that subject, be construed into any thing else than that this was a consolidated Government in its very formation. And the assertion of power which he has made for the Supreme Court, if it be sustained, must lead to the consolidation of the Government, if it were not before consolidated; so that, according to his notions, if we have not now, we must have, a consolidated Government. If it was formed by the people, it is so; if they did not make it so, the judges will; and, therefore, according to his propositions and arguments, there is no mode of escaping from a consolidation of the Government.

My hope is in the intelligence of the people of the States. I consider that they will never submit that the sovereign power of the States shall be narrowed down, controlled, or disposed of, by a quorum of the judges of the Supreme Court. They will discern the intrinsic unfitness of the sovereignty of their States for either forensic discussion or judicial decision, and oppose it with their suffrages, with the force of public opinion, and in whatever other way they may. We would deride with scorn and indignation any sovereign of Europe who would agree to submit the sovereignty of his State to the arbitrament of even neighboring sovereigns. How infinitely more exalted is the sovereignty of a State composed of free citizens! And how degrading is the idea that sovereignty, the sovereignty of free States, must be subjected to certain salutary restraints! Sir, the history of the world does not furnish an instance in which the sovereignty of a State was ever subjected to judicial decision; or to any other power than the God of Battles and the Lord of Hosts!

But allow me, sir, to inquire into the fitness of this tribunal for the exercise of the power asserted for it by the honorable Senator; and allow me to preface the inquiry by a few observations upon the nature of our Governments. I have thus far spoken much more about the States than about their governments. In the republics of our country, the great, the leading principle is, that the responsibility of the rulers, or public agents, shall be commensurate with the character and extent of the power confided to them. Our Governments are contrivances, or devices, by which the people govern themselves—by which the governed govern; ours are governments of laws. Indeed all free governments are of that character; and the great difficulty has always been to guard against, and check efficiently, the influence of the selfish principle (which is so deeply rooted in human nature) over those who are entrusted with making and administering the laws. Now when we regard the zeal and vigilance with which the States, in the formation of their respective constitutions, and in the formation of the General Government too, endeavored to check this selfish principle in their political agents, and render them responsible, we shall be slow to believe that it was their intention, when they formed the constitution of the United States, to confer upon the Judicial Department this transcendent and all absorbing power.

It is to secure against the influence of this selfish principle of our nature—that, in almost all the governments of the States, the members of the Legislative Department are elected for short periods—those of the Representative branch generally for one year, and those of the Senate for from two to four years, and the Governors for a like period. The election of the Representatives is annual, that they may be under the control of the people. The longer period allowed to the members of the Senate is, that they may not be deterred from checking any popular ebullitions, which might be displayed on the part of the House of Representatives; while, in turn, the members of the latter might check any aristocratical tendency on the part of the Senate. The Governor is invested with a qualified checking veto upon both branches, and is himself checked by allowing a defined concurrent power in both to overrule his veto; and he is further checked, and the better qualified to exercise his checking power, by being rendered ineligible, after a given period, to the gubernatorial chair. I speak of the checks provided by a majority of the States in their constitutions. I do not pretend to accuracy or precision as to the detailed provisions of any.

So, too, in the General Government, biennial elections were intended to secure the responsibility of the members of the House of Representatives, and thereby to check the influence of the selfish principle in the members. The members of the Senate are elected for six years, and by the Legislatures of the States, to check the tendency to consolidation which the gentleman advocates. The two Houses were so constituted as to check each other, and the President was to check and be checked by both. The States were reduced to the condition of perfect equipollence in the Senate, and thus the small were enabled to check the large States, in any attempts they might make to oppress the small.

Sir, on this part of the subject I do not pretend to minute exactness. It would be tedious, and is not required for my object, which is only to exhibit an outline of the

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

vigilance and solicitude displayed by the States, in their respective Governments, and in the General Government too, to guard against the influence of this selfish principle in those to whom political agency might be assigned. But I need but have referred you to the State and General Governments, without referring specially to any of their provisions on this subject. They exhibit abundant, almost redundant solicitude to guard the liberty of the people against misrule on the part of the Government. And think you, sir, that, after all this elaborate provision against misrule, the States could have intended to subject their Governments, and their self-governing power, together with the liberties of the people, to the discretion of an irresponsible and unchecked Judiciary? Who does not see that the only security the people have for their liberty, their lives, and their property, is in the protecting power of the sovereignty of their respective States? and that, when that sovereignty is subjected to the will of the Supreme Court, the people are subjected to the same tribunal; and that, after all their vigilance and caution, in guarding, by every conceivable check, against oppression from their rulers, they are, by this doctrine, to be subjected to the rule of a judicial aristocracy? to the rule of four men—a majority of that tribunal—who are unknown to them, except by the fame or the feeling of their encroachments upon State rights; whose tenure of power is for life, and irresponsible? And yet the Senator modestly tells us “that, if the truth must be told,” such was the intention of the people who framed the constitution.

Sir, if it be a truth, it had better not have been told. It is a truth worse than falsehood; or, if told, it should have been told many years ago. The gentleman, by the manner of telling it, seems to admit that it had been concealed. He treats it as one of those precious truths, which nothing but necessity could drag from its concealment—“if the truth must be told.” Must is a word which imports necessity. The necessity which produced this long concealed truth will, no doubt, in due course of time, come out, as a truth that must be told. The sentiment, whether it be a truth or not, lurked in every part of the first message of Mr. Adams. He did not feel that he must tell it in the message, and yet he could not conceal it. Perhaps the design was only to make such an implied presentation of it as might operate as an experiment upon the public feeling. If such was the design, they have mistaken the indications of public sentiment, unless I am greatly deceived, and yet it is announced with great confidence. The gentleman tells us that the States must submit to the judicial restraints upon their sovereignty, or incur by resistance the guilt of rebellion. That the decision of the Supreme Court affirming a palpably unconstitutional law, which invades the sovereignty of a State, must be submitted to by the State, or it must incur the guilt of rebellion.

Could the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance have been more explicitly urged? Has it ever been more zealously advocated, in any country? It is premature; the people of the States are not prepared for it yet. They are too well informed of their rights, and the principles upon which they depend, to be the dupes of that doctrine. There is scarcely a man in the community, who has participated at all in political discussion, that does not know that rebellion consists in the resistance of lawful authority; that the resistance of lawless authority is not a crime, but a virtue. That the only mode of escaping from oppression, is, by resisting the exercise of unlawful power. That patriotism requires such resistance. The citizens must, at their peril, distinguish between lawful and lawless power; and while they determine to retain their freedom, conform to the one, and oppose the other. It is a high duty, and full of peril; but, I repeat, it is the only condition on which liberty, the most precious gift of Heaven to man, can be enjoyed and maintained. The alternative is a hard one; it presents slavery, to which passive obedience and non-resistance leads, and liberty, which requires from its votaries a prompt obedience to all lawful requirements, and a bold and unflinching resistance to lawless encroachments.

Sir, it is, I must repeat, too soon for those who rule, or hope to rule, to address their arguments to our credulity and our fears; to deny us the intelligence to discern our rights, and the right to maintain them. Will the gentleman say that the States of Virginia and Kentucky, in the steps which they took to nullify the alien and sedition laws, were guilty of rebellion? Were their acts treasonable? If they were, then all the States were guilty of treason; at least, as accessories after the fact; for they all sanctioned, by the moral force of their opinion, the proceedings of the resisting States. But against whom did those States, or can any State, rebel? Rebellion means the resistance by an inferior of the lawful authority of a superior. It implies the violation of allegiance. To what power does a State owe allegiance? To what power is it subordinate? No one State owes allegiance to another; for if it did, that other would owe protection to it. Will the gentleman say that any such relation exists between the States? Or, will he say that a sovereign State can owe allegiance to any earthly power? I have attempted to prove that the States of this Union are equal; and have always been so, as well before as since the formation of the constitution; that the duties which they owe to each other under the constitution are pactional; and, if I have succeeded, then it is impossible that they can commit rebellion, or incur the guilt of treason, by any violation of their covenant relations with each other. But, sir, the idea that a sovereign State can commit treason, rebellion, or any crime whatever, is utterly inadmissible in the science of politics. The idea of crime cannot exist where there is no conceivable or possible tribunal before which the culprit could be arraigned and convicted.

Still less, sir, can any State be supposed to incur the guilt of rebellion or treason, by resisting an unconstitutional law of the General Government, or an unconstitutional decision of the Supreme Court, upon a valid law of Congress. The General Government is the creature of the States—the offspring of their sovereign power. And will the gentleman say that the creator shall be governed by the lawless authority of the creature? Will he invert the rule of reason and of law, upon that subject, and say that it is the superior that incurs guilt, by resisting the inferior, and not the inferior, by resisting the superior?

But the threats which are brandished against States, or even individuals, who shall oppose the encroachment of the General Government upon the States, are uncalled for, and can only have the effect to provoke illegal resistance, or to awe into a degrading submission. If the States are true to themselves, and faithful in the discharge of their high duties, they will move on in the majesty of their sovereign power, and maintain, with a steady and equal hand, both their governments, by restraining each, in the exercise of its legitimate powers, within its appropriate sphere. They will not incur the Supreme Court with the exercise of this restraining power. In their hands it would not be a restraining, it would be an absorbing power.

This epithet of supremacy, [said Mr. R.] which is so unceasingly applied to that court, is calculated to swell the volume of their power, in the minds of the unthinking. Its supremacy is entirely relative, and imports only that appellate and corrective jurisdiction which it may exercise over the subordinate courts of the General Government. The appellate court of every State is just as supreme as it is; and in the same way, and for the same reasons. It is not supreme in reference to the other departments of the Government; nor has it any supremacy in reference to the States; and yet the gentleman will have it that this Supreme Court, which derives its title of supremacy from its control over the proceedings of inferior judicial tribunals, shall control and restrain the Supreme Courts of the States, and the States themselves. That the mere modicum of judicial power which they are permitted by the States to exercise, shall be exerted to control them in the exercise of their sovereign power.

Sir, I deny that it was the intention of the States, in the formation of the constitution, to invest that tribunal with the power of doing any political act whatever. The power accorded to that court was purely judicial, and was intended to be so. If it had been intended that they should exercise the political power, which is not asserted for them, its exercise would have been subjected to some checks, to some responsibility. It cannot be reasonably supposed that, after subjecting the exercise of political power by all the other functions of the Government, to judicious and well devised checks, it was intended to subject all to the unchecked and irresponsible power of this court. But, upon this point, I have given my opinions in a previous part of my argument. I must, however, be permitted to say, that the judges, in the States, as well as in the General Government, even in reference to the exercise of their mere judicial powers, are left by the constitutions dangerously irresponsible. The independence of the Judiciary has, in my opinion, been greatly misconceived. Sir, the true independence of the judges consists in their dependence upon, and responsibility to, the people. The surest exemption from dependence upon any is independence upon all. In free governments, we have nothing more stable than the will of the people. To be independent of that, is to rebel against the principles of free government. It is a dependence upon, and a conscious responsibility to, the will of the people, that will best secure the judge from local, partial, and personal influences. But on what principle should those who administer the laws be less responsible to the people than those who make them? The laws operate as they are expounded, not as they are made. It is in the exposition of them that they operate oppressively; and all responsibility is to secure against oppression. But there can be no oppression, or scarcely any, without the consent of the judges. The judges are irresponsible, and the people are every where oppressed? But I hold it to be universally true that all power which may be irresponsibly exercised will be exercised oppressively. It has always been so; it always will be so: for the judges are but men.

But to return to the judges of the Supreme Court. They are authorized "to take jurisdiction of all causes in law and equity, arising under the constitution, laws of Congress, and treaties made pursuant to it;" and that constitution, together with the treaties, and the laws of Congress made pursuant to it, are to be the "supreme law of the land." This is their power; and this the character and force of the constitution, laws of Congress, and treaties. Now, suppose there shall exist, between two of the States, a dispute, as to territorial boundary, and the Congress shall pass a law giving the disputed territory to one of the contending States; and suppose the judges shall affirm the validity of this law: must the State whose territory has been thus invaded and taken from it by Congress, submit to the decision, or incur the guilt of rebellion? Is that to be the practical operation of the gentleman's doctrine? Or, suppose the territorial boundary of any one of the States shall be altered by treaty, and a portion of its territory transferred to a foreign Power, and the Supreme Court were to decide that the treaty was constitutional, must the State thus dismembered acquiesce, or, by resisting, be denounced as a rebel? And would the gentleman assert that this operation was merely imposing a salutary restraint upon State sovereignty? Now, sir, I deny that the power to declare a law of Congress, or of any of the States, unconstitutional, was ever conferred, or intended to be conferred, upon the judiciary of any of the States, or of the General Government, as a direct substantive power. The exercise of this power is incidental to the exercise of the mere judicial power which was conferred. The validity of a law, involved by a case, may be incidentally decided, in deciding the law and justice of the case. But the decision must be made with an eye to the law and justice of the case, and not in reference to the just or unjust exercise of the legislative power which was exerted in making the law. Not in the view to check, control, or restrain the legislative power. It must be given in the exercise of merely a judicial, and not of political power.

Thus exercising its jurisdiction, the court would command the respect and confidence of the people as a judicial tribunal. But when it merges its appropriate judicial, in an assumed political character; when it exchanges its ermine for the woollack and the mace, and asserts its right to impose restraints upon the sovereignty of the States, it should be treated as a usurper, and driven back by the States within its appropriate judicial sphere. It is due from the States to their own self-respect, and the just rights of their citizens, to assert that they are competent to decide upon every question involving their own sovereignty; and that, to neglect to maintain it, would be to renounce the character in which they formed the constitutional compact of union. That the maintenance of its own sovereignty unimpaired, by each of the States, is essential to the liberty of the people, and to the preservation of the Union, and that, to submit their sovereignty to the control of the judiciary, would be to substitute a judicial oligarchy for the free institutions employed for self-government by the people.

All the purposes for which civil society was instituted would be defeated in the control of the States by the judiciary. Nothing less than sovereign power is competent to the management of the concerns of a State, and nothing less was pledged by the States, in the social compact, for the protection of the people. The State cannot redeem this pledge, if it shall be controlled by the judiciary. The judiciary will govern, and not the State: for that power that governs those who govern, governs those who are governed; and how can a State protect its citizens from oppression, if it is itself liable to be oppressed by their oppressor? So that a State is under a political necessity to vindicate its sovereignty from any salutary restraints which the Supreme Court may attempt to inflict upon it, by resistance, or whatever means it may.

For security against oppression from abroad, we look to the sovereign power of the United States, to be exerted according to the compact of union; for security against oppression from within, or domestic oppression, we look to the sovereign power of the State. Now, all sovereigns are equal: the sovereignty of the State is equal to that of the Union: for the sovereignty of each is but a moral person. That of the State and that of the Union are each a moral person, and in that respect precisely equal. In physical force, the latter greatly transcends the former; but, in essential sovereignty, they are not only naturally but necessarily equal: just as the sovereignty of the State of Delaware is equal to that of New York, or of Russia, though the physical power of those sovereignties are vastly different.

The unrestrained exercise of the sovereign power of the Union is necessary to all the purposes of the Union; and is it not as necessary that the sovereign power of the State should be unrestrained, as to all domestic purposes? and can any reason be assigned why the latter, more than the former, should be restrained by the Supreme Court? No reason can exist for the restraint of the one, that does not equally apply to the other. But, in truth, the idea of controlling a sovereign State is so inconceivable that I do not know in what terms to combat it.

SENATE.]

Mr. Foote's Resolution.

I must be indulged in some further inquiries in relation to the unfitness of the judges of the Supreme Court for the exercise of this controlling power over the sovereignty of the States, which the Senator from Massachusetts has asserted for them. What is there belonging to that court which can, in the contemplation of sober reason, entitle it to the exercise of that transcendent and all-absorbing power? Are the judges peculiarly gifted, and exempt from the frailties incident to human nature? Are they, and will they always be, pure and infallible? Will they always be free from the influence of the selfish principle, against which all free States have so sedulously endeavored to guard in their constitutions? On the contrary, are they not, will they not always be, subject to those impulses of ambition, those prejudices and partialities, which are uniformly displayed by those who are at all concerned in the discussion or decision of political questions? I have no reference to the present incumbents: they are, some of them, talented, and all respectable men; they have my respect, and if they possessed the power of controlling sovereigns, they ought to be worshipped, because their likeness has never existed beneath the sun. But I would ask again, if any reasonable man can suppose that there is more safety to the rights of the Union, or of the States, in the wisdom and patriotism of the seven men who compose that court, than in the wisdom and patriotism of the million and a half of people who compose the State of New York, or even the fifty or sixty thousand who compose the little State of Delaware? Must the saying of the wise man be reversed in favor of that court? Is it no longer true that "there is safety in a multitude of counsel?"

Does the gentleman pretend to have discovered that the converse of the proposition is true? I am sure that he will prefer no such pretensions, for it has been long the known belief of aristocrats, of monarchs, and of despots. With them, it has been, and always will be, a cherished truth, a truth sustained by their votaries, and enforced by themselves, at all times, and every where. The monarch who proclaimed that "there was safety in a multitude of counsel" did not himself act upon the principle which he avowed. This principle, so dear to republics, was asserted under the inspiration of that wisdom which distinguished the monarch of Judea from all other men, of that wisdom which is from above. May I not conclude, then, that no argument in favor of the power asserted for that court can justly be drawn from the paucity of its numbers? and that every argument which can be drawn from the number of the judges is against confiding to them a control over the States? Sir, if we refer to what may always be supposed to be the wisdom, purity, and patriotism of the judges of that court, we cannot suppose that there will ever be a time when even the smallest State in the Union will not have, engaged in administering its Government, a much greater number of men, any of whom will, in these respects, be the equals of the judges. They will not only be their equals in patriotism, intelligence, and integrity, but greatly their superiors in an intimate practical acquaintance with the condition of the people, their habits, manners, customs, wants, and enjoyments. And, in addition to these, there will always be in the State a great many citizens, as enlightened and as pure as either of the judges, or the State functionaries, whose vigilance will be employed in checking the officials, and restraining them within the sphere of their duty.

And, let me ask, if the enlightened functionaries of the State, and its enlightened citizens, will not always be as much interested in the correct administration of the Governments, General and State, in the happiness of the people, and in the perpetuity and prosperity of the Union, as those same judges can be supposed to be? By what reason, then, can it be supposed the framers of the constitution were influenced, to have accorded such power to the judges? It is not expressly given in the constitution: it is presumed to have been given by implication. But how can we obtain the power by implication from that instrument, unless we can reasonably suppose that those who framed it meant to confer it? But, when we consider that this court forms one department of the Government, which Government is supposed to have encroached upon the sovereignty of a State, can we believe that the States, in forming the constitution, intended to arm the court with the power of deciding upon the legitimacy of its own encroachments? with the power of conserving its own usurpations by its own decisions? A law of Congress, made in pursuance of the constitution, is admitted, on all sides, to be supreme, and will be acquiesced in and conformed to by the States. The question is, whether a law in violation of the constitution is supreme, or can be made so by the court? Whether a State cannot form an opinion as to its invalidity, and interpose its veto, where its operation goes to deprive the State of its sovereign power? I contend that neither weakness nor idiocy can be ascribed to a sovereign State; and, therefore, that a State may both think and act in the maintenance of its sovereignty.

Who ever before thought that one of the parties to a contest was a competent judge of the matter in dispute? For, although the General Government was no party to the constitutional compact of union—that having been formed by the States, who are the only parties to it—yet the Government, which was created by that compact, when it encroaches upon the sovereign power of a State, may justly be considered, quoad the dispute, as a party to the contest with the State, and, therefore, unfit to decide the matter in controversy. The case, it would seem to me, need not be stated to secure, with all intelligent men, the reprobation of the doctrine contended for on the part of the court. Even in a contest between school children, about their toys, or their amusements, neither will agree to let the other decide the matter in dispute. Sir, who does not perceive that the specification of the powers to be exercised by the General Government was entirely useless, if it was intended that those who were to exercise them were to be the exclusive and final judges of the extent and legitimacy of their exercise?

But the power asserted for the court, by the honorable Senator, is unreasonable in other views. If, then, those who formed the constitution had intended to invest this tribunal with the political power of checking and regulating the Legislative and Executive Departments of the General Government, and of imposing certain salutary restraints upon the sovereignties of the States, they would not only have expressed that intention, but would have adopted and suited the forms of the constitution to the full and efficient exercise of that power. Have they done so? This question must be answered in the negative by all who have paid the slightest attention to the specification of the powers, allowed to be exercised by the General Government, and to the powers reserved to be exercised by the States. Let us suppose that the House of Representatives were to refuse to permit the members, or a portion of them, from a particular State, to take their seats in the legislative hall of Congress: and suppose the Senate were to do the like, in relation to the Senators from any one of the States; or that any one of the States, or even a majority of them, were to refuse to elect Senators to Congress, or that a State were to make a treaty with a foreign Power, or were to coin money; or let us suppose, further, that a person charged in any one of the States with treason, felony, or other crime, were to flee to another, and that other were to refuse, upon the demand of the Executive authority of the State from which he fled, to deliver him up, to be removed for trial to the State having jurisdiction of the crime: by what forms of the constitution can the judicial power of the United States interfere in any of these cases, or in a hundred others which might be named? Sir, this mighty State conserving power will be found, when subjected to the scrutiny of reason, to consist more in the fancy of those who are desirous to see one splendid central government supply the place of the sovereign States, than in the nature and genius of our Governments, or in the intention of the States in forming the constitutional compact of union. And the great error which lies at the root of this monstrous doctrine, is in the erroneous supposition that the States, when they formed the constitution, divested themselves of, and delegated to, the General Government, all the sovereign power which may be rightly exercised by the latter, and that they are less sovereign by so much power as may be thus exercised. That this sovereign power, so delegated by the constitution, is mysteriously lodged in that instrument, and exercised by the General Government in virtue of that lodgment. Sir, let me just say that sovereign power is an article that will not keep cold. Others think that this power abides in the functionaries of the Government, and almost all believe, that, let it be lodged where it may, it is out of the States and belongs to the General Government. That those who formed the constitution cut the sovereignty of each State into two parts, and gave much the largest portion to the General Government. I hope that I have, in a previous part of my argument, sufficiently refuted these erroneous, and, as I think, mischievous notions, and proved that sovereignty cannot exist in a divided state; that its unity and its life are inseparable; and let me here add, that you might as well divide the human will: we can conceive of ten thousand diversities of its operation, but we cannot conceive of its separation into parts, neither can we conceive of the separation of sovereignty. It is the will of civil society; which society is a person whose will, in all its modes of operation, like the will of a human being, cannot, without destroying the person, be divided or separated into parcels: for then it will be extinguished, not divided.

But, I may be asked, to what tribunal I would refer a question, involving the sovereign power of a State? I answer, most certainly not to the assailable of that power, not to the General Government, which shall have usurped it, and still less to the judicial department of that Government. And in my turn, I would ask to what tribunal should be referred an encroachment by the Supreme Court upon the sovereign power of a State: for that court cannot only affirm an unconstitutional law, which assails the sovereignty of a State, but it can, by construction, (as we have in too many instances seen) give an unconstitutional efficacy to a perfectly constitutional law. It can, as we have seen, usurp the exercise of legislative power, and under the denomination of rules of court, make laws under which the citizens of a State may be imprisoned contrary to law. Sir, the Congress have been obliged to interpose to prevent the exercise of this usurped power of the judges over the citizens of at least one of the States; I mean the State of Kentucky. And now, sir, the power of that State to legislate over its own soil, awaits upon the docket the decision of that tribunal.

But suppose the Congress, instead of restraining, as it did, the judges of that court, from incarcerating the citizens under color of their rules of court, and contrary to the laws of the State, had refused to interfere; to what tribunal must the State have appealed for the protection of her citizens against lawless incarceration? The honorable Senator would say, to the Supreme Court; to that very tribunal which had committed the outrage. I answer emphatically, no. The sovereign power of the State should have been exerted for the protection of its own citizens. It can and ought to refuse to the court the use of its prisons, for purposes so oppressive of its citizens, and subversive of its sovereign power. It ought to exert its own governmental machinery to the extent of all their attitudes, and of its own power, to protect its own citizens against aggressions so lawless and so enormous.

In such a case, the State should appeal to its own sovereign power, and decide for itself. Indeed, in every case involving its sovereignty, it must do so, or renounce its sovereign character. Whether it shall exert its self-protecting power, through the organs of its government, or through a convention, or by what other means it may, will depend upon the character of the aggression. Every State must speak its will through one or the other of those mediums. It may use the former or employ the latter, according to its own opinion of their respective fitness for the urgency.

And what, you will ask me, will be the result of this resistance by a State, of an unconstitutional law of Congress, or an unconstitutional decision of the Supreme Court? I answer, that the first result will be, the preservation of the sovereignty of the State, and of the liberty of its citizens, at least for a time. The next result will be, that the attention of the people of the other States will be awakened to the aggression, and the Congress, or the Supreme Court, which ever shall have been the aggressor, will be driven back, into the sphere of its legitimacy, by the rebuking force of public opinion. Such was the result of the nullifying resolutions of the States of Virginia and Kentucky, in relation to the alien and sedition laws. And such was the rebuking effect of public opinion in relation to the famous compensation law.

But if these results should not follow, you ask me what next? Must the State forbear to resist the aggression upon her sovereignty, and submit to be shorn of it altogether? I answer, no, sir, no; that she must maintain her sovereignty by every means within her power. She is good for nothing, even worse than good for nothing, without it. This, you will tell me, must lead to civil war. To war between the General Government and the resisting State. I answer, not at all, unless the General Government shall choose to consecrate its usurpations by the blood of those it shall have attempted to oppress. And if the States shall be led, by apprehensions of that kind, to submit to encroachments upon their sovereignties, they will most certainly not remain sovereigns long. Fear is a bad counselor, of even an individual; it should never be consulted by a sovereign State.

No, sir, it is in the power of Congress, instead of shedding the blood of the citizens, who assert the sovereignty of their State and resist its prostration, to refer the question to an infinitely more exalted tribunal than the Supreme Court. I mean to the States of this Union. They formed the constitution, they are fit judges of questions involving sovereignty, being themselves sovereigns. The fifth article of the constitution provides for the case. It reads thus: "The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary to propose amendments to this constitution, &c. &c. which when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, (not of the people at large, but of the States) shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of this constitution." Three-fourths of the States constitute the august tribunal to which Congress can refer the question. To this tribunal the State can have no objection, because it was created by the constitutional compact; because the power of amending the constitution was accorded to it in that compact.

I state the case thus: The powers which the States, in their constitutional compact, have allowed the General Government to exercise, are special. The agents of the United States, in the exercise of those special powers, have, as one of the States alleges, transcended their specific limits, and infringed upon their sovereignty. The State resists the exercise of the power of which it complains, as unauthorized by any stipulation in the compact, and as incompatible with its own rights and duties as a sovereign. The agents, as functionaries of the General Government, say that the exercise of the obnoxious power is within their legitimate competency; but rather than be thought fastidiously nice, or perversely obstinate, modestly propose that the Supreme Court shall decide the matter. The State replies that it cannot, without violating every principle of congruity and self-respect, submit any question, in relation to its own sovereignty, to any portion of the subalterns of the States. That it is itself, in virtue of its sovereignty, the judge of its own rights, and bound as a sovereign to maintain them. That while a sovereign State cannot decently be supposed to violate the clear rights of the General Government, it cannot reasonably be required to surrender its own obvious rights to the assertion of dubious powers on the part of that Government. That the right of sovereignty in the State is clear and unquestionable. That the right, under the alleged authority of which its sovereignty has been assailed, if it exist at all, must exist in specific grant. That the denial of its legitimate existence by a sovereign State ought to induce the General Government either to abstain from exercising it, or to call upon the States to remove all doubt about its legitimacy, in an amendment to the constitution, by the concurrent vote of three-fourths of their number.

Let me urge that this reply of the State is very reasonable, infinitely more so than the proposition on the part of the General Government, to which it is made. For if the power in question does not exist in the constitution, and is believed to be necessary for any of the great objects of the Union, the States will, by an amendment to the constitution, accord its exercise to the General Government. Or if its existence in the constitution is dubious, they will, by an amendment couched in explicit terms, remove all doubt; and thus, sir, the Government will avoid the tumult, confusion, and, perhaps, bloodshed, which might be connected with any attempt on the part of the General Government to divest a State of its sovereignty, and subdue it by force into vassalage. This is the course which the General Government ought to take in a question between itself and a sovereign State, in relation to the sovereignty of the latter, and the legitimacy of the power exerted by itself, in derogation of that sovereignty.

I say that Congress should take this course—that Congress should make the appeal to the tribunal of the States, because it claims to exercise a special power, and reason requires that, when the existence of the power, or the legitimacy of its exercise, is questioned by a sovereign State, it should be able to show its authority free from all doubt. It is upon rational principle that, in all Governments, courts of special and limited jurisdiction are required to accompany their acts with the authority by which they were done; and their doings, unless their power to act is clearly shown, are considered as lawless and void. Sir, this principle limits the exercise of all special powers, whether legislative, executive, or judicial. A common corporation, chartered by a State, must be able to show in its charter an explicit authority for whatever power it claims to exercise, and its acts are void, unless its power to do them is explicitly granted in its charter. If the power under which it claims to act be dubious, instead of persisting to act, it must obtain from the Legislature an amendment of its charter, or abandon its claim to the power of acting quoad. Now all the reasons which apply to the smallest corporation, in relation to its chartered powers, apply with equal, with increased force, to the Government of the United States, and to the constitution, its charter. It is a stupendous corporation, and becomes fearful in powers, when it claims for its judicial department the exclusive right of legalizing, by its decisions, the encroachments made by itself upon the sovereignty of the States. The constitution is its charter. Its powers are special and limited. To be safely exercised, they must be confined within the clear limits of the charter. If those limits may be transcended, all limitation was useless. If dubious powers may be exercised and enforced, then specification was useless. It is upon this principle that officers of Government, before they can do any official act, must exhibit their commissions—their authority. No man occupies a seat in this body, without having exhibited a clear title to it; and it might as reasonably be urged that he could take his seat by force, without exhibiting title, or upon a doubtful title, as that the General Government shall exert by force a non-existing or dubious power. If a doubt had existed in the title of the honorable Senator to a seat in this body, he would have to go back and get his title so amended as to remove all doubt, before he could occupy his seat. So the Congress, in relation to the exercise of even a doubtful power, should go back to the States, and obtain, by an amendment of their title, a removal of all doubt as to its legitimacy.

But another reason why Congress, and not the injured and resisting State should make the appeal to the tribunal of the States, is, that an appeal by the State, would be as unavailing as it would be unwise. A majority of the States have passed the obnoxious and questionable law complained of by the State. The State therefore cannot make the appeal efficiently; the Congress can. The State cannot do more than she has done. She must only poise herself upon her sovereignty, and resist its prostration. The Congress can do more. It can appeal to and obtain from the States an explicit decision of the question. And if it shall fail to make the appeal, and obtain the decision of that tribunal affirming its power, it should decline all further attempts to exert it. But again, the State is acknowledged to be a sovereign, and its sovereignty is acknowledged to be necessary to the liberty of its citizens, and its own existence as a State. Its power is primitive, clear, and certain. That of the Government by which it is assailed is derivative and doubtful; can any reasonable man say that the former should yield to the latter, upon any other principle than that the latter is as abundant in force as it is deficient in right? Reason itself would say, that the natural state of things should remain unaltered, unless the authority for removing or altering them shall be full, clear, and legitimate.

Throughout this debate the States have been treated as restless, querulous, impatient, disorganizing beings. It seems to have been taken for granted that they are either too dull to comprehend the provisions of the constitution, or too unprincipled to observe and maintain them. That the zeal to maintain the Union and support the constitution, by which it was formed, is exclusively with the functionaries of the General Government, that the States feel none of. Now, let us examine into this matter a little. All intelligent men act from motive. The States that formed the Union were composed of intelligent men. The motives which led to the formation of the constitution were, to promote the happiness, tranquillity, liberty, and security, of the people of the States. In furtherance of these great objects, the States agreed, in that instrument, to exert their sovereign power jointly, in making war, peace, and treaties, and levying money, and regulating commerce, &c. Their powers were to be exerted through the agency of the General Government. Now, can it be supposed that the motives which led to the formation of the Union have ceased to exist—have evaporated? That the people of the States are less inclined to be happy, tranquil, prosperous, secure, and free, now, than they were when the Union was formed? Or that their perceptions of its utility are less distinct and strong now, than its beneficial effects have been experienced, than they were then, when its beneficial effects were only anticipated? The States made the constitution, and formed a more perfect Union, under the conviction that it was needed. Have occurrences since that time been calculated to prove that their convictions of its utility and necessity were erroneous? Have they given any indications to that effect?

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

I believe not. On the contrary, they have evinced, from the period of its formation, up till this very moment in which I am speaking, no sentiment in relation to any subject, so strongly as that of an affectionate regard for, and devotion to, the Union. Why then this iniquitude about the Union? Why is the gentleman inspired at this time with such a devotion to its consolidation? There was a time, during the late war, when some zeal on that subject was felt; but at that time, the reasons for it were apparent to all. For myself I regard it as the union of twenty-four sovereign States, and rely more upon their intelligence and zeal for its support and continuance, than I do upon the power of the Supreme Court, or the inordinate zeal of any given number of politicians. It is upon the people of the States, and not upon the politicians, that solid reliance is to be placed for the continuance and just operation of all our institutions. They will maintain and vindicate the Union, not for the purpose of imposing certain salutary restraints upon the sovereignty of the States but for the high purposes and objects for which it was formed. Utility was the object for which it was formed; and while it subserves that purpose, it will be maintained. But when purposes of splendor and magnificence, of pageantry and parade, shall supersede those for which it was formed; whenever it shall be supposed that the sovereign States of which it is composed must be whipped by the patriotic functionaries of the General Government into the support of it; whenever its continuance shall be made to depend upon the power of the Supreme Court, exerted in subduing to its support the sovereign States; whenever the compact of Union shall be so construed as to give to the General Government the right of deciding upon the validity of its own encroachments upon the sovereignties of the States; and, let me add, whenever the States cease to maintain their sovereignty, and their own competency to maintain it against the encroachments of the General Government, then, indeed, will the duration of this Union become problematical.

We should never forget that the greatest good, when perverted, becomes the greatest evil. The Union, while it continues to be what it was when it was formed, and what it was intended it should continue to be, an Union of free, sovereign, and independent States, will be considered by the States as the greatest conceivable political good; and for the maintenance and support of which the people of the States would, when the occasion should demand it, pour out their blood like water. But, even in their high estimation of it, they do not hold it as the greatest good. There is one still better, still more precious, which they rate infinitely higher. It is their liberty; and for the people to be free, the States must be free; and no State can be free, the sovereignty of which is subject to the control of another—is subject to certain restraints, however salutary, imposed by the judicial department of another Government. But, I feel confident that, while ever the Union conduces to the maintenance of the freedom of the States, the people of the States will maintain it; and whenever it shall be made the instrument of tyranny and oppression, they will cast it off and form one more perfect. That is, if they retain the spirit of freedom: if they do not, it matters but little what kind of Government they have.

And, indeed, upon the doctrine of the honorable Senator, relative to the power of the Supreme Court over the sovereignty of the States, I cannot see what is to prevent a perfect consolidation of the Government, and consequent monarchy or despotism. We have now, if he is right, a fearful oligarchy. Nothing but the forbearance of that tribunal can save us: we are denied the right of saving ourselves. The States must yield obedience to their sovereign mandate; must doff their sovereignty at the nod of the Judges. They cannot interpose their veto, but must submit to any salutary restraints which the Judges may choose to inflict upon their sovereignties. Sir, the power of imperial Rome, in her proudest days, was not superior to that asserted by the gentleman for the Supreme Court, nor were the humblest of her provinces in a condition more abject than that of these States, according to his doctrine.

The conquests of Rome were achieved at an incalculable expense of blood and treasure. But this tribunal may vassal twenty-four sovereign States, without shedding one drop of blood, or expending one dollar of money. A single curia advisare nullo will do the business.

Now, sir, what is the condition of the States? They are not to resist encroachments upon their own sovereignty: resistance with them is crime. The Congress will not resist encroachments made by the Judiciary upon State sovereignty, because that encroachment is but a salutary restraint, and because the decision of the court may, and no doubt often will, be but an affirmance of encroachment by the legislative department of the General Government; so that, sooner or later, State rights will be named only to point a sarcasm, or to excite a smile of derision. Indeed, a smile of that kind may even now be seen mantling upon the face of some gentlemen when that subject is named. Sir, these rights are exercised by the States in relation to subjects within their own territorial limits, and in a manner so little imposing as to attract but little attention from without. The exercise of them is as obscure as it is beneficial. A State, in regulating its domiciliary concerns, exerts its sovereign power without its exterior trappings; without the usual lustre and imposing glare of national sovereignty. It never appears in court dress. It has no navy, no army, no diplomacy, no boundless revenue. In relation to all these subjects, the sovereign power of each is exercised jointly with that of the others. The General Government, through whose agency the sovereign power of the States jointly is exerted, in relation to all these subjects, without having any national characteristic, without being more than a mere fiduciary for the States, is surrounded with the splendors and the patronage of a nation. And there is reason to apprehend that there are many influenced by appearances, not less disposed to ascribe to it unqualified power, than some of its functionaries are to assume and exercise it.

But the whole argument of the gentleman has gone upon the predication that the States are to be kept in order by coercion only. That, but for the controlling power of the Supreme Court, they would transcend their appropriate spheres, and usurp the powers assigned by the constitution to the General Government. Now, sir, in what instance, I would ask, has any State displayed such a disposition? What exertion of power, by any one of them, since the formation of the constitution, has been of that character? When did any one of the States attempt to make a treaty with a foreign Power, or with any of the other States? Has any of them attempted to make war, to coin money, to regulate commerce, to grant letters of marque and reprisal, to erect a navy, to raise and support armies? or to do any other act, or exercise any of the great powers separately, which they had agreed in the constitution to exercise jointly? Has any State failed to send its proportion of members to the House of Representatives, or its two members to the Senate of the United States; or denied full faith and credit to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of the other States? No State has violated, or attempted to violate, the constitution, in any of these particulars. I mention them, because in no one of them could the Judiciary have interposed its restraining power, even if it were possessed by that department to the extent contended for. It could not, by the forms of the constitution, have reached any one of the cases, by any conceivable exertion of its power. What, then, restrained the States from violating the constitution, in any of the particulars which I have enumerated? If they are as prone to transcend the limits of their power as they are represented to be, one would think that, in the course of fifty years, some instance of violation must have occurred. No, sir, the security of the constitution from inroads upon it by the States, is to be found in that wisdom which is always associated with sovereignty. If the confluent will and the concentrated wisdom of the people who compose a State, is not to be confided in, on what else under Heaven, I ask, can confidence be placed? That will is necessarily pure, because it is the will of the people; not as people, but as citizens. It is the will of all in relation to each, and of no one in relation to himself specially; and there is not a man, or set of men, on earth, who, if they can be freed from selfish influences, will not act justly. Sir, that is the condition of the citizens of the States; their sentiments are all of that character; they are discolored in their operation by the selfish influences of the political fiduciaries through whose agency they take effect; and this discoloration, which is produced by the functionaries, is charged upon the citizens. It is the functionaries, then, and not the citizens, who are to be feared; and those of the General Government not less than those of the States; and with both, those are most to be feared who are least responsible to the citizens; and, therefore, the judiciary is more to be dreaded than any other department. What motives, let me repeat, can the States have, to weaken or destroy the Union? They formed it, and, after all, they have the power of maintaining or destroying it. It lives in the breath of their nostrils; in their intelligence; in their affections; and their conscious need of it. It was not formed by them under the coercive influence of the Supreme Court; it was the offspring of the unrestrained and unconstrained sovereignties of the States. Sir, the doctrine contended for is parricidal: it is for the destruction of the parent by its offspring: it is not the doctrine of Jefferson, or Madison, or Hamilton. But I am averse from quotation; a doctrine should be approved or reprobated, not because it has, or has not, the sanction of this or that distinguished man, but because it is intrinsically right or wrong. I am opposed to the government of living men, still more of the dead. Our government should be that of laws, through the agency only of men. Every civil society, large enough to constitute and maintain itself as a State, should govern itself by its own will, through the medium of such devices as its wisdom shall select. It should act jointly with its associates, in reference to foreign objects, and separately in reference to its interior concerns; but it should maintain its sovereignty by all means, and at all hazards: for there is not, in the catalogue of evils, a single one so much to be deprecated by a State as the prostration of its sovereignty: it is the loss of their liberty, to the people who compose it.

Sir, I fear I have fatigued you and the Senate; the only apology I can offer is, the importance of the subject which I have endeavored to discuss. I view the State sovereignties as the sheet anchor of the Union. I look to the States, and not to the Supreme Court, for its strength and perpetuity. I view the doctrine asserted by the gentleman as greatly more dangerous to this Union than the Hartford Convention, or the war, through which it so gloriously passed.

Sir, there is no danger of the States flying off from the Union; you may possibly drive them off, by attempting to prostrate their sovereignty, and make them vassals of the Supreme Court, or provinces of the General Government; but, left in the undisturbed enjoyment of their own sovereign rights, they will cling to the Union as the rock of their safety, and adhere to it until time itself shall have grown old.

I cannot close without expressing my concurrence in the sentiments so eloquently and forcibly expressed by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAYNE] in relation to the public lands. The Union would not, in my opinion, be weakened, but strengthened, by his mode of disposing of them; upon his plan, you would have farms where you have now a wilderness, freeholders where you have now day-laborers; and the abjection of poverty would be exchanged for the pride and patriotism of proprietorship. Sir, the strength of the Union is in the number and patriotism of the people of the sovereign States which compose it; and the wealth of the States consists in the productive industry of their citizens. Now, the strongest incentive to agricultural industry consists in the consciousness of each citizen that he is the proprietor of the soil which he cultivates. Let the public lands, then, be sold, not given, at a price which aims rather at multiplying freeholders, than at increasing the revenue, as the primary object of selling them. Another motive with the United States to sell the public lands at a very moderate price, should be to strengthen the weak and more exposed parts of the country. Emigrants should find in the reduced price of the lands, strong motives to settle, and thereby strengthen those weak and exposed parts. But the great, the paramount motive with me, to sell the public lands at the very lowest price, would be to release the States in which they lie from their dependence upon the General Government; and the other States from the degradation of soliciting, of supplicating Congress, for donations of them. The States should have the eventual or transcendental right of sovereigns to the soil within their limits.

Every policy which has a tendency to humiliate the States, either by force or seduction, should, in my opinion, be deprecated. It is a tendency towards the consolidation of the Government, and the slavery of the people. Revenue, for the same reasons, should not be unnecessarily accumulated in the public treasury. The money, not needed by the Government, should not be exacted from the people. It should be left in their pockets; there it increases the incentives to industry, and the facilities to reward it. When the treasury of a monarch overflows, his subjects bleed: for war is the game at which monarchs delight to play, when they have money to bet. When the revenues of a republic are redundant, speculation, fraud, and corruption, nestle about the treasury. Among free governments, that is the best which promotes the happiness, and protects the rights, of the people, at the least expense. The people get their money by labor: whatever the Government takes of it, more than is necessary to pay the just expenses of its administration, is, to the extent of the excess, an infliction of slavery upon them. Revenue beyond the necessary expenses of this Government can only be necessary for purposes of consolidation—not of the Union, but of the Government.

A word upon the road-making power of the Government, or rather upon the expediency of the exercise of that power, by this Government: for the State of Kentucky has, for the present, silenced the question with me as to the power. I am an instruction man, and will speak the sentiment of my State, according to its instructions, without inquiring into the reasons by which it was influenced in giving those instructions. I cannot, however, repress the expression of my fears that there is more of seduction in the captivating terms by which this system is designated, than there will be of solid, practical utility in its process and results—"The American System." These are words of magic potency with those who do not examine into their import, into the operation and effect of what they mean. If they are construed to mean the exercise of any power, not expressly allowed by the States to be exercised by the General Government, then their import sanctions usurpation; then the constitution ceases to be alone the bond of union. If they mean that the powers of the Union, instead of being exerted for the States, and for the great objects contemplated by the States, shall be exerted within each State, then, it behooves the States to inquire into the cui bono, into the policy of it. It behooves them to inquire whether the money expended in making roads in each State is the money of that State, collected from the people of it, or is the money of, and collected from, the people of another, to make roads in that State. Each State should then inquire of itself whether it would be willing to be taxed for the purpose of making roads in another State. The people of Massachusetts would not be so much enamored with the American System as they are, if they understood it to mean that they should be taxed to make roads in Kentucky; nor would the people of Kentucky admire it greatly, when, by its operation, they were taxed to make roads in the State of Massachusetts, and so with the other States. Each would refuse to surrender the surplus produce of its labor, to embellish with fine roads and canals the surface of another State. Well, when they understand it to be nothing more than the exercise of a power by the General Government, in taxing the people of each State, and collecting the money from them, to make roads for them, in their own State, they will say that the power of the State is competent to collect this money, and to make its own roads.

Sir, each State has discernment enough to lay out and superintend the making of its own roads, upon its own land. The General Government has no land in most of the States, and no sovereign jurisdiction over any of them. The only result of the exercise of this power by the Government, within the States, is to diminish the power and patronage of the State, and swell unnecessarily that of the General Government. If the State makes the road, it employs all whose agency shall be needed in the operation, engineers, superintendents, overseers, laborers, &c.: and it, instead of the tax-gatherers of the General Government, collects, by the operation of its own revenue laws, from its own citizens, the money required for the object. It retains, as it ought, jurisdiction over the road, as a part of its own soil. It erects the gates, and regulates and collects the toll, by the agency of its own officers. All this is natural and appropriate: it is the just and natural operation of the sovereign power of the State, within its own limits, and with its own means. But, is the operation of the American System of this character? Is it natural, just, expedient, or legitimate, in this view of it? What, let me ask you, are the States for, if they are incompetent to make their own roads? You reply, to protect their citizens and their property. But will they not, in this instance, surrender them over to be taxed by the General Government, and will they not subject their citizens to the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, in all disputes which may arise, relative to the collection of the tolls, and relative to the lands over which the roads pass? The road is to be made, the gates erected, and tolls fixed, under a law of Congress; and then those laws are to be supreme, and cognizable by the Federal Judiciary alone. Sir, we have heard the power of the Supreme Court discoursed of, by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, in relation to its control over State sovereignty; and ought the States to swell the power of this tribunal, by a voluntary surrender of their jurisdiction over their soil, their citizens, and the road-making power? Does any man, even the most devoted to the American System, believe that the people of the States would agree to a direct tax for the purpose of making roads in the States? And would the people of any one State agree to pay a direct tax for the purpose of making roads in another State?

The true American System is the sovereignty of the States, the freedom of citizens, and the constitutional strength and compaction of the Union. We hear nothing now scarcely about any thing but the beneficent operation of the American System, and the beneficence of the General Government. We should take care that it may not turn out as it did with the prophet who swallowed the book—"sweet to the palate, but bitter to the stomach." Would the people of Tennessee agree to be compelled by the General Government to labor upon the roads of Kentucky, or the people of the latter to labor on the roads of the former? I think they would not. Well, is not the money of the people of each State their labor? Is it not the earnings of their labor? And where is the odds, in reason, between making the people of Tennessee labor upon the roads in Kentucky, and taking the money which they have earned by their labor, and expending it upon making roads in the latter State?

But if the power of levying money in one State, and expending it in making roads in another, be conceded to Congress, what is to prevent that body from regulating and equalizing the labor of the people of the States? and under that power to equalize the crops of the different States? Is not that in fact the result of the principle? For the most productive States pay the most money into the treasury. They make their money from their crops; and if it is to be expended in the least productive States, is not that equalizing the crops? But upon this principle might it not happen that some of the small States would not have any of the money of other States expended within their limits, and even their own expended within the limits of another State? Might not the large, and as many of the small States as would form a majority in both Houses of Congress, combine to expend the surplus revenue, in making of roads and of encouraging manufactures, within the limits of their own States, respectively, to the entire exclusion of the minority? Eleven States in that case might be sacrificed to the encouragement of manufactures, and the making of roads in the other thirteen, and that, too, forever, according to the doctrine of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] and the beneficent operation of the American System. None of the excluded States could, according to his doctrine, interpose its veto. If they did they would incur the guilt of rebellion or treason. Sir, I am for the system of the Union, according to the constitutional compact of the States in the constitution of the United States.

Every institution of man is purer at its commencement than at any after period of its history. There is in all human institutions a fatal proclivity to degeneracy: even the institutions of our holy religion degenerate. Hence the people of every Government have their choice between reform and revolution. They must do the one, experience the other, or submit to vassalage. But even reform is derided now. No doctrines are well received that do not tend to centre all power in the General Government, and conduce to the annihilation of the sovereignty of the States, and the erection upon their ruins of a magnificent empire.

I am, with my whole heart, and in all its feelings, in favor of the Union; but it is the Union of the States, and not an indiscriminate union of the people. I would not, by construction, or otherwise, reduce the States to mere petty corporations, and make them subservient to a judicial oligarchy—to a great central power of any kind. I would have the Union to consist of the free, sovereign, and independent States, of which it was intended by the constitution to be composed; I would have the citizens of each to look to their State for the security and enjoyment of their rights and their liberty. The Union which I advocate is also represented by the stripes and the stars. Each stripe a State, and each star its sovereignty. I would not mingle the stripes or blot out a star for any earthly consideration; and I would have each star to brighten with its benign and unclouded light the whole sphere of State sovereignty; I would have them all to shine with confluent lustre throughout the legitimate sphere of the Union. The stripes should thus wave, and the stars thus shine, if my wishes were consulted, until even Time himself should be enfeebled with age.

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[FEB. 9, 1830.]

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1830.

The Senate resumed the discussion growing out of Mr. FOOT'S resolution, relative to the further survey and sale of the public lands.

Mr. BARTON, of Missouri, rose, and addressed the Senate for more than two hours. He began by saying he was one of those "unlineal and bastard sons of the West," who had been denounced as false to their country, during this strange debate; in the commencement of which, he was persuaded, the Grand Sachems of the party could not have been consulted. All was going on harmoniously here. The magnanimous victors in the late Presidential campaign seemed satisfied with their triumph and their trophies. All parts of the Union were expressing favorable dispositions towards the young West. A liberal system in disposing of our public domains, propitious to our growth and our prosperity, and to the development of all our resources, was openly advocated by the North, the South, the East, and the West; when a minor chieftain of the party, of not much renown for either policy or war, [Col. Benton] not satisfied with the scalps he had taken in the late campaign, fell suddenly and unexpectedly upon the prisoners of the minority, and commenced a scene of massacre of the living, and, dragging the dead from their graves, even rescalped those who had been scalped and buried by other arms more valorous than his own, during the existence of the by gone war! And thus one, arrogantly speaking for the whole West, threw the fire-brand among the members of this body, and lighted up the flame of this partisan warfare, of sectional prejudice, local animosity, and civil discord!

The latitude and liberty of this debate [said Mr. B.] seem to be a kind of Saturnalia in the Senate of the United States. This may be a good thing during a long session of Congress, if not too often repeated. The Romans, too, had their Saturnalia, in which it was allowable to the veriest slaves in the empire to speak home truths to their masters, without either fear or reserve. It is not my purpose to avail myself of the full range of my privilege; nor to affect to speak daggers to the bosoms of either the ruling majority here, or that board of rewards and punishments yonder; who, having obtained possession of the treasury, the press, and the offices, honors, and emoluments, of the republic, have been enacting such freaks of "party discipline" as would make the fathers of the Revolution weep if they could behold them.

It is not my purpose [said Mr. B.] to remeasure all the grounds of this extended debate; but I propose to review the prominent points—to pass from hill to hill, from river to river, and from mountain to mountain, as well as I may, giving a brief and imperfect sketch of the principal features of each. And if gentlemen will not be surprised, and think me out of order, I will even touch upon the matter in debate—the proposed inquiry for information, of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. Foot] and the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. Woonucutt] which covers the whole resolution over, as a cloak covers a Senator, and looks very much like a substitute.

I have the honor to be one of those "unlineal and bastard sons of the West," who were so unmercifully denounced by the author of this party warfare, in the concluding part of his three days' harangue in the cause of sectional prejudice, local animosity, and civil discord. I am one of that great and patriotic minority in the West, who so disinterestedly endeavored to sustain the hunted administration of Mr. Adams, against which all the arrows of party malignity were shot, all the hell hounds of sectional prejudice, local animosity, and civil discord, were let loose, and all the lust of office and power of combination were arrayed. And in this our fallen condition and day of adversity, and of our country's adversity, we have reason to feel thankful that this notice of us from such a quarter did not come in the more mellowing form of approbation or of praise.

But as this debate has been converted into a mere partisan warfare of sectional prejudices and civil discord, and as this war has degenerated into a mere relentless massacre of prisoners, sacking of towns, and robbing of graves, I will shield myself under the great fundamental principles of the constitution, and, with the light of the Farewell Address of the Father of his Country in my hand, and with something of the little liberty still remaining to the minority, carry back the war into the enemy's country, so far as to attain that indemnity for the past, which can only consist in recapturing our lost property; and that security for the future, which can only consist in placing our motives above the reach of the assailant; not hoping to conquer in him the propensity to violate the rights of others, or to destroy in him the ability to do further mischief, while backed and sustained by such a majority as that to which he has attached himself.

Aware of the unequal contest against such a physical superiority of force, in possession of all the strong holds, all the artillery, and all the munitions of war, with my sling and my pebbles I advance to the field.

Never did a more disinterested and patriotic body of men appear in one of our Presidential contests than that minority in the West with whom I had the honor to be associated under the administration of Mr. Adams, and the equal honor to be denounced under that of his successor, as the "unlineal and bastard sons of the West!" We saw, with sorrow, the line of our revolutionary worthies extinct; that henceforth a new race of aspirants would spring up among us, divide and distract the country into personal factions, arrayed under the banners of their local leaders; and those harmonious elections by general consent, which marked the elevation of most of our former Presidents, about to disappear from our country, perhaps forever! We were not ignorant of the fact, that in such an array of parties, under a great plurality of leaders, those who did not succeed might coalesce, and form an opposition, to hang upon the rear of any future administration, and paralyze all its efforts for the public weal. We saw the Presidential elections of our country about to assume a new character; to become mere raffish matches and lotteries, in which the desperate in fortune would take a chance, in hope of relief; and the bankrupt in reputation would seek protection "in the shelter of crowds, and the strength of combination." We belong to neither of these two classes; we had no personal stake in that raffle, no ticket in that lottery, except in common with our country; we neither desired nor expected any office or individual advantage. We were not the subjects of defeat in a Presidential contest, except in common with the constitution and liberties of our country. If these went down, we went with them. If our candidate succeeded, we rejoiced for our country; if his rival succeeded, and the constitutional liberties of the country were preserved, and its welfare were promoted, in an equal degree we were content, and had gained our victory.

We did not dream of this reckless proscription for opinions sake that now makes the land pale! of this ravaging persecution for the exercise of the high and sacred right of election, which now tears the vitals of this republic! It never entered our imagination that a combination, guided by the fiends of party discipline, office-hunting, and vote-auctioneering, could so soon convert the high and happy privilege of free elections into a species of contest for victory and vengeance, and the Presidential elections of our country into the sacking of cities by the troops of Suwarrow; and the offices, and honors, and emoluments of our country into the mere spoils of barbarian war. We fondly believed the time to be far, far in unknown futurity, when the Presidential elections of the United States, as the elections of the Emperors of Germany and the Kings of Poland, should become the signals for civil discord and sectional strife; and, like them, prove

FEB. 9, 1830.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

the rock upon which the vessel of state must be ultimately wrecked and lost. We beheld a great nation spring up on this continent, and suddenly extend itself from the Atlantic Sea to the Mississippi, from a stock of fugitives from persecution and proscription, both religious and political, in the old world; and we have been taught, and fondly believed, that, so far from those demons of human misery reaching us here, they had been effectually excluded by the ramparts of our own free constitution; that the exercise of this great fundamental right of election, which lies at the foundation of all our liberties, would never even embitter the charities of life, or disturb the harmonies of society for a moment; but that each freeman would like the other better for his honest difference of opinion, guaranteed to him by the sacred compact of our civil institutions, and consecrated by the blood of the Revolution.

It is true we had been solemnly warned, in the Farewell Address of the Father of his Country to the people of the United States, in the most anxious and parental solicitude, that Catilines would arise in days to come, in these then happy States, and that demagogues and aspirants would spring up among us, whose objects would be to gratify their inordinate and unhalloved ambition; whose means of mischief would be to inflame sectional prejudices and local animosities in one portion of the Union against another; to represent their interests to be different and inconsistent with each other; and to cultivate and cherish the young devils of discord to tear out the vitals of the Union, and scatter them to the dogs of civil war and horrid anarchy; that such Catilines might reign as champions of their deluded sections of the Union, and enjoy a little illegitimate and parricidal renown. Of these, above all other enemies, the Father of his Country had warned us to be on our guard.

Thus forewarned, in 1824-5 that great minority believed they saw symptoms of the coming evil. They beheld the people of the United States, like an agitated ocean, threatened with the storms of sectional ambition, and no revolutionary worthies at hand to seize the helm and guide the vessel of state through the tempest with the firmness of Washington and the wisdom of Nestor. We conscientiously believed Mr. Adams the better qualified of the two principal candidates. General Jackson had taught us to divest ourselves of such sectional prejudices as our situation and education had subjected us to, and to revere Mr. Adams for his virtues, and to admire him for his talents; and had lauded his appointment as prime minister to guide the administration of Mr. Monroe, the last of our revolutionary Presidents. Our devotion to the civil over the military was sincere. We perceived no essential difference in their political principles. Their construction of the great charter of our rights and powers was the same; their great leading principles of policy were the same. We saw no difference then; we see none now. Washington had warned us against sectional jealousies, and we remembered that New England, the cradle of the Revolution, and the birth-place of American liberty, had given but four years' Presidency since the foundation of the republic! New England recommended her son, the friend of Washington and the guide of Monroe, to our suffrages, and honored him unanimously with her own. We sincerely believed that old Virginia and North Carolina, the mothers and grandmothers of so many of us in the West, with much of the South, would lead us in the same preference as soon as they found they could not succeed with their favorite candidate. The organ of Virginia politics had even placed General Jackson lower than we of the West could brook to see him placed. We confidently believed we beheld our venerated mothers pluck the fruit and taste it; heard them pronounce it good, and safe, and wholesome; and saw them offer it to their children. We took it and ate, never dreaming that it was afterwards to be pronounced forbidden or poison, or that we were to be damned for tasting it. It is not Virginia, "magnanimous Virginia!" that proscribes us now. It is only what is called in the country "the little Jacksons." The class that follows the victor rather for the loaves and fishes than for the words of political life. The example of toleration of the difference of opinion in the exercise of the high and sacred elective franchise, which Virginia has set in the election of members to her late convention, is worthy of all imitation—of the imitation of every State in the Union, and particularly of the President of the United States and his board of rewards and punishments, called a cabinet! And if Virginia has seen, since the election of Mr. Adams, that new light mentioned in this debate, which causes the turning of a sfort angle, and we have kept on a straight course, in the direction she then pointed us, our apology is, we did not see the new light that led her around the corner; nor do we question her belief that she saw it, nor her motives in flying the track; still less do we accuse her of having misled us at first. For we are of the same opinion still as in 1824-5.

For myself, I should feel constrained to give my vote for Mr. Adams again, in like circumstances, were it practicable. Nor will I even deign to try the experiment what effect might be produced on a future election in Missouri, by a timely adhesion to the powers that be. I will not chaffer for office. I will join no indiscriminate opposition to this or any administration of the Government of my country. If this administration come up to the line of the great fundamental principles and constitutional liberties of the republic, and of the settled policy of the country, as pursued by the late administration, we will endeavor to travel together in that way; but whenever this administration go off the line at a tangent, as I believe they have glaringly done, by striking citizens from the roll of official existence for the exercise of the high and inprescriptible elective franchise, we must separate. I pursued a like course under the late administration—supporting where I could, dissenting where I must; each tolerating the honest difference of opinion.

Yes, sir, I am of the same opinion still; and believe I can give a rational account of the sad revolution in our affairs which has since befallen that minority, and placed it in high and honorable company, by driving one of the most elevated and upright spirits of the age [Judge McLean of Ohio] to lay down the General Post Office Department of the United States, as a sacrifice upon the altar of his country's good!—nobly preferring the constitutional liberties of his country, and his children's country, to the Post Office Department, with the party discipline and vote-auctioneering of these degenerate times!—robly refusing to view the Presidential elections of his country, and his children's country, as the sacking of provinces by Tartar hordes, and the offices, and honors, and emoluments, of our Government, as the spoils of Scythian war! And woe to that minister who has advised the President to such an anti-republican course! It were better for him that he were fitted for Heaven, and a millstone tied around his neck and he thrown into the Potomac! The days of the present delusion will pass away, and the votaries of constitutional liberty be again seen in the high places.

In our cheap republican experimental form of government, with comparatively few offices, the vast throng of the people of the United States must, of necessity, be out of office. This vast throng, agitated by office hunters, demagogues, aspirants, and Catilines of the day, may be abused, deceived, and led astray. So thought George Washington, the Father of his Country, when he penned the solemn warning, with a father's care and a patriot's fear, in the following extract from his Farewell Address; with such a prophetic truth that one might think him personal, did he not recollect that Missouri was not admitted into the Union, the late Presidential contest had not happened, and this debate had not occurred, when the venerable hero penned the lines; and, consequently, he could not have intended such direct personality. These are his words:

"In contemplating the causes which may disburb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations--Northern and Southern, Atlantic and Western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views.

"One of the expedients of party to acquire influence in particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart-burnings which spring from these misrepresentations: they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection."

Let me proceed, in accounting, rationally, for the sad adversity in which the great minority and the true principles of constitutional liberty now stand, without ascribing it to the traitorous infidelity of the "unlincal and bastard sons of the West."

Imagine, then, the throng of the people out of office, agitated by their demagogues, aspirants, and Catilines, and these suddenly grasping hand in hand, and linking arm in arm, in firm combination, from one extremity of the Union to the other--trampling Washington's Farewell Address under their feet, and, without regard to personal hostilities, fierce as fiends; or to difference of political principles, opposite as the poles--agreeing together to pull down any cheap, republican administration: and, calling to their standard who can swell their numbers or augment their physical force, do actually take "a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull altogether," until their shoulders are blistered with the collar, and their sides shaved with the traces, at least during one campaign; or, at the very least, until the prospects of plunder and promotion shall be dimmed and obscured. Cannot any cheap republican administration be pulled down, although it were pure as the angels of the third Heaven! In such a Government, are not the outs, if disposed to vex the State, always too strong for the ins? Is it not easier to pull down than to build up? Is it not easier to raise a mutiny, throw aside the oars, and float down the Missouri, than to preserve proper discipline, and tug a boat up that impetuous current, by plying the oars? Cannot the incendiary, in one dark night, burn down the temple of Ephesus--the work of ages and the pride of the world? Cannot the Tartar hordes, in one short day, illumine the Ganges and India with the flames of Persia?

Listen to the warning voice of Washington respecting such combinations:

"However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely, in the course of time and things, to become potent engines, by which cunning, ambitions, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government; destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion."

"The unlincal and bastard sons of the West!"

In my humiliation, I am willing to imagine myself an humble shrub, near the earth, not reached by this mid-heaven thunder and lightning. My associates are tall enough to be within its magnificent range. Was it aimed at the oak of Kentucky, towering among the clouds, and more within the range of the bolts of this modern Jupiter Tonant? It was an ungrateful bolt, and he who threw it is not of the West! He is no native of our magnificent Valley of the Mississippi. You say the Percy is down, prostrate and decapitated! It was a Falstaff thrust. There is a species of gallantry that always rises as its antagonist falls--revives as the blood spouts from his jugular; and, vice versa, always sinks as he rises. This species is always blustering, bullying, and hectoring, in manner, mien, and tone. It is the true Falstaff order. It was an ungrateful thrust in the thigh a la reave; and he who gave it is no native of our Valley. He came to us uninvited; complained of having been driven by tyranny and persecution; desired our hospitality and auspices, and a little room to lie down and repose. The Percy found him weak and distempered, politically; and nourished and medicined him--put on his own collar and inscription at large, with a special  pointing to the words "cousin to Percy's wife." These gave him currency and consideration, and introduced him to the grand hunt. Without the help of this collar and inscription, it would have been as impossible to have elevated him to his present rank, as it would be to drag up from the depth of the ditch, by a frail woollen thread, some ponderous and inert mass. Others thrust a finger under that collar and pulled, who have since had cause to regret it, and washed their hands of the whole affair. In what you call the fallen fortunes of the assailed, and in his acknowledged absence, it was an ungrateful thrust. And why was it made now, at the first session of the new and promising administration, and before such an audience, attracted by this partisan massacre and pillage? accompanied, too, by a full renunciation of the American System--like the shrewd animal in the fable, casting the lion's hide into the bushes, or Thersites pulling off Achilles' armor, and dashing it against the pavement--in which there has been so much roaring, and so much glittering in arms, on the Western plains, for near fourteen years.

Has it been observed that all the prominent dogs, most distinguished in your late grand hunt of the Kentucky bison--all who had first throttled the game, or sank their fangs deepest into his flanks or his sides, or hung heaviest at his tail--have been well fleshed, and raised to the peerage among dogs? Was it noted that "this is the road to Byzantium?" Or has the Palace Constable been on the rounds, and with his familiar tap on the shoulder, given intimation of an expectation that new bond and security for adhesion and fidelity would be sent up to the White House? I would bolt, rather than give the additional bonds of that stab, and that renunciation!

It was an ungrateful stab: for, but for the kindness of the assailed, there would have been no opportunity to have introduced the graduation bill! There would have been no opportunity--after riding the noble spirited Kentucky steed, until, surrounded and hamstrung by the Catilines of the day, he stumbled to the fall--of leaping, with a true circus somerset, upon the back of the parallel and winning horse, and going on and claiming the stakes? Are these paid, or are they still in prospect? Was it adjudged fair riding, or gross jockeying? The assailed stands to the assailant in the relation of Acteon to his dogs, that unfeelingly pulled down and devoured their master, who had kindly fed them with his hands. The minority in the West stand to the assailant in the relation of the husbandman to the adder found chilled at his door, which, when brought in and sufficiently warmed, suddenly threw itself into a coil, and stung the favorite son of his benefactor. We found the assailant of our characters and our motives a scrubby political scion; and thought it a fruit-bearing species. We nourished it, and it grew; when, lo! it proved a political bohem upas, and blighted and desolated all for miles around its stem. And, not content with the triumphs of the past, the assailant of our characters and motives has drawn upon his imagination, and exulted in an anticipation over the triumphs of 1832, with a semi-barbarian insolence of joy, that might have suited the age of Suwarrow; but which the modern Nicholas, or Diebitsch, at Adrianople, would have repressed and punished, had it been indulged over a fallen Turk.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

He has amused his audience in this theatre with a description of the minority again defeated, discomfited, and flying—ay, flying, and measuring their double mileage o'er the earth: leaving their females far behind, to the magnanimity of the conquering hero coming! and even counsels our ladies not to go with us to the war, nor risk their "little feet" on such a route, with such protectors as we! I advise them not to risk their jewels to the magnanimity of such a conquering hero; they might be lost in the prairie grass, and never found. Whence this insolent idea, of our flying and leaving our ladies, who never fled either from public enemies or from domestic Catilines? But suppose our abandoned ladies overtaken by such a conquering hero; in his right hand he holds an old New England grand mother a prisoner, to be led to the stake—outraged in the feelings of her husband or son, her brother or father. Under his left arm he holds that beautiful, outre, and somewhat watery nymph, the river Roanoke, whom, ever and anon, he caresses, and kisses, and hugs. Ladies are not much depressed with the loss of an election. They are said to be inquisitive, and much given to feeling their democracy stirring within them. They demand the reason of maltreating the New England grandmother prisoner: he tells them she is convicted before him, on the testimony of old musty journals and betrayed private correspondence, of a suspicion of having thought, some ninety-five years ago, that the range of the Alleghenies would be a good Western boundary—a neat little cis-Alleghanian, Yankee republic, on this Atlantic coast; and that the old political witch shall go to the stake! The ladies demand, if his beautiful nymph under his arm does not even now hold a similar opinion, and vote against the admission of any new State in the West? Oh, yes, ladies, but omnia vincit amor—I love my nymph so much! Then comes the scratching scene. The ladies fly in the face of the conquering hero, release the Yankee prisoner, and even let loose the outre nymph under his left arm, to go home, or run up a tree, at will and pleasure. And there will end the triumph, of 1832; and there will commence the litigating scene of Scratchee, plaintiff, versus Scratcher et uxorem, defendants, which I shall leave your imagination to report, simply affirming that, let the jury come of the females of either party, Scratchee will be cast in the costs, and a mark set on his front, for his inconsistency and disregard to Washington's Farewell Address.

Our Saviour has been introduced upon the boards, looking with composure upon the slavery of man! I will not enter the delicate ground of slavery. It is our supreme curse—how shall we avert it? It is the secret poison stealing its way to our vitals—how shall we be healed of the malady? Leaving to the Fathers of the Church the meaning of the Christian precept, "whatsoever you would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets"—I pass on to remark, that Christ did not come as a temporal law-giver, to make statutes and civil regulations for the Roman empire; but advised his hearers to obey the laws; to pay their taxes to Caesar; to peace and good will among themselves; and to all manner of charitableness in the imputation of motives—judging not, lest they should be judged. He was no Roman Catiline, to inflame sectional prejudices, and local hatred, and civil discord; and to array the provinces against each other, or against the imperial head, or the Supreme Court of the empire, that he might gain the illegitimate renown of being considered the champion of a deluded province. Christ was a better man! But however he might have looked upon the slaves of Rome, there is a class of mankind on whom even Christ himself, coming to forgive and to save, cannot look with composure; but rebukes them for coming about him! It is that class who follow after the flag of the victor, rather for the loaves and fishes than for the words of political life. We read that he gave a gratuitous and miraculous feast to about five thousand of these gentry. He knew their motives and their objects when they praised his dinner; and, scorning their company, retired to a vessel on one of the interior lakes of Palestine. They wanted more fish, and, following after and praising him, crowded his little vessel as General Jackson's parlor was crowded, in this city, on the 4th day of March, 1829. He knew what they were after, told them to their faces what manner of men they were, and rebuked them for coming about him! And let the President of the United States follow this illustrious example! And if there be any such followers here, let them remember the examples of Christ, and the precepts of Washington, and cease their sectional strife, and conquer their relish for fish!

Before I advance to the discussion of the resolution under consideration, I wish to place the motives of the minority, with which I have the honor to be associated, above the reach of their assailant, by announcing the grounds, distinctly, upon which we do stand—in what the majority is pleased to call an opposition to the present administration; and to invite the majority to join us, and remove the appearance of opposition by the conjunction.

We shall endeavor to sustain these fundamental principles—

1. The Union, as established and bequeathed to us by the fathers of the republic; in opposition to sectional divisions—such as the Northern or Southern, the Eastern or the Western.

2. The principles of Washington's Farewell Address to the people of the United States in opposition to sectional prejudices, local animosities, and civil discord.

3. The supremacy of the Federal Judiciary, or Supreme Court of the United States, in all cases within its constitutional jurisdiction; in opposition to the anarchy consequent upon absolute State sovereignty over any such cases, and upon the power of a State to place her veto upon a law of the Union.

4. The freedom and purity of elections, unawed by official punishments, and uncorrupted by official rewards; in opposition to removals from office for the exercise of the great elective franchise, or to make room for the reward of partisans in our Presidential elections, by the bestowal of public employments.

5. That the provisional power of removal from office by a President, is a high legal trust, to be exercised for the public benefit, in sound discretion, for cause relating to the official conduct or fitness of the incumbent; in opposition to its perversion from its high purposes to those of partisan warfare or personal vengeance, in the corrupting spirit of "party discipline."

6. The restraining powers of the Senate of the United States, as understood by the contemporary expounders of the Federal constitution, in matters of displacing as well as of appointing Federal officers; in opposition to arbitrary Executive power, and servility to Executive will.

7. The freedom of inquiry into the exercise of Executive discretion and official trust; in opposition to Executive irresponsibility and unsearchability, and to the suppression of free inquiry into our public affairs, as in the identical case now under consideration of the Senate.

Our test of fitness for public employment is, "Is he honest? Is he capable? Is he faithful to the constitution?"

If these principles denominate us Federalists, be it so. If they denominate us National Republicans, be it so. Names are nothing.

We are neither in favor of separate absolute State sovereignty, nor in favor of the old confederation; nor for anarchy; nor for despotism under the forms of republicanism. We are in favor of these principles thus publicly announced. And if every Senator will renounce all hope of reward for himself and his friends, for his votes here—rewards so much deprecated in your long neglected report of May, 1826, to diminish Executive patronage, and put bounds to Executive will—and will meet us on these great fundamental principles, we can restore this Senate to what it was designed by its makers to be—a body elevated by its long term and comparatively independent tenure of office, entirely above the party politics of the day, and standing aloof, as the great barrier of public safety, against the rage of popular passion on the one side, and the encroachments of Executive will on the other. We can restore the Government to what it was represented to be by Hamilton, and Madison, and Jay, and understood by the public to be, when it was adopted by the people of the United States, and their liberties, and the liberties of their posterity, were fondly committed to its protection. But, if you will not meet us on these grounds, and continue your sectional and party strife, the public have a right to conclude, and will conclude, that your long neglected report of May, 1826, so extensively printed and circulated at public expense, and all your past professions of reform, were but hypocritical prostitutions of your Senatorial functions to the low and corrupt purposes of electioneering and combination, so much and so anxiously deprecated in the Farewell Address of Washington.

The fourth, fifth, and sixth of these great republican principles I shall not discuss upon this resolution. They belong to a much more interesting struggle for the very citadel of our liberties, which still lies before us. If, however, the dangerous and anti-republican principle of suppressing inquiry can be established here, it can be applied there too; and the label may be inscribed upon the very front of this administration—Light enters not here.

Let me take up the two first great fundamental principles of true republicanism here announced, as most interesting to this country, and in which, indeed, all the others may be included—the Union and the Farewell Address of Washington; and show that the whole spirit and scope of this sectional war of civil discord, and the whole plan of hunting popularity in the West for years past, by feeding the flames of sectional prejudices, jealousies, and animosities, are in open violation of their principles and injunctions; and that we have, in truth, a convention in the West, in opposition to both, more dangerous to our constitutional liberties than either the Hartford Convention of the North, or the projected convention of the South, and without any of their redeeming features or objects of local relief from real or imaginary oppressions, to soften its character, or to apologize for its existence!

Chief Justice Marshall, in his Life of Washington, (vol. 5, p. 685) speaking of the Farewell Address, says, "It contains precepts to which the American statesman cannot too frequently recur, and, long as it is, is thought too valuable to be omitted or abridged."

Upon the immense importance of cherishing our Union, permit me to read the following extract from that paternal address, in page 689:

"But, as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes, and from different quarters, much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress, against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed; it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national Union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can, in any event, be abandoned and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts."

Know, then, that we have a convention of internal enemies—of demagogues and aspirants—in the West! Its members, like our settlements and our towns, are scattered over a wide surface, "few and far between," and consequently cannot easily present the concentration of force, and unity of action, which your Northern or your Southern projects might have done, if so disposed; but they have concentration enough for effect, and unity enough for mischief. Its objects are personal aggrandizement, and the gratification of inordinate and unhallowed ambition. Its means of operation are to inflame sectional prejudices, local animosities, and the slumbering embers of civil discord, in one portion of our Union, against another; misrepresenting the objects, opinions, and views, of the other; assuming to be the champions and devoted friends of their own deluded sections, and thus gaining a species of illegitimate and matricidal renown, and erecting a kind of monument to their fame, based upon the ruins of the Farewell Address of the Father of his Country.

I pass over other points of comparison, and come to what I suppose, upon the charitable construction and the declaration of the parties, to have been the real ulterior objects of both the Northern and the Southern projects; presuming neither to have intended treason or disunion.

Each had an ulterior object which, per se, was both patriotic and laudable. It was merely relief from what both considered the ruinous influence of the prevailing policy and measures of the Federal Government upon their respective countries. The North considered their country blighted by the war measures of embargo and non-intercourse. The South thought theirs desolated by the prevailing doctrines of protection to American manufactures and Internal Improvement. Their modus operandi seems to have been, to make a strong expression and demonstration at home, to influence the measures of the Union at the metropolis, and thereby produce the resulting relief which was devised at home. To that extent, and confined to that extent, they both had ulterior objects, both patriotic and laudable in their views of their own situation. But our Western convention, composed of the like aspirants and Catilines against whom Washington warned us most, as being most likely to disturb our harmony, has no redeeming feature of patriotism about it. It is altogether hideous and deformed, as Lucifer himself is represented by Milton to have been, after his expulsion from Heaven, and his nine days' fall from the presence of God! It is the mere embodying of the fiends of local animosity and hatred. The mere incarnation of the spirits of civil discord, which has already roamed the world for so many centuries, and despoiled union and liberty in the greater part of Europe, in Asia, in Africa, in South America, in Mexico, in the Isles of the Ocean, and among the lingering remnants of the once powerful tribes of the aboriginal race of man on this continent; and driven union and liberty, as we are taught to believe, to their last retreat, upon that little green spot upon the map of the whole world, these United States.

And well might the Father of his Country, with his sage knowledge of the past, and his sagacious ken of the future, have dreaded this incarnation as the most insinuating and dangerous enemy that posterity would have to encounter. Well might he have bequeathed to us his Farewell Address. Had the Hartford Convention, contrary to its supposed design, been productive of war, it might, by possibility, have been confined to foreign war with a civilized nation, and the broad expanse of the Atlantic Ocean between, and to the frontier war with the expiring remnants of the aboriginal race. Should the project of the South be productive of war, it cannot come in a milder form than civil war, followed, almost of course, by all the horrors of a servile war. Should our Western convention of civil discord be productive of war, contrary to its supposed design, it could not be in a less hideous form than civil war, and probably following in its train a re-enactment, throughout the South, of the horrid scenes of San Domingo. If either of the projects had bursted beyond its intended bounds, it might have happened that the Hartford Convention would have been the most harmless of the three.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

There is one objection common to the three; the impossibility of those who raise such storms being always able to control the extent of their ravages. Like other revolutions, they generally prostrate their projectors in their early stages, and finally produce results, and throw up characters to the view of the world, which were not even imagined at the time of their commencement. Like tornadoes, they are uncontrollable, and admit of no fixed bounds. It has been well said, that a firebrand thrown by the hand of sport, or of a madman, will ignite a city as soon, and wrap it in flames as uncontrollable and consuming, as if it had been thrown by the hand of the designing incendiary. And so thought Washington when writing his Farewell Address.

But general descriptions of our Western convention, of dreadful demagogues, and dangerous Catilines, will not suffice. They often confuse our ideas, and fail of their intended effect. Specific instances concentrate our ideas, and show all at a glance: I will name several to the Senate. And first, I arraign "Americanus" at the bar of the Farewell Address of Washington. One principal object of my entering into this debate, was to rescue from forgetfulness and oblivion, by withdrawing from the musty files of this debate, the testimony of the Senators from Maryland and Maine, [Gen. SMITH and Mr. HOLMES] respecting the authorship of our Southwestern boundary between the United States and Mexico, running along the Sabine river and a zig-zag line to the Pacific coast in latitude forty-two degrees, as established in the Florida treaty. This fact would seem to be wholly immaterial. So it would have been, but for that description of demagogues to which I have been alluding.

The ex-President, Mr. Adams, has been charged, in a series of numbers lately published in the West, in the assumed name of "Americanus," and republished in this metropolis, and rendered as public as the party gazettes of the day can make them, with being the author of that line. Had that been all, those numbers would probably have produced no mischief in the unhallowed work of sectional prejudice, local animosity, and civil discord, in the Western country; but a long catalogue of the darkest and most unpatriotic motives were imputed to him in those numbers. It was represented as having been done from that aboriginal, never-dying hostility to the West, which has been imputed to New England in this debate. To have been done in concert with certain members of the Hartford Convention, then supposed to have been lurking about the city of Washington, to prevent the increase of slave-holding States in the Southwest to counterbalance the non-slave-holding States about to arise in the Northwest. To have been done to dismember the valley of the Mississippi. To have been done from motives of hostility to the principles of republicanism and the rights of man; and to prevent republicanism from migrating from the United States to the interior of Mexico, by the means of a vast desert spread between Missouri and the Mexican settlements on the Rio del Norte and the Colorado of the East.

The publication of those inflammatory and sectional essays at civil discord, stabbing Mr. Adams after it was boasted that he was down and helpless, and stabbing at the standing and character of his friends through him, placed me in a somewhat awkward dilemma. I had supported Mr. Adams's election and administration. It was no uncommon thing to be accosted with language such as this: "Look at your Yankee President, whom you have joined in preference to Old Hickory! The enemy of republican principles and the rights of man! The old and systematic enemy of the West! The dismemberer of the valley of the Mississippi! The snake coiled around the infant West to strangle her in her cradle, and prevent her development and growth!" Sir, I was suspected of the petty treason of Yankeeism, and of infidelity to my country; ay, of being an "unlinal and bastard son of the West." In conversation, I attempted a defence of Mr. Adams's motives, suggesting that it was impossible any man in his elevated station could have been actuated by such motives—suggesting his peerless defence of the title of the United States to Texas in his negotiations with the Spanish minister, Don Onís; and even the impossibility of his having been able to control the President, Mr. Monroe, and all his cabinet, and the Senate of the United States, if he had been the first to suggest that line; but as to the fact of his being the author of the suggestion of that line, I was "dumb as a lamb before his shearers," for the truth is, I did not know how that fact was, until the disclosure of it in this unique debate.

Every good man and lover of the harmony of his country must rejoice at the disclosure; that the West has been thus disabused; that Mr. Adams, hunted even in his retirement, and the spirit of New England, have been thus rescued from the imputations of their calumniator; and that his fruitful source of sectional prejudice and jealousy has been thus effectually closed. The falsehood of the charge has been thus placed on high, a conspicuous object of the contempt of honorable men, by the concurring testimony of the Senator from Maryland, the star of whose Revolutionary fame shone high in the firmament before "Americanus" was born; and of the Senator from Maine, who, in the darkest periods of the late war, was considered no enemy of the Union, nor of the West; and who, at the darkest period of the unhappy Missouri question, was not considered an enemy to Missouri, when, taking his official life in his hand, he stood against the array of public opinion in New England, and voted for the admission of Missouri; and was forgiven by his constituents for the honesty and patriotism of his motives, although they did believe, and no doubt sincerely too, that his vote was wrong: for the whole mass of those States is opposed to the slavery of man.

It has been the fate of this Senator to receive an ungrateful thrust, in the relentless rage of party spirit, from the same hand that thrust the patriotic son of Kentucky, in this unhallowed debate of sectional prejudice. And when such a spirit rules the debate, let him rejoice with me that he has escaped praise. For who can doubt the party reasons for assailing the motives of the illustrious dead—the venerable fathers of New England—in charging them with a settled hostility to the West, on account of their votes of antiquity, and visiting their imputed sins upon their children; when we have witnessed the awkward attempt to go down to posterity as the defender of Jefferson's fame at the expense of Bayard's; when the fact is now notorious that Mr. Jefferson, in 1803, contemplated delivering up all the Louisiana purchase, except the mouth of the Mississippi, to the "dominion of the savages and wild beasts," for fifty years!

Who can doubt the party reason, which should never find place in this once elevated body, for embracing the Roanoke, whose well known opinions and votes would have prevented the settlement of the West, or its admission into the Union; and damning a New England man, in his person, his posterity, and his ancestry, upon suspicion of a like opinion?

I do not arraign the motives of Mr. Jefferson, in his philanthropic views in favor of the remnants of the once powerful owners of this continent; nor those of any whose opinions do not admit of their voting for the annexation of the West to the Union. I only arraign the glaringly inconsistent and sectional spirit of this debate, at the bar of the Farewell Address of Washington.

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[FEB. 9, 1830.]

If the acquisition of Florida must be tortured into a sectional measure, or if individuals be entitled to the praise or the censure of the measures of a Government, the treaty establishing the line between the United States and Mexico would seem to be rather a Southern measure. And what good and fair-minded man censures the motives or acts of the South, in acquiring Florida when it could be had, and risking the future extension of our South-western line, when the increase of our population shall require it? It is sufficient to know, for the present tranquillity and harmony of the Western country, that Mr. Adams was the last to abandon his justly renowned defence of our former title to Texas, and the last to recede from the line of the Colorado of the Gulf of Mexico. But if the fact had been otherwise, I am at a loss to know how the long list of anti-republican and diabolical motives ascribed to him, which now stand like Mahomet's coffin in the air, without any visible support, could have been discovered; unless it were upon the authority of the old author, who lays down the following rule for the discovery of hidden motives: "Mankind being incapable of penetrating the secrets of each other's hearts, as the Father of Life and Light can do, are naturally prone to judge each other's motives by their own hearts. Hence, you will usually see a fair-minded and honorable man disposed to attribute fair and honorable motives to others: but a man of a contrary character drags down all humanity to the level of his own heart, and, judging them by that standard, very naturally concludes that all mankind are villains too."

I arraign the attacks of this debate upon the sheet-anchor of the vessel of State, the Supreme Court of the United States—the great common tribunal of the States of this Union; and all attempts here, or elsewhere, to destroy its utility, by casting over it a cloud of suspicion, and bringing it into disrepute among the good people of the United States, by comparing it to the party tribunals of Great Britain, in that dark and unhappy period of her history, during the State trials, introduced by the Senator from Missouri, as great departures from the precepts of Washington. Every man of common sense knows that we must, necessarily, have some common tribunal to settle disputed questions among the States, as well as among individuals; otherwise disputation would never cease, nor any question become settled at rest; but confusion and anarchy, the element of demagogues, would reign forever. That great common tribunal is not a fit topic for party disputation or popular declamation, until the design be entertained of rendering it a party engine, or of making it odious among the people, and substituting a party engine in its place.

The Judiciary must, from necessity, and the nature of its functions, possess high-toned powers. Hence the ease with which it may be rendered odious, by making it a topic of party and electioneering discussion, and representing it to the people, who have the least means of judging of it, as a despotic department of the Government, changing the relative powers of the States and the Union, and harboring designs of consolidating the Government into one single empire. By depriving it of the confidence of the public, it loses its great utility in quieting, instead of inflaming, the public mind, when it decides any of the important questions and principles of our yet young Government of the Union, or those that may arise among the States. In such a state of the public mind, instead of calming, and quieting, and restoring tranquillity to society, the decision of any great and interesting question would but irritate and inflame the more, and in time become the signal for commotion and revolt. Look to the great and irritating events of our brief history as a republic, and pause in this hazardous course.

If our Judges misconduct themselves, let the lawful proceedings be had, and the appropriate remedy applied.

If the organization of our common tribunal be unfit for the purposes of its creation, let the proposed reform or substitution be presented and discussed before the competent department to apply the remedy. If it be within legislative competency, let the bill be introduced and discussed here. If it require an amendment to the constitution, let the proposed amendments be submitted and deliberated on, and, if passed by Congress, go to the people and States for consideration, discussion, and adoption; and if the decision be in favor of the present Judicial department of the Union, as it was at the formation of the Government, let us sustain its reputation and utility, for the good of our country. It should be the last object of party attack. Save us from ever beholding that tribunal, too, converted into a party engine, to be wielded in the work of party proscription!

The Senator from Missouri has entertained you with an account of his reading the State Trials of England, at a remarkably tender age, for his widowed mother, probably that she, as women are wont to do, might weep over the judicial murders which, he tells you, distinguished the reign of the house of Stuart. It was quite natural for a boy of seven or eight years of age to be horror-struck, and deeply impressed with those juridical tragedies, as he declares himself to have been; and it is to be hoped that he has profited by the examples.

His attempt, however, in his new born zeal against the American System, as it is harmlessly called, to draw a parallel between the party tribunals of that gloomy period in the history of England, cutting off minorities by the halter and gibbet, and the Supreme Court of the United States, as it yet exists, sustaining the beneficial powers of the Federal Government to make Internal Improvements, and perform other general duties, as means necessary to the accomplishment of objects expressly confided to this Government, and impracticable by the States, was equally unsuccessful and unpatriotic.

This attack upon the Supreme Court was made, too, after a night's sleep upon what still lay in advance; and was announced to us before the adjournment, as a new field to be entered the next morning. Verily, the new field has been unprofitably and unpatriotically occupied, although I did imagine I saw an apparition from Virginia, stalking across the vision of the orator, in the slumbers of the preceding night.

The corrupt state of the Judiciary of England, as described to us, so far from being the cause of the evils of that day, was but the effect of the greater evils of that gloomy epoch. Those evils had their source far beyond the Judiciary, in that same inordinate and unhallowed ambition, desire to rule, and lust of power, governed by that same party discipline and proscription, which I have feebly attempted to deprecate and to denounce in the United States; and which pulled down the last administration, and now makes the once proud Americans feel like slaves, and blush for the fallen state of their country—the humbled victim of petty Cabinet tyrannies and corruptions! Those evils had their sources there, and, like turbid and overwhelming torrents, prostrated the Executive, the Legislative, and even the Judiciary departments of England, in their desolating course! History warns us that it required the purifying fires of another revolution to restore England from her fallen greatness; and let us profit by the example, and avoid her errors, while we may. Man is the same, in similar circumstances, throughout the world; and no monitor is more safe than faithful history.

I enter my protest against making the Judiciary of the United States the topic of mere party denunciation and popular declamation. It would be much more patriotic employment to draw that report of 1826, to curtail Executive patronage, and put bounds to Executive will, from its long, four years' black-hole Calcutta imprisonment, in the cold vaults of this capitol, and thaw it into life, and put it into practical operation. I repeat to you that, unless you do so, its long imprisonment, without the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, will be considered as conclusive testimony by the public, that it originated in the corrupt design of endowing a party press by its extensive printing and circulation, and of prostituting your Senatorial functions to pull down the late administration to get possession of their places, and not for the public good.

Your awkward affectation of looking out for the time "propitious to the enlargement of the powers of the people," as wistfully as a fanatic Jew looks out for the coming of his temporal Messiah, will not pass any longer: for that time is always present when you are sincere in a desire to avail yourself of it; and especially now, when the whole "ten talents" of power are committed to your charge.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ROWAN] usually argues a question like a Senator, rather than a belligerent; or, if he should occasionally become a little belligerent, his war never degenerates into the massacre of his prisoners. I will now take up his principal propositions in relation to the Supreme Court, submitted to us yesterday, and consider them. Using my own hasty notes, I shall not attempt to quote his very words, but to state his propositions.

One of his principal propositions, in refutation of the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] is, that the Federal constitution was not adopted by the whole people of the United States, as a national act, but by the people of each several State, in their respective corporate characters, as States.

Without stopping to dispute about the difference in the powers of the Supreme Court, conferred upon them by the constitution, as the great common tribunal of the Union to decide questions arising between States, or between one of them and the whole Union, under the one construction or the other, I rely more upon the contemporaneous exposition and understanding of the Federal constitution and of our whole Government, by the founders of the Government, than upon the exposition of the Senator from Kentucky, and find their contemporaneous expositions to be the same with those of the Senator from Massachusetts. The constitution declares itself to be the adopted work of the people of the United States. Did not Washington and his venerable associates in the Federal convention know that, neither in the adoption of that constitution by the people, nor in the election of a President, would it be possible to convene all the people interested in the question in one collected mass, on any arena?

The founders of the republic did not expect to convene all the people of the late provinces of Britain on this arena, within that beautiful and picturesque circle of hills which surrounds this capitol, with a diameter of some four or five miles, nor even on the more grand arena of some of the vast plains or prairies of the Western country, to act in mass; but, for convenience, and practicability of action, sent both questions to the people of the United States, at home, in their respective States, and in their subdivision of States into counties, and counties into districts or precincts. Yet, is not your Presidential election as much a national act as if it had been conducted in mass, on one of those vast arenas of the West, ample enough for all the purposes of collection and confusion? Besides, the Senator from Kentucky submits to the decision of the Supreme Court, backed by the instructions of Kentucky, that the Federal Government may exercise the power of internal improvement; and why will he not submit to the repeated decisions of the same tribunal in the United States Bank charter, and other cases, that the Federal constitution is the act of the people of the United States, as a whole? Can the instructions of a State make any difference in the cases, as to the obligatory force of the decisions? Can the decision of that great common tribunal be good to sustain the Senator from Kentucky in his votes for internal improvement, and slide from under the Senator from Massachusetts, when he would rely upon it for another purpose? We see the Senator from Kentucky arrives at the same practical conclusion to which we come, as I shall show more fully presently. Why, then, these theoretical distinctions?

At present, I will take up another of his main propositions, into which several of his minor ones may be consolidated; such as these: "The framers of the Federal constitution never intended to give power to the Supreme Court to check the State sovereignty. A sovereignty cannot live on the will of another sovereignty. A State must decide when its sovereignty is infringed. How are disputes about State boundaries to be settled? Can the Supreme Court of the United States adjudicate such a question?" And something was said, by the Senator from Kentucky, about the ultima ratio regum.

Now, sir, if there be one distinct proposition to which all these are reducible, it is, that there is such a thing under our political institutions as State sovereignty (or power, which means the same thing) over the matters confided by the Federal constitution to the Supreme Court, or to the Government of the United States! And there lies all the supposed difficulty. We take the constitution, and the exposition of the fathers, in our hands, and deny that there is any such thing as absolute State sovereignty known to our institutions. They are all limited, having power over some things and no power over other things, as States. We affirm that the States, as such, have no power over any cases confided to this Government, or to the Supreme Court of this Government, exclusively—and there ends the whole imaginary difficulty.

If States can settle questions of boundary, arising under the charters of the British crown, or otherwise, amicably, by commission, as Tennessee and Kentucky attempted to do some years since, be it so, so far as this debate is concerned; but the "Federalist," written principally, as you know, by Hamilton and Madison, two of the founders of this Government, (in pages 88, and seq. and 102) says, the settlement of such boundaries, when disputed, was one of the objects in establishing a great common tribunal.

When we contemplate absolute sovereignty, as it exists, say in the Autocrat of all the Russias, extending, in absolute power, over all cases and things, (if such be the present power of the Russian emperor) from the Baltic to Kamschatka, over the whole Eastern hemisphere, and then import that word sovereignty, of which we republicans seem so fond, we are apt to misconceive the import of the term, as applicable to our social compact, embracing both State and General Governments. There is no such thing as absolute State sovereignty in our political institutions.

Another proposition of the Senator from Kentucky, which I will take by itself, is, "a sovereignty cannot submit to its adversary sovereignty the point in dispute between them." Be it so. He instances the familiar case of school-boys falling out in the play-place, (about the ball, I suppose) and asks the United States' Senate if one boy will submit the disputed point to the arbitrament of his adversary? I suppose he would not: for then there would be as many tribunals and variant decisions as there are boys in the school. This matter should be submitted to the common tribunal, the schoolmaster, who, by the constitution of that school, was made the umpire in all such cases. And if the schoolmaster should make a law to govern those boys, in a matter of which he has jurisdiction, and promulgate it, and one of the boys violate the law, and then claim to put his veto upon it, on the ground that he, as a sovereign power, cannot submit the disputed point to his adversary sovereign, the schoolmaster, what is to be done in that dilemma?

And this brings me to the novel notion of modern

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[FEB. 11, 1830.]

times, of a State having the power to put her veto upon a law (for, unless the act be constitutional, it is no law) of the Union. The schoolmaster can decide that question. Should the veto, whether in the ordinary form of legislation, or of a constitutional provision, be carried into practical operation, it assumes the body and port of rebellion: for the constitution and laws of the Union are expressly made the supreme law over State acts of either character. This metaphysical and spiritual veto, disembodied from rebellion, seemed to me to defy the power and elude the grasp of the able Senator from Kentucky, as a gnat would annoy and sting an elephant, and still evade the touch of his proboscis; when, if a lion or a giant were to attack him, he would grasp the adversary, and throw him over the capitol. There is something in having a good cause, after all.

All that class of the Senator's arguments, intended to prove the unfitness of the present Supreme Court, as a conclusive common tribunal; and all his suggestions that Congress, or the Senate, or any other body, would be an advisable substitute, are matters of mere expediency, which have already been considered and determined against him, in the formation and adoption of the present Federal constitution. If it be thought proper to revive those questions, either here, or before the people of the United States, let him, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, submit his project; his bill, if it be of legislative competency; or his resolution to amend the constitution, if that be the adequate remedy; and let the matter be fairly discussed, before the competent power, upon this project of reform; and let it not be drawn into this mere partisan debate which has been visited upon us.

We admit that we have not "angels in the form of men" to either legislate or adjudicate for us; no, nor to see that the laws be faithfully executed; but we cannot admit the propriety of this attack, as we consider it, upon our supreme common tribunal, in this sectional and party strife.

The Senator from Kentucky asks, why cannot the States execute the works of Internal Improvement necessary in this Union? We answer, because they have not the means, in the first place, having surrendered all the great and fruitful sources of indirect and voluntary revenue to the Union, for the public good; and because, in the second place, their powers of concerted action are not commensurate with the object. To make only two roads, of two several States, meet on their common confine, would require a kind of compact, or confederation, for the special object. To extend the plan to a third State would require an extension of the compact or understanding. Then a fourth, fifth, or sixth, must be embraced, and so on, until all the States on the route be embraced in this road-league. And why are you not content with the existing confederation or compact, the Federal Government, with a single will and action?

We consider a road, canal, or railway, only as the means of transporting the mail, the armies, arms, and munitions of war, and the like, of the Union; and strange, indeed, if, in times of peace, when we have nothing better to do, we cannot make those preparations, when we shall be too busy fighting when war comes; as we are now too busy in that way to legislate upon the internal or external improvement of our country. We admit the arguments of those who urge the propriety of a systematic plan for such improvements. They are right; but that is a question of expediency, and does not touch the disputed power. We admit the arguments of those who say the power ought not to be perverted to purposes of electioneering. So neither should the appointing or removing power, or any other power of this Government. The Senator from Kentucky suggests that, if we make roads to our frontiers, the enemy can come along them as well as we can go. We prefer deciding such ultimate reasonings of kings on the frontier, or in the enemy's country; and therefore desire the obstructions removed out of our way. But this suggestion of the Senator proves too much, and therefore, according to the logicians, proves nothing. It would go the length of enveloping old Kentucky in the gloom of her original cane-brakes and forests, impenetrable to the rays of the sun, that the enemy might not see to find the inhabitants!

But the Senator comes, at length, up to our ground, and joins us; and we are glad of his aid and company. He has told you that his individual opinion is against the expediency of Internal Improvements by the Federal Government; but being under instructions of his State upon the subject, and, although he believes the original construction of the constitution, acknowledging this power in the Federal Government, to have been a "perverse construction," considering the question as "res adjudicata," a thing settled by the competent tribunal, he voted for the Louisville and Portland Canal project, and recognizes the power to be in this Government. And, in the fallen fortunes of the great minority, we rejoice to see this able Senator standing thus by the side of our respected ex-President, on the very summit level of his inaugural address to the nation, and his first message to Congress, upon this identical subject: for which he has been damned in his person, in his posterity, and in his ancestry, almost with the curses of poor Obadiah! And this admission of the res adjudicata goes the whole length of deciding the perplexing veto question, viz: when the Supreme Court decide a tariff or internal improvement act to be constitutional, a State has precisely the same right to impose her veto that she has to rebel or secede from the Union, and no more.

And, having thus followed the honorable Senator to the mountain top, I must leave him in the company of the venerable ex-President, until I can revisit him, in the morning; and now acquiesce in a suggestion made near me to adjourn.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1830.

[Wednesday, the 10th February, was spent chiefly on Executive business.]

On Thursday, 11th February, Mr. BARTON continued as follows: Mr. Macon, of North Carolina, used to say, that any speech, or debate, or other thing, that prevented too much legislation by Congress, was an absolute benefit to the public. If Mr. Macon was right, this resolution of inquiry has already produced a richer crop of fruit than I have known gathered in this Senate for several years.

I have on Tuesday last specified "Americanus" and the attack on the Supreme Court, as departures from the precepts of Washington. At present I must leave the Senator from Kentucky high on the summit level of the ex-President's inaugural address and first message to Congress, and proceed with my specifications; promising, however, to call and take one affectionate farewell of the Supreme Court, before it too may be driven from its post, or rendered useless to the country, by the unsparing march of party discipline and vote auctioneering.

In the next place, I will instance a document of party discipline, issued during the late administration, to cheer the allies in pulling it down, more renowned, in its way, than the Declaration of American Independence; or the Mexican Declaration of Universal Emancipation; or the Panama Mission; or Cicero's arraignment of Catiline; and as notorious now as the late Presidential election—the East Room Letter! The object and effect of that production was to inflame the public mind, and particularly the more inflammable West, as new countries and young men are more excitable than old countries and grave seniors, against our New England President; to represent him as a splendid Autocrat of a rapidly consolidating empire; and his east room as a gorgeous palace, more suitable to the Autocrat of all the Russias, than to a republican President; and offensive to the old fashioned republicans of the present day, who never fail to measure three inches of democratic fat upon the ribs, provided they can get their hands upon the means of fattening! The unknown author is of the very class of mischief doing demagogues, of whom Washington warned us. Do you say that letter was too notoriously false to do any harm? I answer, non sequitur, sir; that by no means follows. Did we not behold our country divided into two grand parties, of a personal or rather of a sectional character, without regard to political principles; and the impassable gulf of political animosity and prejudice, malice, hatred, uncharitableness, and civil discord, yawning between them? Neither party would read the refutations of the other; or, if they did, they affected to disbelieve them. We know the East Room Letter was false. The members of Congress went to the palace, and saw with their eyes it was false! The citizens of the District of Columbia and of the metropolis of the nation went to the President's, and saw it was false! The visitors from the extremities of the republic went to see the President; and saw it was false! The foreigners visiting our country, and the ambassadors and ministers of emperors, kings, and republics, of the Eastern and Western hemispheres, visited the President, and saw it was false! The naked walls and unfurnished interior of the east room itself, proclaimed it false! But what of all that? Can truth fly as fast as falsehood? or the antidote always keep pace with the bane?

"On eagles' wings immortal scandals fly;
"While noble actions are but born, and die!"

Will the pamphlet speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, with which I hope he will favor us, ever overtake that fleet little telegraphic despatch, giving a wilfully false statement of this debate, and of the principles and doctrines of that Senator, avowed on this floor? Never; and, for its own honor, it should not desire to overtake such company.

To see the Press, once the boasted palladium of liberty, sunk, subsidized, and corrupted, into a mere engine of party slander, is lamentable, indeed! To behold it wielded to misrepresent and destroy the characters of minorities—for whose protection written constitutions were invented—is alarming for the liberties of the country! But to see such an engine, endowed by the public treasury, shielded under the known popular jealousy of all that savors of muzzling the press, set up here under official authority, to falsify the debates of the United States' Senate, is intolerable to freemen! And for me, who never knew any political standard but that of constitutional democracy, under which I was born and educated, to behold the printer to the Senate, who, during the days of his homester private life, was known by me in Missouri, where we both resided, only as a federalist, now turned eleventh hour democrat to retrieve a broken fortune in the great lottery or raffling match of a modern presidential election, denouncing the supporters of the late administration as federalists, and attempting to damn them, politically, by such a charge! as if all those who were in favor of adopting the Federal constitution were not federalists!

Will the exclamation, on this floor, by the Senator from Missouri—"Heaven defend the West from such an alliance!"—to which so much eclat has been given in the party prints of the day, ever be overtaken by the simple truth of that matter?

The fact of an open and conspicuous wooing, billing, and cooing, on the part of this guardian of the West, who arrogantly presumes to speak for the whole West, towards the outre nymph, the river Roanoke, and all the South, has been notorious here for four or five years; ever since the combination to pull down the last administration; and was just as conspicuous throughout this sectional and unhallowed debate; and has been at length consummated by the renunciation of the American System, and the wedding itself; which I shall duly celebrate when I arrive at the renunciation lying just ahead of me. This notorious courtship in the South, and attack in the East, drew from the Senator from Massachusetts the remark, that if the West desired new allies, let her go and seek them. So say I; and seek a new member too, as Missouri will probably do without any prompting, in my place, if that system is to be abandoned: for I shall adhere to it. And this remark of the Senator from Massachusetts drew from the Ajax Telemon of "the West" the awkward attempt to receive the palpable hit on the shield of that exclamation! Æsop has a simple and beautiful fable to this effect: "A prairie wolf was ambitious of being considered the rival, or, if possible, the conqueror, of a neighboring buffalo bull! One day the wolf walked over, uninvited, into the domains of the bull, and, in his own mode of warfare, snapped at his tail or flew at his throat! The buffalo took the assailant upon his horns, and tossed him sky high! The moment he touched the ground again, he limped off upon a broken limb, and exclaimed, 'Heaven defend me from such an alliance!'"

The St. Louis Enquirer—not then edited by the public printer—accused the ex-President Adams of attempting, at Ghent, to bargain the Mississippi for some fishing privilege at the Northeast; and after impressing and riveting the calumny upon the public mind, refused even to publish his triumphant refutation! No, sir. Truth has not yet even discovered the author of the East Room Letter! His place of residence became an object of as much curiosity and inquiry as the birth place of Homer! Some located him at Richmond, Virginia. Some elsewhere. Public curiosity was on the alert. Our frank huntsmen of the West, lovers of Washington, and of holy truth—that daughter of Heaven, sent on earth to cement and hold together civil society among men—say (to use their parlance, and draw my figures from my own country, and the scenes of my own country) that they tracked this prowler for human reputation and civil discord to a deep and dark recess, amidst the vast prairies of the magnificent valley of the Mississippi; that they fired the prairies, and ran their line of fire into his retreat, until it scorched his very nose, and enveloped him in smoke: and still he lay sullen, and silent, and coked! And they had given up the hunt, until he walked forth again upon the prowl for human reputation and civil discord, in the darkness of night, under the mask of "Americanus," and committed an outrage more flagitious than the first! He will be hunted again. It is pro bono publico that such calumniators and Catilines should be known—ay, and impaled on high—high as a Roman cross or American pillory could place them, as a warning to our young men to beware of the fate of a convicted calumniator! Beware of the fate of an American Catiline!

Next, I specify the attempts to excite disaffection in the West, because of real or supposed inequalities of the public expenditures, in the various sections of the Union. It must be so, from the nature of things and the formation of the earth. The Great Father of the Universe thought proper to make the maritime frontier along the maritime coast of the continent, instead of in the interior. We have no formidable enemies in the interior, or along our Western frontier. The rapidly expiring remains of the aboriginal race are more fit subjects for philanthropical societies, or individuals, to meet and mourn over, than for expensive and powerful war measures of offence or defence; and our demagogues are not yet formidable enough to require interior fortifications. Hence all the expensive works, such as Fortress Monroe, Fortress Calhoun, Fort Adams, or Brenton's Point, whether for war or for commerce, must be where they are needed. As well might the demagogues and orators of Great Britain incite internal disaffection, because her fortifications and expensive works of defence and commerce are around the coast of her island. Who would expect the public expenditures of a government to fall like a snow of equal depth over the whole surface of the ground throughout the extent of the snow storm? The people of the interior, and West, have surely more common sense and patriotism than to become disaffected from such causes.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

But the most surprising extravagance of all this broad farce—this intoxicating victory over us, is the declaration made by the Senator from Missouri, that “roads, and canals, and railways, across the Alleghanies, are injurious to the West, and especially to the navigation of the West!” This is the consummation of the wedding with the Roanoke! This is tantamount to setting up the West for itself: and corresponds well with the known opinion in that quarter, that no new State should be admitted, nor the West be annexed to the Union! Washington laid special stress upon this very topic. He foretold that such views of the interests of those two great sections would, in time, be presented, and warned us against their influences. In his Farewell Address he entered at length into this identical subject; and showed how the cis-Alleghanian and the trans-Alleghanian countries would mutually aid each other—as agriculture, and manufactures, and commerce, mutually sustain each other; or as brethren of different occupations might mutually aid, enrich, and protect each other. But it would seem that a greater than Washington is here! The Senator from Maine [Mr. SPRAGUE] gave quite a laconic Yankee answer to all this, by saying, “a single maritime war would seal up the mouth of your magnificent Mississippi!” He also said, a man and his wife might as well quarrel because of their different organization, as the different sections of the Union adopt such Missouri notions as these! And, like a long-sided Yankee, gathering fodder in September, the Penobscot began at the tassel, and, with one sweep, left not a green flag fluttering in the air. But it is not to the wedding itself that I object; let that go on. When young people fall in love, it is better to let them marry. If you oppose them, they will love the more; and even jump out of the window, and run away. Omnia vincit amor, et nos cedamus amori—let the lovers marry. But, jointly with others from the West, I enter my protest against this renunciation of our great fundamental principles of national policy: Internal Improvements, by the only power that can well make them; and the domestic arts, to make us independent of our enemies, and keep our backs warm. Let the bridegroom go, if he will; but let him not take with him our favorite national policy, and our magnificent valley of the Mississippi, as an appanage to please his bride. To that we shall not submit; but will follow the example of another hated and proscribed name—the example of Duncan McArthur, when, in a fit of patriotic indignation, he broke his sword, and refused to submit to the capitulation of Detroit: one of the many results of the want of preparation in peace for a state of war.

As matter of curiosity, I should be pleased to see the Prince Royal to be born of this marriage—the lineal and legitimate heir—poised across the back bone of our continent: his Eastern half squalling, No West! No West! No State in the West! And his Western half vociferating, The West! The West! My own imperial West! He must be an animal more rare than a black swan.

It has been objected, in this debate, that societies meet, deliberate, and petition, or remonstrate, respecting the present condition of the red and black races of men on our borders, or among us, as of schemes to consolidate the republic into a single empire! One would have thought the present condition of both races a fit subject for the philanthropy of Christendom; and especially that, under our institutions, citizens might do so without their motives, opinions and views, being misrepresented into designs hostile to the republic.

The last specification, of historical notoriety, of the prevailing violations of the injunctions of the Farewell Address, with which I shall now trouble the Senate, is the popular excitements and agitations in the West respecting our national domains. It has been but too common there to represent the Union as a heard hearted and grinding tyranny—a cruel step mother—subjecting citizens to fine and imprisonment for cutting a public twig! Some have gone the length of claiming all the lands in the new States by virtue of the acts of their admission. Others have accused the General Government of having usurped powers in relation to the public lead mines!

I do not stand alone among the Western members in denying both the charges and the claims thus preferred. The Government of the Union has been kind, parental, and indulgent to the West; rather gorging than starving her—rather surfeiting than stinting her. So far as migration has been checked or suspended, or the settlements of the wild lands and growth of the West have been injuriously retarded or prevented, they have been owing to our own acts, in holding up to public view the prospect of a kind of millennium about to be ushered in upon them, when lands may be had for nothing, and all the good things of life shall court their acceptance; and thus producing a suspension of purchase settlement, and growth.

The real fruits which such representations and schemes have borne, are a general alarm in the old States for the safety of their common property in the new, and a disposition to distribute the public lands, or their proceeds, among the States, according to their present representative numbers—a measure that we think would be very injurious to our young and sparsely populated States; and weaken the bonds of the Union. And “they who have wounded us are of our own household.”

The whole spirit of this debate, from the moment it abandoned the resolution before the Senate, and assumed a party character, is reprehensible. After ten minutes attention to the resolution, it suddenly abandoned the living, and taking the back line of the illustrious dead of New England, found the graves, and then the bones, of the fathers of New England, and called them from their graves to answer at the heated and sinister bar of party spirit for the deeds done in the body; and profanely drawing down their motives from the high clanciness of Heaven, presumed to blacken them with the darkest hues!

I must approach that neglected resolution, should I even do no more than follow the examples before me, of stooping to it as an eagle to his prey, barely touching the feathers on the back, and then, ascending, fly all around the firmament until brought down again by mere fatigue and exhaustion!

But before I go there, let me shrive myself like a penitent sinner, and confess my real situation in relation to questions of the public lands. I stand here under the instructions of my Mæcenas and my Minerva—my instructor and my guide; passed through the digestive organs of the Legislature of Missouri, without either decomposition or change! They look to the past, the present, and the future, and all around, to every point of the compass wherever land can be found belonging to the United States upon this terraqueous globe. They instruct me to vote for all such amendments as may be offered by my instructor, to one certain graduation bill, pending before the Senate! So that, if the label over the door be “an Almshouse,” and upon entering you find your mistake by a full display of smiling Cyprian beauty, it is an Almshouse still: for that is proved by the label! Or if the label be “Reform,” and you meet at the threshold a picket of the palace guard, and hear the reveillé beating for the whole guard to turn out, and put down your inquiry by dashing out all your lights around you, it is reform still, as proved by the label! Thus, you see, I am bound to the triple alternative—to follow the indicative leads of my Mentor, as an obedient Telemachus; or to show good cause, at home, why I cannot; or to be treated by my masters in Missouri, as Queen Elizabeth treated her Cardinal, when she exclaimed, “I frock’d you, sir! and by G—d I’ll unfrock you!” Her Majesty must have been angry: for I learn that ladies never swear but when a little excited.

In these uncharitable times, the motives of myself, the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. McKINLEY] and others disposed to let this inquiry go on, have been questioned by the author of this debate. It has been alleged that this resolution has been impaled on high—held up to the indignation of the West! and that, taking the alarm, we are disposed to avail ourselves of the tact of our Captain General from Massachusetts, to extricate us from the dilemma, by his motion for indefinite postponement! It was even suggested that, if consulted at an earlier stage of the campaign, he might have saved us from the dilemma! We are above harboring prejudices against such a Captain General; but we decline the motives imputed to us, although not at all surprised at the imputation of them. Common charity might have suggested such motives as those avowed by the Senator from Maryland, [Gen. SMITH] who declared he would not, at the very commencement of the administration, set such a precedent of suppressing inquiry into Executive discretion: for, over these surveys and sales, we know, the President possesses absolute discretion, as the laws now are. But after what we have experienced of the organization, discipline, and power, of a late Opposition, we are not surprised to find these ideas of a Military Chieftain uppermost in the imagination on that side of the chamber: No, nor would we be, if the orator, in making this imputation, had even imagined he felt the wire of the “Great Magician” up yonder, twitching at his elbow—like the master of a puppet show setting Punch, and the others, in a true partisan dance!

Why did not the accuser remember that Magna Charta—not of Runny Mead, but of Goose Creek—of the 4th day of March, Anno Domini 1829, guarantying this right of reform to us? Are not the means of enjoying that right, such as free ingress, egress, and regress, of the great mansion of the public domains, included in the grant? Why was not the old common law, as it was before the great Goose Creek charter, thought of? or at least the report of May, 1826, saying “the uncontrollable exercise of Executive discretion makes a President a Monarch! Names are nothing!”

The Senator from Connecticut is known as a friend in Missouri. He now disavows all sectional hostility in proposing this inquiry. Let him have it. It will satisfy Connecticut, and do us no harm in the West. The Commissioner of the General Land Office, in his annual report, points out some reform, in this subject, as necessary. Then comes the Senator, with the modesty and economy of a true son of Connecticut, and asks only “a farthing rush light” to look beyond that point, to see if more be necessary; and if so, where to begin, how far to go, and where to stop. This inquiry he would make through the Committee on Public Lands, every man of whom comes from the new States, supposed to be most interested in the question—fresh with the clods of your public domain almost sticking around them! The President will be glad to see this unassuming son of the Pilgrims comparing his humble rush-light with the brilliant chandeliers that illuminate the President’s way. There is no Yankee trick intended, to go back into some remote apartment of this mansion of the public lands, and draw thence your consul to Mexico, with all his trumpet-the-trick and faro-bank apparatus about him, to make you blush for your administration! No, he has been translated, after warring with the police officers and Judiciary of St. Louis for some years; he has been translated—not as Elijah, nor Mahomet, nor even as Judas Iscariot, Esquire, but reformed and transferred beyond the confines of Missouri—promoted to the Consulate! The President must have been imposed upon there, as well as in other cases; and might well exclaim, “save me from my friends, and I will guard against my enemies!”

But this resolution: No sooner was its birth heard of, than the Senator from Missouri, like a modern Herod or Pharoah, breathed slaughter and destruction against it! He declared it to be “big with the fate of Caesar and of Rome!”—“to be an occasion on which a son of the West (meaning a lineal one, I presume) ought to die with as much alacrity as on the field of battle, in defence of his country!” He even raised the war-cry of the Spanish General Palafox, and declared “war to the knife, and the knife to the hilt!” against that harmless Connecticut babe! And all this to prevent excitement at home! to keep the good people of Missouri quiet!

It seems to me a singular mode to keep the people quiet, to make them believe such a struggle is going on here by their valorous Senator against those aboriginal enemies, the Picts and Scots of the Northeast, who, from the accounts we have had of them, may be descended from King Philip, of Mount Hope, or Miantonimoh, or the Penobscots and Narragansetts!

Suppose my neighbors, the Royal Pawnees, should send a Pawnee minister to some pass of the Rocky Mountains, to see what the Red Skins are doing beyond; and he there beholds a solitary Red Stick applying his skinning knife upon the carcass of a dead deer! He sends back a report that a million of Red Skins, armed, painted, and feathered for the war, are passing the Cordilleras, to bear down, like a deluge, upon the Pawnee lodges! How calm it would make the Royal Pawnees, and especially the squaws and paposes! How very quiet they would rest! And then comes a bulletin announcing his victory, with his naked knife-blade to the hilt, and by the prowess of his own “red right arm,” over the whole invading host! Every body knows, the moment that minister returns, the grateful Pawnees will make him principal War Chief. But the misfortune will be, that, when they discover the gross imposture of the stratagem, they will “unfrock him”—yes, unchief him!

I dislike to see religion brought into disrepute by hypocritical pretences to it, when we do not feel its influence. So I should dislike to see the true gravity and dignity of this Senate brought into disrespect, by affecting to feel them when such broad farce is reigning all around us.

Whenever I hear such extravagant declarations as those—witness such a gigantic overstriding of all the modesties of nature, and the propriety and fitness of the occasion—or see “Old Ocean into tempest toss’d,

“To waft a feather, or to drown a fly,”

I shall not affect much gravity. Such mock courage makes me smile.

If the Senator mean that he intends to die in neither the defence of this inquiry nor of his country, that is intelligible. If he mean that the West might spare as on without any of that tear-falling scene which he enacted across this chamber at the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HOLMES] in relation to the second Missouri question, then silence becomes my instructed condition, until after the funeral; when every good man would rejoice that matters were no worse. But if he mean that this resolution is a fit occasion to die on, without waiting to see if his country may not need him in case of actual invasion, and will die in spite of my dissuasions, then I hope he will die like a lineal son of the West, in imitation of the ancients! Let him take Palafox’s naked knife-blade, drawn; go over those distant hills beyond the Potomac, (so as to die on Virginia ground) and there, in the vicinity of Washington's relative, fall upon its point, and die like Cato! Or, if he dislike cold iron and steel in the middle of winter, let him not forget the illustrious exit of that illustrious ancient who betrayed his Lord!

I should like to see this question in mathematics figured out in the rule of three, and the quotient fairly stated. If the low water mark or zero line of the Senator's valor, when peace is in all our borders, and not a war speck in the sky, that I can see, be equal to that of Palafox in the passes of the Pyrennees, guarding his native Spain against the invading legions of Napoleon Bonaparte; or of Leonidas, with his three hundred Spartans, at the Straits of Thermopylae, guarding Sparta and all Greece against the million of myrmidons of Xerxes, the King of Persia and of Kings; what would be the spring flood height, or boiling degree of his rage, if placed in the Pine-spur-gap of our own Alleghanies, with his naked war knife drawn, to guard the magnificent valley of the Mississippi against the invasive Yankees; and upon lifting up his eyes and looking over the plains below, towards the Northeast, he should behold the universal Yankee nation, armed cap-a-pie, with drums beating and banners flying, coming to invade us, and lay our valley under one sheet of fire, from the Lake of the Woods to the Balize, and from the sources of the Missouri to the aforesaid Pine-spur-gap! and to carry away into captivity the brightest portion of our mulatto beauties! Figures cannot count it. Poets cannot sing it. Homer did his best in Achilles' wrath about the loss of his sweet-heart, and while chasing Hector around the walls of Troy; and that barely came up to the zero line of the Senator's valor! And Cervantes is dead! A propos! Cervantes was the man for this sort of valor! It all rushes on the mind "like a flood of coming light!" All is not right in the capital! There is more occasion, now, for Dr. Cuthush, or Dr. Cutseull, than for any military hero to guard us against the Yankees! Those mental illusions have afflicted the frail sons of Adam in other countries, and in climates better than our own! My honorable friend Don Quixotte de la Mancha, a countryman of Palafox, had a long spell of them! On one occasion he attacked, as he supposed, an army of steel-clad knights, which turned out to be a flock of harmless merinoes! Then a funeral procession, and wounded a friar! Again, a wind-mill and a fulling-mill, imagining them colossal, enchanted giants, more terrible than Aesop's buffalo bull! But why recount his freaks, when all these honorable Senators have read Cervantes! and they who hope for missions to Spain, South America, or Mexico, have, doubtless, read him in the original!

But if the legal right to this inquiry will not be admitted, I offer a compromise. Not a "coalition," gentlemen of the majority, for we know you loathe that; nor a "bargain, intrigue, and management," for that also you abhor; nor even a "combination," for that we believe you in possession of already, and upon it I have said all I intend to say at present; but a bona fide agreeing together on the way, before we enter the vortex of unprofitable litigation about legal rights. Here it is.

One of your best speeches [Mr. HAYNE'S] sufficiently proved that the "Federalists," of all countries and climes, languages and forms of Government, by whatever name called, are, and have been, the identical "few," to whom the motto on your banner (the Telegraph) says "power is always stealing from the many," that they have always been the power-grasping gentry, who stand and pull on the power already stealing to them! In Europe they have been called Aristocrats and Ultras; in our old war, Tories, more recently National Republicans; but they are Federalists still. Now I propose that you transfer to us all the Federalists in your ranks. They cannot be many, or you would not proscribe them thus. With us, names are nothing, and if they practise our principles we shall be glad of their company and aid. Their passage to us, we think, a down-stream business. They have only to embark on the bosom of the constitution and the fundamental principles of our liberties, and they will be with us in a moment. But for us to pass to you is, as we think, impossible. For going in that direction there lies between us the vast abyss that may be supposed to exist, if the whole constitution and liberties of the country were annihilated!

Another of your speeches [Mr. BENTON'S] gave society the old horizontal cut, and threw all the gentlemen up into the garret or gallery! These gentlemen are the same spoken and written of by the elder Adams; and therefore they ought all to be d—d! Now transfer to us, also, all the gentlemen in your ranks, and they can't be many, or you would not proscribe them so. With these reinforcements from your ranks in this body, without disturbing your Executive departments, or other offices, we can, and will, make all proper inquiries into the exercise of Executive will, and especially into the causes of those removals that have made the free born sons of this republic feel like slaves! It is to be regretted that you, the majority, to whom the ten talents have been committed, with the power of doing so much good for our country, should not have attempted, by example, or otherwise, to fix some bounds beyond which sectional prejudice and strife should not be permitted to run. Moses established the term of fifty years as a jubilee, when the Jews might, at least for some purposes, rub out, and begin again. The modern politicians have established a much shorter term of jubilee. Some ten, twelve, or twenty-four hours, suffice to bring together personal enemies, hostile as the Kilkenny cats; and men of political principles, opposite as the poles; and to cause them to march together, at least so long as the bounty bag will jingle, or the prospects of "booty" remain pretty good!

But how long, how far beyond even the Jewish term of jubilee, sectional prejudices are to run, I can no more tell, than I can tell when the "time propitious to the enlargement of the powers of the people," and to the curtailment of Executive patronage, and putting bounds to Executive will, shall arrive; or how long, after a chase of a Northern buck has been cut in upon by a new pack, and the game taken and eaten, some unfortunate Ringwood of the original chase, with a bad olfactory and worse judgment, may continue to trail, and cry around the old hunting ground.

But we are told of exceptions in all these attacks upon New England. I will not go back to the dead, and disturb old differences about great principles of government, long since laid to rest. I will only turn around to my contemporaries, to the modern tribes of office hunters, of all political parties, who crowded around the President, of late, in ranks of some ten thousand deep—to that class who, after following "the Civil Lamb, singing eulogies and praises, hosannas and hallelujahs, to his name, so long as the prospects of immediate glory were bright; but who deserted suddenly to the Military Lion, so soon as those prospects were dimmed or obscured; or so soon as the thirty pieces of silver were heard jingling in the bag— even before the money was poured out and counted, or the eyes were blessed with the impress of the Roman emperors, the Spanish kings, or the American eagles." When such are mentioned as exceptions, I always think of the exceptions made by his Satanic majesty, when he anathematizes the twelve disciples—always excepting the bright and faithful Judas, whose virtues alone would be sufficient, in the opinion of his majesty, to redeem the twelve; or of such as the Duke of Wellington might be supposed to make, were he to take it into his gracious head to curse all the inhabitants of the peninsula of Spain—always excepting, of course, the faith-keeping Portugal!

I will not trample on the graves of the illustrious dead of New England, of either of the old parties. There sleep the remains of the fathers of New England! I will only remember them as the fathers of New England—the fathers of the Revolution—the compatriots of Washington, and the great Northern Light! Yes, sir, however unpalatable that may be in the uncharitableness of party times, they were the great Northern Light, whose beams penetrated the gloom of our Western and Southern forests, to the farthestmost verges of the republic! And if they did go there in the humble forms of pedagogues and school masters, preceptors of academics, and presidents of colleges, they were not the less beneficial to the country for that reason. I will hold up only their virtues and their patriotism to the view of Missouri; and if I can excite in her youths an emulation of such virtues and such patriotism, I shall have done much for the generation in which I live.

And if there be any here who can declare they owe them no debt of gratitude for those benefits, I shall not dispute the sincerity of their declarations. It is not my case, however humble my debt may be. And if there be any here surrounded with Egyptian darkness, except so far as illuminated by the glimmering lights of extracts from the works of those same fathers of New England, or other authors, compiled extract upon extract, and light upon light, until they rise up high as a modern "light house in the skies!" I have only to say, that I admire the industry, although I may not emulate the labor of erecting such anti-republican and super royal structures!

And as to all those early settlements, under Daniel Boone, or other pioneers, pushed forward, either north or south of the Ohio, beyond the pale of the law; and the physical and pecuniary means of this embryo republic to protect them, when it was struggling for existence on this Atlantic coast, under all the obstacles arising from war and consequent poverty and exhaustion; and as to all the administration of Washington, I will cast the same mantle of charity over these epochs, which I have extended over the graves of the fathers of New England; and this is the only answer I shall attempt to all that has been said by the Senator from Missouri about the battles of Blue-lick and Nicajack.

But, sir, I must conclude these remarks. To know when to stop, is among the most agreeable talents of a public speaker.

The downward tendency of our countrymen to a spirit of universal office hunting, servility, and corruption—the prelude to the downfall of nations—has been remarked, with patriotic regret, by such men as Leigh, and Mercer, and others, in the late Virginia convention, and by thousands of others in our country. I appeal to all our contemporaries for the truth of such remarks. And has not the adulterated state of our Presidential elections, within the last ten years, since the race of Revolutionary worthies was exhausted, had but too much to do in this sad fall of our countrymen from that high estate of virtue and patriotism in which the fathers of the Revolution left the last generation of our men!

In this view, contemplate the metamorphosis of the Secretary of State, since the year 1789. In contemplating this, we almost involuntarily fall into a recitation of our school-boy lessons: "In nova fert animus mutatas dicere, formas, corpora"—and so on. The metamorphosis has been almost complete in only forty years! And the change has been from small harmless things, to things great and formidable. In July, 1789, that officer was created, a mere assistant to the President—a mere grey goose quill in his hands to write with—liable to be split, nibbed, pointed, broken, or thrown away by the President at will and pleasure; being not to perform separate duties of his own, but to facilitate the President in performing those duties devolved on him by the constitution, as a distinct department of the Government; subject to the personal orders of the President, and bound to write down just such words, sentences, and phrases, as he should dictate in all his negotiations and other duties. And what has this Secretary become now? Some duties of detail have been imposed by statute occasionally; but this servant at will, like other servants deprived of liberty, has contrived to make his fortune rather out of the line of his original destination. Availing himself of the faux pas of Aaron Burr in the Vice Presidency, he has shuffled himself into the direct line of succession, and now ranks, in public estimation, in the United States, with the Prince Royal of Sweden—the Prince of Wales of England—or the Dauphin of France!—ex officio candidate for the Presidency. And were the mere pageantry of this new rank all, I would not notice the circumstance. But this is not all. Consequences of the deepest import to the permanency and purity of our liberties are involved in this great metamorphosis!

No sooner is the premier warm in his Department, than he begins to scent the gale all around him for votes to make himself President at some future day!

Custom has devolved the power and patronage of the Department upon him. Custom has made him prime minister of the cabinet council; and standing thus, with a foot on the first step of the throne, and an eye upon the highest seat in the nation, he immediately begins to play Absalom at the gate, before all Israel! to wield the power and patronage of his Department to repress, obscure, and diminish his opponents, and to raise, cherish, and multiply his adherents, with a view to reign President himself, some day!

You have only to imagine all the other Departments, including the General Post Office of the United States, subservient to the "party discipline" of the premier department, and all co-operating to one main end—whether that be the re-election of a President as a stepping stone, or the election of a prime minister himself; and the story of the loss of our liberties will be sad reality!

And is there no proof of this subservency in the other Departments? There is a volume of proof! and that volume consists in the simple annunciation—"John McLean is no longer Postmaster General of the United States!" And why is he not? Because he would not prostitute himself, and the Department under his charge, to the low and corrupt party discipline and vote auctioneering of the new dynasty. The ouster of Judge McLean, to render the General Post Office subservient to the main design, and the almost indiscriminate removal of every high-minded and honorable man from office for the exercise of the elective franchise, or for a worse reason, was the declaration of war against our liberties!

And the Press! that once proud Palladium of Liberty, is subsidized and bought—sunk to a mere party engine, stationed on this floor, to misrepresent and destroy the minority! And that was the passage of the Pruthi!

The United States' Senate! once the great barrier of public safety, is to be sunk to the mere corrupt and servile register of Executive edicts! And that will be the passage of the Danube!

The Supreme Court of the United States, as yet the sheet-anchor of the ship of constitutional liberty! that is to be destroyed, either by direct assault, as the Russians would advance upon Shumla, or by throwing a dark cloud of suspicion over it, and rendering it useless, and worse than useless, as a common tribunal of the States; and some other men, or some other tribunal established in its place, as a party engine, like the corrupt courts in the worst days of Great Britain, for the destruction of opponents!—a mere grand guillotine, to cut off the heads of the minorities! And that will be the passage of the Balkan!

And then "farewell! a long farewell! to all our greatness"—until some other revolution shall restore us to our pristine elevation, under the protection of Union and Liberty, and the guidance of the Farewell Address of the Father of his Country.

[Here the debate closed for this day.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[FEB. 12 to 19, 1830.]

[From Friday, Feb. 12, to Wednesday, the 17th, (Saturday and Sunday excepted) the Senate was chiefly occupied in the consideration of Executive business.]

THURSDAY, FEB. 18, 1830.

MR. FOOT'S RESOLUTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. FOOT.

Mr. HOLMES addressed the Senate at considerable length; when he gave way for a motion for adjournment; which was carried.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1830.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution of Mr. FOOT in relation to future surveys and sales of the public lands; when Mr. HOLMES again took the floor, and concluded his argument.

[His speech, as delivered on the two days, is here given.]

Mr. H. said that, by a liberal construction of the rules, he should not be out of order if now and then he should happen to allude to the resolution. But he hated, above all things, to be entangled in questions of order; and, admonished by so many splendid examples, he should approach the subject-matter as seldom as possible—and never without a suitable apology. His chief purpose would be to defend New England against the charges made against her. She was charged with high and aggravated crimes; of perpetual hostility to our brethren of the West. The accusation spread over a period of half a century; and the perpetual hostility consisted, 1st, in our preventing settlements by limiting the surveys and sales of the lands; 2d, in attempts to circumscribe territory and surrender privileges; 3d, withholding protection, in order to prevent migration, and thereby encouraging the savages to massacre with knife, sword, and conflagration!

The Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON] after exchanging salutes with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAYNE] bore down upon New England, and poured into her this tremendous broadside. Now, from the great noise and great smoke, it was supposed that he had entirely crippled her, left her water-logged, and in a sinking condition; but the smoke was blown off, and she was seen all standing, pursuing her course, under easy sail, with her star-spangled banner floating in the breeze, unhurt and untouched; her crew gave three Yankee cheers, and returned the broadside. What was to be the issue was uncertain; but skilful judges were of opinion that the enemy was sheering off, and would be obliged to return into port to refit and repair damages.

If God gives me strength [said Mr. H.] I intend to bare my arm and lend my humble aid to defend my country from so foul a reproach, and to show, as I think I can, that the charges are not only groundless, but without the shadow of a foundation. I shall not boast, either in putting on my armor or in putting it off; but, in the impressive and expressive phrase of one of my gallant countrymen, "I'll try." I have witnessed in our opponents quite boasting enough to sicken me. The champion of the Philistines boasted and blustered much; he defied the armies of the God of Israel, and demanded an antagonist to decide the controversy; but the unassuming and humble shepherd, with his "five smooth stones from the brook, in his shepherd's bag, and his sling in his hand," being the servant of the God of Truth, went out and subdued his adversary. And I, sir, stripling as I am, armed with the panoply of truth, shall not fear to encounter any "man of Gath," though his stature be "six cubits and a span," and "the staff of his spear be like a weaver's beam." New England, my country! and though thy mountains may be bleak or barren, and thou art the region of hail stones and snow storms, where stern winter had deposited his armory—still there is a sturdy, unyielding, inflexible patriotism in thy sons, which will not suffer in a comparison with any people on earth. Massachusetts, "the cradle of independence," the birth-place of the martyred Warren, and of the patriots Hancock and Adams—Plymouth, the asylum of the pilgrims, the land of my forefathers, in whose bosom is deposited the mouldering remains of my ancestors; if I ever forsake or forget thee, may this arm fall from the shoulder-blade!

But I meet at the threshold two embarrassments: Who is the accused, and who the accuser? Whom am I to defend? At one time it is all New England; at another the federal party; and then all of these are to be excepted who are "on our side," federalist or democrat, or no matter what, provided he will worship the idol yonder. This assault is against all those in New England who had the independence and integrity to act upon principle; and this persecution is against them for no earthly cause but that they honestly believed Mr. Adams better qualified for President than General Jackson. Persecute on; heat your furnace as intensely as you may; "but be it known unto thee, oh, King! we will not serve thy God, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up!" Yours exclusively the republican party! There is not a people of the number on earth, who are so universally republican as that section of country denominated New England. Sir, every State is represented here by members not only professed but real republicans. Every one holds his place here by republican votes, without which he could not have been elected, and every one as friendly to the last administration. We are the twelve disciples of our master, the republicans of New England. Whether there may be a Judas among the twelve, or no, sure I am that there was not one Peter to deny his master in the period of proserption. No, we stood by "sorrowing." We saw the cross erected, and the friends we loved cruelly crucified, and were obliged to submit to what we could not prevent. We reasoned, we pleaded, but equally in vain; our tears and expostulations were alike disregarded. Sir, the facts attempted to be proved show clearly that no party discrimination was intended: for the accusation covers a period of nearly twenty years, when no party lines were drawn, and even the names were not known.

Again, sir, who is the accuser, the prosecutor of the indictment under which we are arraigned? Who is the West, and by whom is she represented here? Is the Senator from Missouri all the West? I had supposed that the West embraced Kentucky, part of Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, Missouri, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Now, if he prosecutes in her behalf, let us see his authority, the letter of attorney. The rest of this West is represented here, and ably too; and though two other gentlemen have opposed the resolution, neither, as I understood, has attempted to sustain this charge of perpetual hostility. Is Missouri, alone, this mighty West? Even here, while one of her Senators accuses, the other defends, the East. Missouri is equally divided, unless the accuser claims to be the majority. As to this, I don't know. If we calculate the number of words and repetitions, he leaves his colleague in a very slender minority; but, if we determine by the facts and argument, "your deponent saith not," the public will decide, if they have not already decided. Now, that a State of yesterday should make these charges and excite these sectional jealousies in a vast region of country, in which the Senator and his State has, until just now, had no interest whatever, is prophetic of no good, but of much evil.

I was not, at first, able to perceive what the constitutional question of the relative powers of the Federal and State Governments had to do with this resolution. But, upon reflection, I perceive they are intimately connected, and I therefore beg pardon for touching upon the subject.

FEB. 19, 1830.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

You will recollect that the doctrine abroad (and it has found its way into the Senate too) is, that, by virtue of the admission of a State into the Union, the public lands revert to the State: any thing in the act of cession of those lands to us, or any stipulations of the State, as the condition of her admission, to the contrary notwithstanding. You are aware, too, that there is another doctrine of the day, that, in controversies between us and a State, the ultimate and effectual decision belongs to the State. Well now, with each of these principles in each hand, the States in which our public lands are will have the power to take them in defiance of us, and they will take them. Then, until these dangerous heresies are abandoned, I would not give a feather for all your public lands within the States. And why should we survey lands which are not our own? If the State claims the lands, and has a right to decide its own case, what division are we to expect? We are to be only a claimant, a petitioner before the supreme State authority. We might, to be sure, recur to the cessions of Virginia and others, and to the object of them; we might urge the express stipulation of the ordinances for settling and governing the territories; we might appeal to the articles of admission into the Union, and insist upon their fulfilment; we might appeal to this constitution, which provides that all compacts entered into by the Confederacy were as binding under the constitution as under the Confederation, and ask what sort of a contract that was that held one party and released the other. We might, moreover, appeal to the article itself, which authorizes the admission of new States, and ask if the proviso there—which vests in Congress the exclusive management and disposal of these lands, and provides, emphatically, that nothing shall be construed to impair our claims to them—and ask triumphantly, if all this was not conclusive? And these, and a hundred other reasons equally strong, would not weigh a feather against the interest a State had in five or ten millions of acres. We should gain the argument, but we should lose the land. Until these momentous questions are finally settled, why then are we to incur the expense of surveying lands which may never belong to us? If a State expects that we must survey its lands at our expense, it is, I should think, taxing our generosity a little too far. It has an equal right to demand that we should also cultivate them.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ROWAN] has discussed the question of the ultimate tribunal which is to decide a controversy that involves the powers of the United States and a particular State. His notions in regard to the social and the political compact are too refined, sublimated, and anti-constitutional for me. I shall seize upon his inferences, and, in my old-fashioned and clumsy way, take up the argumentum ab inconvenientie, and pursue his conclusions to their final results. I shall not stop to inquire whether some other tribunal than the Supreme Court might not have been devised more impartial and wise. Nor shall I insist that this Supreme Court may not have erred in extending the federal at the expense of the State rights. It is in the nature of man thus to err. And if any error has occurred in its decisions on constitutional questions, I readily admit that these errors have not very frequently been in favor of "State rights," against the federal powers. But I cannot well perceive what other tribunal could have been invented which would have done better. That Congress, according to his suggestion, should have been this Court of appellate jurisdiction in these cases, is to me a strange proposition. The small States would scarcely feel very safe in the hands of the popular branch; and how the judicial decision could be made, whether by a joint or a concurrent vote, he has not informed us.

It, however, is enough for me, that the constitution has vested the power here contended for, in express terms, in the Supreme Court. This constitution, and the laws made pursuant to its authority, are to be "the supreme law of the land, any constitution or law of a State to the contrary notwithstanding." A Supreme Court is established, having original jurisdiction in few cases, appellate jurisdiction in all others arising under the constitution and laws made pursuant thereto. The laws of the United States are made supreme, and those of the States subordinate; and the court is to be the final tribunal in deciding upon these supreme laws. Now to suppose that the laws of the Union are supreme, and those of the States are subordinate, and that the State courts, in their decisions upon them, are supreme, and those of the United States are subordinate, is an utter absurdity. The very statement of the proposition proves that it is perfectly ridiculous. Allow a State, in a controversy of this kind, to decide ultimately and definitely, and to carry its decision into full effect, and you are re-translated into the old confederation, if nothing worse. The principal, and almost the only defect in that confederation was, that it was advisory or directory, but not coercive. This coercive power was almost all that was wanted. If we have not that, "all we have gained is naught but empty boast of old achievement, and despair of new."

But the Senator from Kentucky, as I understood him, takes another ground: that a sovereign State has no power to surrender any portion of its sovereignty. I confess, sir, that unless others very much misunderstood this word sovereignty, it is very much misunderstood by me. I had supposed that a sovereign was he who had a right to execute his own will without any legal restraint or control. This is absolute sovereignty, and in this sense scarcely a civilized nation on earth is absolutely sovereign, as there is no one which is not subject to the law of nations, either prescriptive or conventional.

Man, in a state of nature, is an absolute sovereign, being subject to no legal restraint, and having the right to execute his will in defiance of legal control. If, then, a State cannot renounce any portion of its sovereignty, neither can man; he cannot surrender any portion of his natural rights for the better security of the rest. If he can surrender no portion of them, much less can he surrender the whole. And as subjugation must be by force or surrender, and as force may always be resisted by force, why may not the slave, having more bodily strength than his master, rise up against him and subdue him? Remember that these are not my premises. I only take his, and follow them out in all their results. I forbear to pursue this train in the argument, lest I should disturb the terrific ghost of the "Missouri question," which has so much affected the nerves of the Senator from Missouri. Thus we see how dangerous it is to go back behind the constitutional enactments, to unsettle what has been already settled. But, sir, it is inexpedient that I should discuss this subject farther. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER] has done it ample justice. It were vain for me to attempt to add any thing to what he has said. I do not aspire to do him even justice, much less to compliment him. But I will say, that, in my view, his argument on this point is unanswered and unanswerable. It was on this question, between that gentleman and the Senator from South Carolina, that the Senator from Missouri introduced his chaste, elegant, and classic figure of the "kick-up-horse and the monkey on his back." I did not readily perceive its application. I suppose by the "kick-up-horse, he intended the Senator from Massachusetts, but who was his "monkey?" If this was intended as another salute, it was a little uncourteous, to say the least.

The Senator from Kentucky considers the question of internal improvement as settled, and he yields to the doctrine as res judicata; and so do I. And if so in that case, why not in this? If there is any one principle in our constitution that has more than another been settled by legislation, adjudication, and general acquiescence, it is this: that, in a conflict of power between the United States and a State, the final efficient tribunal is the Supreme Court. Virginia had pronounced the alien and sedition laws unconstitutional, and transmitted her resolutions to the Legislatures of other States. I will read you the answer of Massachusetts: "This Legislature are persuaded that the decision of all cases of law and equity arising under the constitution of the United States, and the construction of all laws made in pursuance thereof, are exclusively vested by the people in the judicial courts of the United States; that the people, in that solemn compact which is declared the supreme law of the land, have not constituted the State Legislatures the judges of the acts or measures of the Federal Government." At this time it will be remembered that Virginia was in a political minority, and Massachusetts in a majority, in the federal councils. After this, when the scales had shifted, and the balance was the other way, it seems there was great excitement in Pennsylvania on the decision of the federal court in Olmstead's case. So great was it, that the militia were ordered out to resist the marshal, and they actually took the field, under a General Bright. But this mighty army levied no war; the marshal executed his precept, and the peace was not at all disturbed; and the Legislature of that State adopted the constitutional mode of redress for the supposed grievance. They proposed to amend the constitution, and establish some other tribunal to determine such controversies, and transmitted their resolutions to the other States. Virginia was now in a political majority, and I will read you the unanimous opinion of her Senate on the subject. The committee who had the resolutions of Pennsylvania under consideration, were "of opinion that a tribunal is already provided by the constitution of the United States, viz: the Supreme Court, more eminently qualified, from their habits and duties, from the mode of their selection, and from the tenure of their offices, to decide the dispute aforesaid in an enlightened and impartial manner, than any other tribunal which could be created." The report gives the reasons for the opinion, and was unanimously accepted. Gentlemen will find it quoted in the case of Cohens vs. Virginia, 6 Wheaton, 358. The decisions of this tribunal have always been submitted to as the last resort in these questions, and I regret to hear its doctrines denounced at this day as damnable, and the court as a tyrannical "Star Chamber." But suppose a State to consider herself aggrieved in a case plain and palpable, there are three constitutional modes in which she can obtain redress: first, by the judiciary; second, by an appeal to the people at the polls and ballot boxes; third, by calling upon the States to amend the constitution. Now suppose all these fail, and the grievance is, in the opinion of the State, as plain and palpable as ever, one of two courses must be pursued: our own decisions must be enforced, and the State coerced; or, adopting the opinion of a late Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. Macon] if a State will not submit, let her go. Withdraw your power and protection, send home her Senators and Representatives, and let the State set up for itself, and, in a very short time, it will come back and supplicate you to receive it again.

And should either of the enterprising youths of the family of the West, the East, or the South, become discontented, and wish to leave his father's house, and ask for the portion which belongs to him, and we should deal it out to him and let him go, and he should take a journey into a far country, and there "waste his substance in riotous living," or some other way, (for waste it he surely would) and there should be "a famine in the land, and he should begin to be in want," and to "feed upon husks," and "no one should give unto him," he would then "come to himself," and begin to reflect, (for adversity is an excellent school for reflection) and would say, "how many hired servants in my father's house have bread enough and to spare," (and here the analogy is very close, for many of our servants have enough and to spare) "and I perish with hunger; I will arise and go to my father, acknowledge my guilt and folly, and that I am unworthy to be his son, and beg to be received as a servant;" and he should come: now, here too, "the father would see him while he was yet a great way off, have compassion on him, run out to meet him, fall upon his neck and kiss him, order a new robe to be put on him, and the fatted calf to be killed;" and we should all be merry together. So that, instead of the "blood and carnage" which the Senator from Missouri seems so willing to predict, I am inclined to believe the whole affair would be settled in this good natured, affectionate, family way. I regret to hear disunion and civil discord so often predicted or threatened with so much apparent exultation, and I respond to the Senator from Massachusetts, the Union—the Union, in the exercise of all its legitimate powers—the Union forever!

I now will, as briefly as I can, examine the charges of hostility, with their specifications, passing swiftly over those which have been so repeatedly and so triumphantly refuted by the distinguished gentlemen who have gone before me. I should not again have noticed the charge so completely answered, that the first sales of our Western lands were limited to each single township in succession, had not the Senator from Missouri persisted in repeating it. But, though vanquished, he argues still. We have given reasons conclusive, that the safety of the frontier settlers required it; there was, from the close of the Revolution to 1791, a quasi war with Indians; the settlers were in a constant state of alarm and danger; it was the opinion of Washington that it would be impossible to defend the frontiers unless the settlements were compact. In 1791 was the flagrant disastrous war; which continued until Wayne's victory in 1794, or rather until the treaty of Greenville of the next year.

But as soon as it could be done with safety, the surveys and sales not only kept pace with, but were far in advance of the demand. The very next year after the treaty of Greenville, the act of 18th May, 1796, was passed, directing that, "without delay," the lands north of Kentucky river, and seven ranges of townships west of the Ohio, should be surveyed and brought into market. By this act, the credit system was established, and the price of the lands fixed. The act of 1800 gave further facilities; and this brings this branch of evidence of hostility down to the close of General Washington's administration. As this is an important epoch in our history, I will bring all the charges up to this period. New England is moreover charged with attempting to limit territory, and surrender privileges, in a spirit of hostility to the West. And how is this? In the summer of 1781, at a very gloomy period of the revolutionary war, when Cornwallis had marched triumphantly through the Southern States, and supposed them completely subdued, and was, with his victorious army, advancing upon Virginia, it was then that Congress thought of surrendering remoter interests, to preserve those which were essential and vital; and well might the purest patriot have proposed it, in our then critical and perilous condition. But, sir, it is worthy of remark, that the proposition to surrender the navigation of the Mississippi to Spain, as the price of her alliance and aid, was defeated by New England. On the proposition to instruct Mr. Jay, our minister, to make this concession, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and North Carolina, were against it; New York was divided; and, one State being absent, there were not nine in the affirmative, and the proposition failed. If the Senator from Missouri did intend to turn this vote into hostility, I will turn it back. Here Mr. H. read from Chief Justice Marshall's Life of Washington, as follows:

"In the present inauspicious state of public affairs, Congress, for the first time, manifested a disposition to sacrifice remote interests, though of great future magnitude, for immediate advantages; and directed their minister at Madrid to relinquish, if it should be absolutely necessary, the claims of the United States to navigate the Mississippi below the thirty-first degree of North latitude, and to a free port on the banks of that river, within the Spanish territory. It is remarkable that only Massachusetts, Connecticut, and North Carolina, dissented from this resolution; New York was divided."

Mr. H. proceeded. Afterwards, it seems to be admitted, that, when our prospects were brighter, and a similar proposition was made, it was unanimously rejected. The Senator has sought in vain to find what member offered the proposition, hoping, no doubt, it would turn out that he was an inveterate Yankee. Well, let us proceed. On the 7th March, 1792, the President sent to the Senate (as was the practice then) the instructions to be given to our minister to Spain, for their advice and consent. In these instructions, the thirty-first degree of latitude, and the free navigation of the Mississippi, were each of them made a sine qua non. These indispensable conditions were unanimously approved by the Senate. The negotiations were arduous and protracted. The West became uneasy and jealous, and demanded of the President the instructions. A French officer had been authorized, by the minister of the republic here, to raise a body of troops in Kentucky, to take and occupy New Orleans. The President had called upon the Governor of that State to aid, with his militia, the army of the United States in that quarter, to arrest any such expedition, if it should be attempted. The Governor thought he had no constitutional power, and General Wayne was ordered to Fort Massac, to arrest any enterprise moving down the river.

But, in 1796, the treaty arrived which secured these great objects, and, on the 3d of March, of that year, it was unanimously approved by the Senate. Here, sir, ends the second chapter of our hostility to the West—up to the close of Washington's administration. The Indians had been beaten into a peace, the lands had been surveyed and offered for sale, the Western posts had been surrendered to us, and the navigation of the Mississippi had been secured.

I will now go back once more, and bring up the most flagrant charge of all: that, for the purpose of preventing emigration, New England had constantly withheld protection from the frontiers, and thereby encouraged the savages to murder, with knife, sword, and conflagration. Sir, it is very true that New England has always been engaged in active and sanguinary hostility towards the West. Not against, but for her. New England blood has flowed copiously and profusely in defence of our brethren of the West.

Sir, I will repel this charge, and defend the insulted honor of my countrymen. You will find in the resolves of the old Congress, of the 1st and 12th of April, 1785, that seven hundred troops were raised "to protect the settlers on the frontiers"—from Connecticut, one hundred and sixty-five; New York, one hundred and sixty-five; New Jersey, one hundred and ten; and Pennsylvania, two hundred and sixty. It has been urged that, on the 22d June, 1786, Massachusetts voted against sending two companies to the Falls of the Ohio; but it should have been added that her reasons were, that she did not believe an Indian war was probable, and that she wished a different organization of the Indian Department. The same reasons influenced her to refuse to employ the thousand Virginia militia. But, in October of that same year, finding that an Indian war was inevitable, it was unanimously resolved to raise thirteen hundred and forty men, and that the quotas should be thus: New Hampshire, two hundred and sixty; Massachusetts, six hundred and sixty; Rhode Island, one hundred and twenty; Connecticut, one hundred and eighty; Maryland, sixty; and Virginia, sixty—twelve hundred and twenty of the thirteen hundred and forty from New England! By a resolve of the 3d October, 1787, seven hundred troops were raised for the same purpose: Connecticut, one hundred and sixty-five; New York, one hundred and sixty-five; New Jersey, one hundred and ten; Pennsylvania, two hundred and sixty. By the act of the 29th September, 1789, Congress, under the new constitution, recognized this last force, and, in addition, authorized the President to call out the militia to protect the frontiers. The act of 7th October, 1790, increased the army to twelve hundred and sixteen effectives, to constitute a regiment of infantry, (the first regiment) and a battalion of artillery, of four companies. Of these, about four hundred were in Harmar's defeat, if it was a defeat. The act of 3d March, 1791, authorized the second regiment. These two regiments of infantry, and that battalion of artillery, were the whole regular force in the disastrous campaign of 1791. St. Clair's force engaged was about fifteen hundred, of which a little more than one-third were regular troops. The first regiment was not in the engagement, for the fugitives from that scene of slaughter met Major Hamtramck, with that regiment, at "Fort Jefferson." The second regiment, of twelve companies, was, with the exception of one company from Delaware, under the gallant Kirkwood, exclusively from New England. I infer it from my own recollections, and from the fact that two of the majors were from Massachusetts, and the other from Connecticut; that the captains and subalterns of six of the twelve companies were from Massachusetts, two from Connecticut, one from New Hampshire, and one from Rhode Island.

I well remember, though I was then but a child, that one of the companies of that regiment was raised in my own neighborhood, the old county of Plymouth. They were fine young men, the sons of independent yeomen, were easy and safe at home. But the cries of their suffering brethren of the West reached them, and their patriotic souls arose. They were led off (I shall never forget it) by an officer by the name of Warren, in whose veins circulated the blood which was kindred to that of another Warren, who had previously, at Bunker's Hill, poured out his as an offering to the infant liberties of his country. He was a brave and elegant officer. They marched; they joined St. Clair's army, and were in the fatal battle. They did not run at the first fire, as some of the troops in that engagement did. They fought, as New England troops always fight, arm to arm, and breast to breast. They fell—every man of them! Not one officer or soldier of that brave company ever returned to bring back the fatal tidings! Their bodies were left a prey to the wolf and the vulture; their bones are now bleaching in the forest and the fields. And is it well to blast the memory of such self-devoted patriots? And by whom? By Missouri. And pray, at this eventful crisis, where was Missouri? In the cradle of her existence? No, not even there. The province of a foreign despot. This is the unkindest cut of all; the most uncharitable.

This defeat was on the 4th of November, and the news of it arrived at the seat of government in December. The President immediately communicated it to Congress, and recommended an addition to the standing army. Mr. Madison, chairman of the Select Committee to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill which provided, in the first section, for filling the vacancies in the then existing forces, and in the second, for raising three additional regiments of infantry, and a corps of cavalry; making, in the whole, a regular army of about five thousand men. This second section was opposed. It was contended that, by one single regiment and battalion of artillery, the Government incurred an expense of more than one hundred thousand dollars a year; that the second regiment had increased it to three hundred thousand; that this addition would require at least a million; that the funds were not equal to meet the expense; and that the border militia could better defend the frontiers than a regular force. This last opinion had been urged upon the President by all the Representatives of the counties in Kentucky and Western Virginia. But the President had learnt from experience how little reliance, in great emergencies, was to be placed upon militia. He gave conciliatory answers to the memorials, but followed the dictates of his own judgment.

On a motion to strike out the second section, which provided for this additional force, the House of Representatives divided—eighteen for, and thirty-four against, striking out. In this division, if I recollect, a majority of Massachusetts and Rhode Island were against the section; New Hampshire a majority, and Connecticut unanimously for it; Virginia and South Carolina a majority for, and North Carolina and Georgia against it. Now, what inference would the Senator from Missouri draw from these facts, of Southern friendship or Eastern hostility? In the Senate the section was stricken out, by a majority of one, the late President Monroe voting with the majority. It was, however, restored by a Committee of Conference, and the bill passed. Still Congress knew very well that means must be provided, and by the act of the 2d May of the same year, entitled An act for the protection of the frontiers, but in reality a tariff, raised the supplies for the army, and anticipated the revenues by a loan of five hundred thousand dollars, for the payment of which these very revenues were pledged. Wayne achieved the victory of Miami in August, 1794, and it was followed by the treaty of Greenville, of 1795.

The British treaty was ratified in the same year, and in 1796 the Western posts were surrendered to the United States. At the time of Washington's Farewell Address, the West was in perfect security; the Indians had been subdued; the Northwestern posts acquired; the navigation of the Mississippi secured; and the lands were ready for sale to the settlers. Combine all these facts, and then say, is there to this time evidence of hostility of the East against the West? But to establish my proof beyond all cavil or doubt, I will introduce one witness, who, for general intelligence, knowledge of the facts, and character for veracity, will not suffer in a comparison even with the Senator from Missouri himself; nay, more, whose testimony is perfect verity; more still, which, for prophecy, as well as truth, stands next to Holy Writ. That witness is George Washington. His legacy was promulgated at the close of 1796. First, as to the prophecy:

"In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern, that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations—Northern and Southern, Atlantic and Western; whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of party to acquire influence, within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from these misrepresentations: they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection."

Isaiah himself could not have predicted more accurately. We see it with our eyes: we hear it with our ears: it is fulfilling this moment. Now to the testimony:

"The inhabitants of our Western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head. They have seen in the negotiation by the Executive, and in the unanimous ratification by the Senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at the event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them, of a policy in the General Government, and in the Atlantic States, unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties—that with Great Britain, and that with Spain; which secure to them every thing they could desire, in respect to our foreign relations, towards confirming their prosperity."

Having repelled and refuted the charges against my section of country, up to the close of Washington's administration, (at least to my own satisfaction) I will now take up my line of march, and bring them all down to the present period.

Since this period, the public lands have been the "foster child" of the Government. Including purchases by treaty, about four hundred public acts have been passed to encourage the sale and settlement of the public lands. I will not torture the Senate with a particular detail, but glance at some of our general principles, and give a few prominent examples; and it is astonishing what care and promptitude are here manifested. The cession of Georgia was in 1802; and on the 3d of March, 1803, we provided for confirming foreign titles, quieting settlers, and surveying the residue. The next year similar provisions were made for Indiana. The cession of Louisiana was in 1803; possession was delivered the next year, and by the act of the 2d March, 1805, the same measures were adopted in regard to the lands there.

By the act of the 24th April, 1820, the credit system was abolished, and the price reduced to one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre; and by that of the 2d March, 1821, "the relief" was given, by which about nine millions of dollars were released to the debtors. How very hostile all this to the suffering West!

But that the low price of lands in Maine should be urged as evidence of our hostility to the West, is of all things the most laughable. Suppose, sir, that we had graduated our prices with a view to compete with the United States; is this hostility? Competition is the soul of enterprise. If I offer to undersell you, am I therefore your enemy? No, sir; it is only when a man attempts to destroy his competitor, to get him out of his way, that the competition becomes wicked. This is that with which New England is now charged, and the charge is groundless. The Senator apprehends that his "graduation bill" induced Maine to reduce the price of her lands. Now, I doubt if those who have the management of our lands ever heard of his graduation bill in their lives. Even it is questionable if they ever heard of him; sure I am that they never understood the full scope of his talents. That Senator, begging his pardon, has not yet learnt our system of lands. It is, I regret to say, a very bad one. Massachusetts before, and Maine since the separation, have pursued a policy very injurious to settlements. They have sold in large quantities to speculators. A million of acres, nearly, in the centre of the State, is now in the hands of foreigners, so that it cannot be approached by settlers. The State in a measure still pursues the same policy. A single case will illustrate our whole system. Very lately the agent sold a half township for seventy-five cents per acre—the purchaser, the same day, sold one-half of his purchase for the whole consideration, and now the cultivator could not probably purchase for five dollars. Yet, it is not at all strange that this Senator should imagine that we have done all this in utter hostility to his graduation bill. Nothing is more natural than that we should think that others are speaking of, or acting upon, what is uppermost in our own minds. This graduation bill (and I never saw it in my life) is, no doubt, his darling object—one upon which he expects to erect a monument to his fame. Now, nothing is more true than that we are partial to our own offspring. Though it may be very ugly, yet the parent supposes it the prettiest little creature in the world. So here, whatever is done, anywhere, must have some allusion to "my graduation bill."

Sir, as to giving away the public lands, or selling them at a nominal price, which is the same thing, I may have occasion to say a word hereafter, and to inquire into the justice or policy of such liberality. My own opinion is, and I would venture to submit the point to the Senators from Ohio themselves, that that State now contains more population, wealth, intelligence, and moral worth, than it would if the lands from the first had been given them.

The opposition to the purchase of Louisiana has been triumphantly seized upon as conclusive evidence of New England hostility. Here, too, the Senator from Missouri will find that he has been most unlucky, and has cruelly mangled his friends. The first outcry against this came from "magnanimous Virginia." You recollect, sir, the pretended disclosure of the two millions sent out to Amsterdam to subsidize France—France wants money, and she must have it! and all that sort of thing: this came from a distinguished Virginian. Now I believe the whole of this affair was this: that the two millions was an intended deposit to facilitate the negotiation for Louisiana; but, however important the acquisition of Louisiana might be, (and I never doubted its importance) I think a statesman might very honestly oppose it without incurring the imputation of hostility to any one. The right of the United States to acquire a foreign territory and population was seriously questioned by some very honest politicians and distinguished Statesmen. And if this were now res nova, and presented as a mere constitutional point, disconnected with any great expediency, or important crisis, it would puzzle many of us to find the powers in the constitution which would authorize the purchase. At any rate, if men were then to be found who would not sacrifice their oaths to any expediency, it is most illiberal and unjust to impugn their motive, or imagine that they were sinister. I therefore demand the proof of this hostility in this case.

Mr. Monroe's nomination as minister to France was opposed in the Senate. Mr. Livingston and he were associated to accomplish the object. But Mr. Livingston was unanimously confirmed; and hence my colleague [Mr. SPRAGUE] has put the question, If this vote against Mr. Monroe were hostility to the measure, why was Livingston, who was to accomplish the object, unanimously confirmed? This question, until answered, throws this surmise to the winds. The treaty of cession was opposed; five from New England voting against it. Now, the very fact that a proposition was made to obtain the consent of the States to its ratification, is conclusive that the objection was a constitutional one. There were, moreover, serious doubts whether there were not contradictory stipulations in that treaty.

But there were other and stronger objections still to the admission of Louisiana into the Union. Though Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson both, and many others, believed that her admission was forbidden by the constitution, yet, at that time, 1812, it would be clearly an infraction of the treaty of cession to admit her. By the third article, the inhabitants were to become citizens, to have equal rights with our own, and to be admitted into the Union as soon as possible. By the seventh article, the subjects of France and Spain were, for twelve years, to trade there on the same footing as our own citizens. Now, when Louisiana applied, and was in fact admitted, three years of the twelve had yet to expire. As by the constitution no State can have any privilege of commerce not common to all, it was manifest that the admission of Louisiana at that time, was either a violation of the constitution, or of the treaty of cession. The question presented was, shall we place ourselves in this dilemma, or postpone Louisiana only three years longer? However partial I might have been to Louisiana, I should have voted to postpone her, and ventured to incur the imputation of hostility to the West, rather than the responsibility of the infraction of the treaty of cession. And France does complain of this act as an infraction of that treaty, and many of our merchants are now suffering—France refusing to indemnify them until we compensate her for the injury she has sustained by our admission of Louisiana into the Union before the expiration of the twelve years.

But Mississippi, "part of the old thirteen"—here could be no constitutional objection—and all opposition to its admission must be hostility to the West, and nothing else. Sir, I do not pretend to very great geographical accuracy, nor would I willingly intrude upon that Senator's dominions, but it is, I confess, the first time I have been informed that the State of Mississippi was at all embraced within the old thirteen. I did understand that the eastern side line of that State ran south into the Gulf of Mexico, and that the southern line included all islands within six leagues of the coast. Now, I never understood that the Gulf of Mexico there, or any of its islands, were to be found north of the thirty-first degree of latitude. If I am right in this, the same constitutional objection would arise here as in the case of Louisiana; and this was probably the reason why the minority voted against the bill authorizing that territory to form a constitution preparatory to its admission into the Union. But the objection having been twice overruled, it was probably considered as res judicata; hence, on the resolution of admission, there was no objection, nor was there any to Alabama, two years after, when that State was admitted. Sir, allow me to read the opinion of a distinguished statesman on this constitutional question:

"On further consideration as to the amendment to our constitution, respecting Louisiana, I have thought it better, instead of enumerating the powers which Congress may exercise, to give them the same powers they have, as to other portions of the Union generally, and to enumerate the special exceptions in some such form as the following:

"Louisiana, as ceded by France to the United States, is made a part of the United States; its white inhabitants shall be citizens, and stand, as to their rights and obligations, on the same footing with other citizens of the United States, in analogous situations: save only that, as to the portion thereof lying north of an east and west line drawn through the mouth of Arkansas river, no new State shall be established, nor any grants of land made, other than to Indians, in exchange for equivalent portions of land occupied by them, until an amendment of the constitution shall be made for these purposes."

"Florida, also, whensoever it may be rightfully obtained, shall become a part of the United States; its white inhabitants shall thereupon be citizens, and shall stand, as to their rights and obligations, on the same footing with other citizens of the United States, in analogous situations. I quote this for your consideration, observing that the less that is said about any constitutional difficulty, the better; and that it will be desirable for Congress to do what is necessary in silence."

This, to be sure, is a singular document. The proposition, if I understand it, is so to amend the constitution now, as to admit all south of the mouth of the Arkansas, about latitude thirty-four, and reserve all north, including the whole of Missouri, and nearly all the Arkansas Territory, for Indians and wild beasts, until the constitution should be amended again. Now, this must have been some inveterate Yankee, whose hostility was such, that he would even benefit the South at the expense of the West. No such thing, sir; he was a statesman of "the generous South," of "magnanimous Virginia!" the apostle of the republican party, the Mahomet of the faithful, the illustrious Jefferson!

Now, sir, were that patriot alive and here, he might, in five minutes, explain his motives to our perfect satisfaction. This single case proves the cruelty and injustice of quoting the opinions of men who cannot be here to explain, for the purpose of impugning their motives. And shall we, the Senate of the United States, once the most august assembly in the world, thus "dig up dead men from their graves, and set them at their dear friends' doors, when the grief is almost forgot, and on their skins (as on the bark of trees) carve, in Roman letters, 'let not your sorrows die, though I am dead!'" Sir, the public man here, can have very little inheritance, to transmit to his descendants, except the trifle of reputation which he may acquire—small indeed—from the frettings of party collision and private animosity. Suppose, then, that, in some half century hence, when you and the Senator from Missouri, and I, and all of us, shall be slumbering in our humble tombs, and mingling with our kindred earth; when even our children shall all have gone after us, and some little female orphan shall be groping her way through the path of this wilderness—the world, beset with thorns, and briars, and thistles, as we know; with few roses and flowers, as God knows; having nothing for her passport but the little fame her ancestor might have acquired here; and some malignant spirit, some ambitious demagogue, should rise up in this Senate, and, by ransacking the Journals, selecting detached votes, “here a little and there a little,” succeed in blasting his fame, and thus robbing her of her last pittance of inheritance; the very thought would prompt us to start from our seats, take our hats, make our bow, and bid an everlasting adieu to these walls; to retire to our native homes, where our fathers “toiled with their own hands, and all our frugal ancestors were blessed with humble virtue and a rural life—there live retired,” weep over the degradations of our degraded country, and “content ourselves to be obscurely good,” for when vice prevails and scandal holds the rule, “the post of honor is a private station.”

But the objections to the admission of Missouri into the Union have been summoned in aid of the proof of the hostility of New England to the West. If the votes here prove any thing, they prove the hostility of the West against itself: for I believe that every vote of the Representatives of the States northwest of the Ohio was against the admission of Missouri without the restriction against slavery. The inference is, therefore, irresistible, that no hostility was intended, but that a great moral and benevolent principle was the governing principle in that controversy.

The Senator from South Carolina, in speaking of the part which others from New England acted in that question, took care not to include the individual who now addresses you, unless it was in his general et cetera. I presume he intended nothing invidious: for generally, in the decorum in debate, and the deportment and dignity which belongs to the Senator, there are very few whose example I would follow sooner than the example of that gentleman. [Here the Senator from South Carolina rose, and stated that Mr. H. was mistaken; that he did not allude to this question, but to the conduct in New England during the war; and that he had no intention of making, in that, any discrimination invidious to Mr. H. and complimenting him for his conduct on that occasion.] I know [said Mr. H.] that he could have intended no such thing; but the Senator from Missouri went farther, and, as I thought, paid my friend from Connecticut a compliment at my expense. Now, sir, considering the condition in which I was placed on that appalling question, I cannot say that I feel entirely careless of this. Sir, I have learnt from my observation of men and things, that there is no rational human being to whose good opinion I would be indifferent, and consequently I would not feel entirely indifferent to this; although, of all the gentlemen with whom I have had any acquaintance, there are very few whose opinion I could better dispense with.

Sir, this discussion of this question of slavery was unnecessary. The Senator from Massachusetts, as I understood him, was discussing the merits of the ordinance of 1787, which excluded involuntary servitude; and, as an evidence of the wisdom of this provision, he noticed the relative prosperity of Ohio and Kentucky. He expressly disclaimed any intention to disparage or depreciate the highly respectable State of Kentucky. But it is unnecessary that I should become his justifier or apologist—he can speak for himself—he has spoken. Be his views what they may, I utterly disclaim all intention to depreciate in the least that State. I know too well the courage and patriotism of her gallant sons. I have experienced here too much of the talents and eloquence of her statesmen to degrade myself in attempting to degrade her. One of her sons—her son did I say?—no! The son of the West!—no! His pure patriotism, sterling integrity, splendid eloquence, and incorruptible republican principles, are the treasure of the whole people. And although the arrows of calumny, dipped in poison, have been showered profusely at his bosom, they have fallen harmless at his feet; and should he ever be elevated to the highest honors in the gift of a free people, which are the highest on earth, the bosom of the West, and of Kentucky in particular, will swell with patriotic pride, that their favorite has met the reward of his patriotism. But should it be otherwise—for the ways of the Great Disposer of Events are, to us, mysterious—“clouds and darkness are round about him”—should this distinguished individual, like Brutus, become a victim of his own republican virtues; should he even share a similar fate; should his tomb be as humble as that of the humblest slave; the future republican of the West, if republican there should be, will feel the big tear starting in his eye, when his infant shall lisped the name of HENRY CLAY!

Sir, I saw no good reason to bring slavery into discussion here. It is not pretended that we have a right to interfere with the condition of the inhabitants of a State. I was against the proposed restriction upon Missouri, not for reasons given in this debate, but because I did not believe the constitution gave us the power to impose it; and I did hope that, by scattering those already here, we should better their condition. So strong are the feelings of my constituents on this subject, that, when it is touched, I feel myself on the brink of a precipice. It is one upon which they will scarcely stop to reason; and I feel myself bound to protest that the arguments urged here, in favor of slavery, are not, and never were mine, and I utterly disclaim them. In the Missouri question it was pretended by no one to justify slavery in the abstract; I did not vote upon the ground that slavery, as has been contended, was profit; I believed, and still believe, that it is very unprofitable; but, if otherwise, it can never be defended on that ground. Nor did I suppose that slavery was strength; but, on the contrary, that it was weakness. Nor that it refined, sublimated, and exalted, republican principles. New England would much prefer the old fashioned, ungarished republicanism, extended to all, rather than that transcendent refinement produced by a contrast with slavery. Much less was it pretended that slavery was inculcated or countenanced by the Gospel. An opinion so apparently impious never was lisped by any one. That a religion which breathed peace on earth, and good will to men, whose invitation was, “come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest; take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for my yoke is easy and my burden is light,” should be quoted to justify slavery, indicates to me a perversion of its spirit, without a parallel. No, sir, the plea then was, we have slaves, and we can't help it. “We have the wolf by the ear, and we cannot hold him nor safely let him go.” I have now before me an original letter from Mr. Jefferson, which holds the language on this subject which I have quoted. But if this line should be marked deeper and deeper, the sin will be at the door of the slave-holding States. Since the decision of the Missouri question, nine-tenths of the excitement has been produced from the South itself. It is by stirring the question, and by arguments such as have been urged in this debate, which will provoke discussion, and revive all the angry passions which once became so alarming.

I now come to the last branch of the charge, which was finished down to the close of Washington's administration;

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

withholding protection, and encouraging the savages. Sir, after the treaty of Greenville, and the surrender of the Western posts, I recollect few instances in which the West needed protection, until just before the late war with Great Britain. During that Indian war, I would ask, in what instance did New England withhold her aid? At Tippecanoe the victory was achieved by the efficient aid of the brave fourth, commanded by the gallant and proscribed Harrison. The victory at Brownstown was achieved by the brave but unassuming Miller, and his Spartan band, from New England. And even during the late war, where is the evidence of our hostility to the West? My colleague has occupied the whole ground. Allowing that the ruling party in New England conducted as bad as had been described—and God forbid I should attempt to justify their measures—still, that the motive was hostility to the West, is not only an inconsequence, but the evidence adduced shows clearly that it was totally different, viz: hostility to the administration.

The Hartford Convention was a rash measure, and particularly objectionable at the time. It was opposed on the ground, too, of its sectional character—its tendency to excite local jealousies, against which we were so solemnly and affectionately warned by the Father of his Country in his Farewell Address. It was the same spirit which I have lately witnessed in the South, and which we now witness in this attack upon New England. I will condemn it at all times, and every where. I have little doubt that the madness referred to was as great, in many instances, as the specimens exhibited by the Senator from South Carolina indicated. The Osgoods, Parishes, and Gardiners, of that day, were madmen—maniacs. It is not improbable that some one of them would have consigned over any one who should loan money to the Government, to the three distinguished personages* mentioned by that gentleman; and that, if he had thought of it, he would have put into the list your humble servant, not by striking out and inserting, but by adding him to the end of the list, immediately after His Infernal Majesty, in order to cap the climax. Sir, clergymen are bad politicians; they are generally ignorant of the subject, become enthusiasts, profane the pulpit, and thus injure the cause which they espouse. The clergymen of the Revolution, though generally Whigs, were often outraged all decency. I recollect this anecdote: One was praying in his pulpit, very fervently and appropriately; he came, at length, to ask a blessing on the season, that we might have alternate showers and sunshine, in order that we might have good crops, so that, at the close thereof, we might come with a meat offering and drink offering; but he superadded "more especially we pray for good crops of hemp, to make ropes to hang the Tories." This, to be sure, was profanation. But, politically, it looked forward to two important objects: to dispose of the Tories, who then were a very great annoyance; and to "domestic industry"—pointing out the object and the market. So that the Senator from South Carolina will perceive that Massachusetts was "tariff" at a very early period.

But New England is not to be charged with opposition; nor is even the party there exclusively culpable. Other politicians of high character, in other parts of the Union, were as intemperate as they were. As early as 1806, a distinguished statesman of Virginia was the leader of this New England party. He was known as such at home and abroad. I have before me a review of certain pamphlets, published in England, and reviewed in the Edinburgh Review of that period, entitled "War in Disguise;" "Concessions to America the Bane of Great Britain;" "Oil without Vinegar, and Honor without Pride," &c.; in which this same gentleman is honored as "the orator of a party confessedly hostile to the Government." Down to the close of the war, the same opposition to the Government continued elsewhere, as well as in New England; and we know that some of the most violent have been very lately rewarded for their adhesion to this administration.

But, notwithstanding the opposition of a party in New England, the blood of New England flowed copiously and profusely in that war—on the ocean, the land, and the lakes. Who were they who compelled "the mistress of the ocean" to "douse the cross of St. George" to "the star spangled banner?" New Englanders. Who fought at Lundy's Lane, at Niagara, and at Erie? New Englanders. Yes, sir, more New England blood was spilt, and more prowess displayed, from the hardy sons of New England, in that conflict, in proportion to her population, than from any other portion of the United States; and for the protection of the Western frontier, too, whose inveterate foe we have always been. Who composed the crews of the fleets on Erie, Ontario, and Champlain, under your Perry, your Chauncey, and Macdonough? The same hardy unyielding race, "the sons of the pilgrims." And this, sir, is the hostility for which we have been denounced and proscribed, and put "under the ban of the empire!"

The Senator from Missouri has introduced the dinner given in Boston to General Hull, at the close of the war, as evidence of this hostility. Yet he is professing to exempt the republicans who supported the war from the charge. In this case he has certainly been very unfortunate; and when scattering his "firebrands, arrows, and death," whether in sport or not, he dashes them indiscriminately at friends and foes. I happen to know a thing or two about that dinner. The truth is, it was gotten up by the republicans. A certain Mr. Green, (not Duff) a former editor of the Statesman, and lately translated to the post office there, worth about four thousand dollars per year, was, if not one of the committee of arrangements, a very active agent in the affair. A certain Mr. Simpson, said to be the minister plenipotentiary of the Boston Jackson party "near this court," was one of the Vice Presidents, and a certain Mr. Henshaw, lately promoted to the custom house there, an office worth six thousand dollars a year, was another of the Vice Presidents. Now, as the Federalists have sins enough of their own to answer for, I thought it right to do them this act of justice. I know, all along, that the charges were not, and, indeed, from the nature and extent of them, could not, be confined to any party in New England. Yet I scarcely thought that the Senator would thus fall to hacking and hewing the friends, and the prominent rewarded friends, of the administration. But this will be, I suppose, like lovers' quarrels—soon made up. They will pocket the abuse, if they can also pocket the money.

But still we have done nothing for the West. The fifteen millions paid for Louisiana was nothing. The millions expended upon the Cumberland road was nothing. The extinguishment of the Indian title to about two hundred and eighty millions of acres, and the survey of one hundred and forty millions, are nothing. The grants for schools and seminaries of learning are nothing. The alternate section system, to which the humble exertions of the individual who addresses you, contributed something, was nothing. The appropriations for improving the navigation of the Ohio and Mississippi are, if any thing, mere trifles. "The poor West!" The proscribed, persecuted, and afflicted West! O! New England, how many sins hast thou to atone for, for thy cruelty and tyranny to the suffering West!

But we have had more than the West. We have had appropriations for light houses! And appropriations for light houses are for the exclusive benefit of the Atlantic coast! This proposition has been so often repeated, and so often refuted, and is so utterly ridiculous in itself, that I sicken to mention it. My friend from Massachusetts, who

*Mr. Hayne had read from some document that some one of these madmen had threatened that the man who should loan money to the Government to carry on the war, should be consigned over to James Madison, Felix Grundy, and the Devil.—Note by Mr. H.

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[FEB. 22, 1830.]

sits before me, [Mr. SILSBEE] knows full well that light houses are very far from being for the benefit of those where they are built—the language of at least one-half is not “come in,” but “stand off.” Pray, sir, is the light house on “Cape Florida,” and that on the “Dry Tortugas,” for the local benefit of those places? There are no inhabitants at either of those places. I cannot speak of this with any patience. Any one who has the least understanding of the subject knows it is a miserable pretext.

We have built ships. A ship of the line is built at the navy yard at Charlestown. Is this for the protection and defence of the harbor of Boston? No, sir; that harbor is defensible without it. But how is it with the grand outlet of the West? In case of war, one ship of the line would effectually blockade the mouth of the Mississippi, and thus shut up the whole West. Ay, sir, one single sloop did thus blockade it effectually.

But how is it with the grants of roads and canals in the West, and the improvement of the navigation of the rivers? What, for instance, is New England to gain in uniting the waters of Lake Erie with those of the Ohio, compared to the benefits to that State? The appropriations for these objects have not been viewed in their true light. There is an immense and immeasurable difference between the local and the general benefit. Let the West view these things dispassionately, and they will see and acknowledge that, while Congress is bestowing its bounty to the East, it is for the general good; but when it extends its appropriations to the West, the advantage is almost exclusively sectional.

The Senator from Missouri is, if I understand him, against all rail roads across, and all canals through, the mountains, from the West to the Atlantic; and his reasons are, that he prefers New Orleans for the exclusive market for the West. He seems to apprehend that the Mississippi is to be drained, and a rail road is to be constructed in its bed. This was probably a figure of speech, a flourish of rhetoric. But he is seriously alarmed, lest, by establishing different avenues to different markets, the grower and manufacturer will suffer in the price of their produce. Sir, if he believes he can by this disturb the repose of the West, he pays no compliment to their sagacity. Why, the brutes know better than this. If you have half a dozen pastures, and an avenue to each, the horse, when the grass becomes short in one, has sagacity enough to go to another, and will always select the best. It is the first time, I confess, I have ever heard it alleged that the facility of transportation to different markets was a public injury.

There seems, too, to be a mysterious change in the Senator's mind in regard to Internal Improvements. If I have hitherto understood him correctly, he has been quite liberal on these subjects. In grants for roads, rivers, and canals, I have never perceived, in him, any very serious constitutional scruples. Any man, I admit, may yield to expediency. Whether his recent attachment to “the generous South” has influenced his constitutional opinions, I am unable to determine.

“The tariff,” also. What does he mean here? “We have a tariff—thanks to the generous South!” This was in 1828. Now, sir, it is true that New England has been literally dragged into the tariff system, and by the West; and when it is found that her enterprise is equal to any exigency, tariff or not, and her capital has been largely invested in manufactures, she is to be driven out. In 1824, we were alarmed. But finding that “home industry” was raging like a house on fire, we concluded to make that tariff as palatable as possible, and take it rather than do worse. That bill was pruned in the Senate by practical men. It was suspended for several days on a controversy between the West and the South, of no ordinary animosity, upon the single article of “cotton bagging.” It was adjusted by the interposition of a New England-man—the worthy predecessor of my worthy friend from Massachusetts. But it seemed a little strange that the South, who went shoulder to shoulder against that tariff, should, so soon as 1828, have been so “generous” as to have voted to impose such heavy burthens upon the people, for the gratification of the West, unless they were influenced by an expectation of this reward for their generosity, which they since experienced in full fruition—I mean the high eulogium of the Senator from Missouri.

But the truth is, the South voted to retain the obnoxious features in the tariff of 1828, not so much from generosity to the West, as from a determination to defeat the bill, by making it as odious as possible. I admit that this is parliamentary, but not always safe. By this mode of legislation there is some danger of making a bitter pill, which we may be obliged to swallow, not much to our taste. It happened so in this case; the South scorched her own fingers. But, nevertheless, “thanks to the generous South!”

Now, sir, it is vain that I have proved the charges against New England untrue and utterly groundless. They have gone forth. Such is human depravity in these days, that the scandal is greedily seized, and the refutation is disregarded. If a Senator here, in this high and exalted station, will make such accusations, how many will be predisposed to believe them, and how many more will, without inquiry, take them upon trust? If these things are seen in the green tree, what may we expect in the dry? If the golden vessels of your political sanctuary are thus marred, how is it to fare with the earthen pitchers? If the sturdy oak thus bends his majestic branches to the blast, what is to become of the hyssop upon the wall? If, in fine, these things are said by a Senator here, in the spirit of charity, what may we not expect of others, in the spirit of malignity?

Have you not proscribed us enough? This administration has glutted its vengeance upon the purest patriots on earth, for no other reason than that they have exercised the rights of freemen. No age, condition, sect, or sex, has escaped. This sin of the fathers has been, and is to be, visited upon the children, even to the third and fourth generations. Innocence, virtue, patriotism, all, all swept, with a rude and ruthless hand, into the gulf of misery. And still is not all this enough? Must we yet be arraigned as felons, and charged as parricides and fratricides? You had better let us alone. Take care not to push us further. I repeat, let us alone. Leave us but our industry, our enterprise, our churches, our colleges, our academies, and last, though not least, our primary schools, and shower down your polluted and polluting honors upon those heads which are aching for them.

[The Senate adjourned over to Monday.]

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1830.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. FOOT.

Mr. NOBLE rose, and said that the subject now before the Senate had afforded a field for argument, and a topic for general conversation. The opportunity had been fully embraced by those who had addressed the Senate, only being confined to the subject now and then. It was not to be understood that any complaint was made by him for the course that the argument had taken: for he should indulge in the same latitude of debate. The birth day of Washington [said Mr. N.] was a happy day to the people of this continent, as subsequent events have proved. From his early manhood, he was the protector of the civil and religious rights of his countrymen. In war he had conduct and courage, and conquered to save, and not murder. In peace, and during his administration, he esteemed freedom of thought a blessing to man—one of his absolute rights; and he looked with disdain on any that attempted foul proscription, and overawing of electors at the polls. He offered no reward, nor held out any punishment, nor did he add bounty for the purpose of becoming the Chief Magistrate of the United States, that he might glut his vengeance upon those who had independence to vote as they pleased. His mind was more enlarged, moral, generous, brave; and as a statesman, while President of the United States, his constant object was to co-operate with the Congress of the United States as to the best plan to have the Western lands settled, and to improve the internal and foreign condition of the Union.

Hiring presses have spoken of a second Washington. Without intending to give any offence, and with great respect for the opinions of all, however they may differ from me, I must be permitted to say, if "the hero of two wars" be called the second Washington, it is no more than a mere mockery at the door of the tomb of Washington.

Providence, in his wisdom, a few years ago, on the 4th of July, called to rest two of the distinguished signers of the Declaration of Independence—the elder Adams and the venerable Jefferson. The former was the father of the navy—the right arm of defence to the interest of the United States. Since which time, we flaming republicans on the improvement of the navy have been compelled to walk in his footsteps, and not sail in gun boats. Once more, and respectfully for the opinions of others, if we have a second Washington, he is not in office.

The resolution now under consideration, I shall vote to postpone, on the motion made by the honorable member from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] for the reason that the resolution is uncalled for, which I will show before I close my remarks.

The honorable member from South Carolina [Mr. HARNES] has amused the Senate with his own thoughts in reference to the eloquent Roanoke orator administering sweet morsels. For my part, I am willing to leave the orator where the honorable member found him. No one would have a right to interrupt him in so harmless an undertaking as administering sweet morsels to Towser, Sweetlips, Tray, Blanche, or Sweetheart. I am content to which of them he administers; it creates no envy in me, nor will the Government tremble if it was administered to Sweetheart: for I strongly suspect it was the first sweet morsel he ever administered.

[Here Mr. TAZEVELL called Mr. NOBLE to order, who took his seat, when the President of the Senate decided that Mr. NOBLE was not out of order, and directed him to proceed.]

Mr. NOBLE resumed, and stated that, if the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TAZEVELL] considered truth severe, he might prepare his mind for it, throughout his observations. He had said, he would leave the Roanoke orator where the honorable member from South Carolina found him. I have concluded, however, to make the history of the orator full as to sweet morsels, and remind the Senate, from newspaper publications, of his voyage from this continent to England, and while on his voyage his quarrel with the captain about his dog; whether it was on account of Towser or any other, or the cause which led to the quarrel was, that the captain would not let his dog sit at the table, or lie on it, is unimportant for my purpose now to inquire.

The Senate and the people of the United States may rest assured, that this celebrated Roanoke orator never was, nor never will be, considered orthodox in the West. He is considered in that country as being an aristocrat, wrapped up in British policy, and a tyrant if he had the power. I will not give myself more trouble on this point, than to quote one sentence, to strip him of his aristocracy. He did say, in this chamber, that he would sooner be seen conversing with his shoe black about his vote than he could control, than to be seen conversing with a man who had no land for his vote; and that the principles and people of the West were abhorrent to the genius and liberty of the country. What freeman will ever forget the tyrant's remark? Not one, sir. Shortly after the election of Mr. Adams to be the President of the United States, every unusual method was resorted to, with a determination to cripple his administration and render it ridiculous, having little or no regard to the public weal.

It is well known that the people, in the electoral colleges, failed to make choice of a President, and that the people, by the constitution of the United States, long ago declared that, if they failed to choose a President, their Representatives should elect one.

The Representatives did make a choice; and, because all could not be satisfied, to affect the administration, steps immediately were taken to destroy it. The hiring presses began. Terms of bargain, intrigue, corruption, and coalition, were charged upon Messrs. Adams and Clay; although an investigation was promptly demanded by Mr. Clay, in the House of Representatives, when and where all were present, and his accusers, instead of investigating, hid their faces, and dreaded truth.

It has been considered by all, and especially those most skilled in construing the constitution, that the Senate has power to reject or confirm any nomination made to them by the President. The Senate is not, nor ever should be, the creature of the Executive, merely to register his decrees. The framers of the constitution designed that the Senate should resist corrupt acts and encroachments made by the President against the constitution or rights of the people.

If my view of the duty of the Senate be true, let me examine into the conduct of the present prime minister, Mr. Van Buren, who was a Senator at the time that Mr. Adams nominated Mr. Clay to be Secretary of State. He was acting as Senator in the presence of the present Chief Magistrate, both of whom had to pass on Mr. Clay's nomination. Not one word was said in the Senate by the present Secretary of State, nor by the present Chief Magistrate, relative to bargain, sale, &c. but, on the contrary, Mr. Van Buren voted to confirm the nomination of Mr. Clay. [See Executive Journal, March 7, 1825.]

Can any rational man believe that, if any bargain, sale, &c. existed between Mr. Clay and Mr. Adams, or any of the Representatives, that the present Chief Magistrate would not have been advised, and that it would not certainly have reached Mr. Van Buren? All who know Mr. Van Buren truly, believe that he thinks that he has the affairs of the whole community on his hands. If Mr. Van Buren knew of any intrigue or bargain in his vote for the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Clay, the skirts of his honesty are scorched, and he stood god-father at the font for the child of bargain, sale, and corruption.

Since so much has been said about bargain and sale, let me examine and draw rational inferences from another supposed bargain and sale, more recent. I have said that the President and Mr. Van Buren were in the Senate together, and voted upon Mr. Clay's nomination differently. It was evidently to be seen that the former was displeased with passion, at least to my mind. Mr. Van Buren continued to serve in the Senate, or hold his seat, till shortly after or before he was elected Governor of New York, during the time Mr. Adams administered the Government. The election of General Jackson being announced, and pending his election, the Secretary of State, full of political intrigue, caused his newspapers to blend the election of Governor and President together, denouncing the then administration. The Commonwealth of New York was not so extensive as to induce the prime minister to warm the Executive chair: for it seems he preferred raising his flag of defiance against the suffrages of the voters of New York, which he had obtained. He sold them, as so many cattle, to gratify his own ambition. His acts prove to me, that a wider range than the United States was necessary for his early congenial capacity for bargain and intrigue to operate upon. Look at the natural inferences. Governor of a highly honorable and wealthy State, escaping from the people, he is found ascending from New York, whether by a circuitous route or otherwise, and found again descending in the city of Washington, upon the line of descents, to become the prime intriguer for others, and make himself the heir apparent to the throne. May kind Providence avert the affliction of ever having him for President. If intrigue will accomplish his object, he will say, "Dearest friends in the South, my policy is yours;" and to the North, "Dear friends, my policy is yours; make me President." Will not every man believe that Gen. Jackson and Mr. Van Buren knew, that if the General was elected President, the latter was to be Secretary of State, months, if not years, before Gen. Jackson's election?

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

It would seem that I should comply with my promise, to show that the resolution now under consideration is uncalled for, which will afford an additional reason for my voting in favor of the motion to postpone it. On the 16th February, 1827, John Quincy Adams, President of the United States, transmitted to the Senate a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, with statements prepared at the Register's and General Land Office, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, of the 16th May, 1826, in relation to the purchases and sales of the public lands since the Declaration of Independence. The report is numbered 63. With the exception of abolishing the office of Surveyor General, and the inquiry as to restricting the surveys of the public lands, the report affords ample information up to the 1st of January, 1826. For fifty years past, we have the following statement, exhibiting the quantity of public land purchased by the United States in each State and Territory; the quantity actually surveyed, surveys of which have been received at the General Land Office, and the estimated quantity remaining unsold on the 1st of January, 1826. In Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, and Florida, the quantity of public land purchased by the United States is two hundred and sixty-one millions six hundred and ninety-five thousand four hundred and twenty-seven acres and eighty-four hundredths. The amount of public land surveyed to January 1st, 1826, is one hundred and thirty-eight millions nine hundred and eighty-eight thousand two hundred and twenty-four acres and thirty-eight hundredths. The quantity of public land remaining unsold, January 1st, 1826, is two hundred and thirteen millions five hundred and ninety-one thousand and sixty acres, and nine hundredths. To abolish the office of Surveyor General is idle, unless you intend to cede the public lands to the States in which they are situate; and, for one, I am ready to receive them upon such terms as the States or State may agree with the Federal Government. To inquire into the expediency of restricting the surveys of the public lands is folly: for without appropriations, the lands cannot be surveyed. To do justice to my own constituents, the quantity of land purchased by the United States, (from the date of the Declaration of Independence) in Indiana, is sixteen millions sixty thousand and thirty-six acres and seventy hundredths, to January 1st, 1826; the quantity of public land surveyed, sixteen millions five hundred and forty-six thousand five hundred and thirty-eight acres and seventy-six hundredths. Public land remaining unsold, Jan. 1, 1826, twelve millions one hundred and thirty-one thousand four hundred and sixty-one acres and ninety hundredths.

Through the progress of this debate, I can discover symptoms that, on this resolution, merely for inquiry, the West are to be whipped into the ranks of partisans, and to be ordered to the South or elsewhere. I do not know of any accredited organ at Washington to accomplish the object, nor do I know of any agent in or out of the House, that has the necessary credentials to give the order. For one, I will neither be whipped, nor whip, if I can help it, for any such object, till the people of the West act in their sovereign capacity, and inform me.

One thing is certain: the vital interest of the West is Internal Improvements; and from the past, I have a right to judge of the future. From Virginia, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee, the West has never derived but one vote, in the general, in favor of Internal Improvements, in the Senate, out of ten. There was once a time, in relation to the Dismal Swamp Canal, we had another vote. Take the New England States, and the Middle States, and from them the West has had a majority of the votes in the Senate for many years past; and the motion to postpone the resolution under consideration will be received friendly by the Western people.

One cause of difficulty in the West, on the subject of a part of the American System, is, that we have had wavering politicians, who believed the constitution was clear as to the power of Congress to make Internal Improvements, one day, and the next, differed as to the power, because of the place where the work was to be executed. During the last canvass for President, the vulgar, that spoke without reason, said that John Q. Adams had fitted out a ship of seventy-four guns to aid the British Government. How little did those persons who traduced Mr. Adams know his character and his hard-earned fame. To quiet the vulgar, not the thinking part of society, on either side, and to arm them with an opportunity to repent and tell the truth, I call upon them to discredit their own witness in relation to Mr. Adams. Gen. Jackson is the witness, and proves from his letter to James Monroe, President of the United States, dated Nashville, March 18, 1817, who knew the character of Mr. Adams, and his worth.

Gen. Jackson certainly could not, from his opportunities in life, if he chose to embrace them, ever utter the following words, unless he knew he was speaking truth: "I have no hesitation in saying, you have made the best selection to fill the Department of State that could be made. Mr. Adams, in the hour of difficulty, will be an able helpmate, and I am convinced his appointment will afford general satisfaction." General Jackson, in thus testifying, proves that Mr. Adams is the true republican and American: for, says he, "Mr. Adams, in the hour of difficulty, will be an able helpmate, and I am convinced his appointment will afford general satisfaction."

Why and wherefore has Mr. Adams been called the federalist—the alarming epithet applied to him? If Mr. Adams be the federalist, so is Gen. Jackson. He hails the appointment of Mr. Adams as Secretary of State with joy, and says that he "will be an able helpmate." Well might he have said so, from the events which had transpired in the United States before Mr. Adams was appointed. It was well known to Gen. Jackson, that the head, heart, and pen of Mr. Adams, upon international law, were required to relieve this nation from all blots, and place her, as she had stood deservedly, in the first rank of nations known to the civilized world.

I call upon the Senate, or any one member, to deny that Gen. Jackson did not write the letter above referred to; I will pause to give an opportunity to deny, as I will do at any stage of my remarks. Truth should be told from this chamber to the people, if we mean to preserve our liberties: for their intelligence will correct the pending evils. I challenge and demand of the Senate, if they deny the letter of Gen. Jackson, to send for persons and papers.

Gen. Jackson, in his communication to the Tennessee Legislature, resigning his seat in the Senate of the United States, made Sept. 14, 1825, among other things says, in substance, that he neither seeks an office nor declines one. If not in that letter, he says so in another. We all know the letter to be true. A more adroit letter for electioneering could not have been written. It suited the times. Subsequent events have stripped his veil, and marked his insincerity. In the letter alluded to, this language is found: "With a view to sustain more effectually, in practice, the axiom which divides the three great classes of power into independent constitutional checks, I would impose a provision, rendering any member of Congress ineligible to office under the General Government, during the term for which he was elected, and for two years thereafter, except in cases of judicial office."

It is supposed that the General means that which he has since forgotten.

If he was sincere in stating "I would impose a provision (I suppose he means a provision in the constitution) rendering any member of Congress ineligible to office during the term for which he was elected, and for two years thereafter;" and if his views were sound, as he declares, it was completely in his power to have lived up to his principles. Unless from the lips only he professed to the Tennessee Legislature, from his transcendent influence in the United States his principles could have been kept alive, and probably he might have been instrumental in producing an amendment to the constitution to answer the evil of which he speaks.

He had it in his power to conform to his principles, for the second article of the second section of the constitution gives to the President the sole power of making nominations to the Senate, of officers, and Congress cannot take the power out of his hands. The clause of the constitution reads thus: "and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint, ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and all other officers of the United States," &c. What has he done, since he declared he would impose a provision, &c. to prevent members of Congress from being officers, except judicial officers, when he had the power to prevent? He has broken down his own standard; he has deviated from his own assertions to the people. He has extended his own patronage further than his predecessors. If I had asserted a fact to the people, I would have lived up to it. He has, as an evidence of his adroitness and artifice to seek an office, imposed upon the Legislature of Tennessee. His words may now be disregarded. Turpitude lurks, and is now seen. His acts must speak. He nominated Mr. Eaton to be Secretary of War, Mr. Branch Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Van Buren (half Senator) to be Secretary of State, (but not until he had sold the votes of the people of New York as so many cattle) Mr. Berrien to be Attorney General, and Mr. McLane, of Delaware, to be minister to the British Government, all Senators, except the half one, who, in all probability, was kept out intriguing. The people of the United States should feel themselves gratified to mark the footsteps of the Jackson republican, and his depression of Executive patronage. I have said his acts must speak. Mr. Ingham, nominated to be Secretary of the Treasury, (whose uniform intrigue is well known in Pennsylvania) was a member of Congress, and a fit adjunct of the Secretary of State in any mischief. Mr. Rives, of Virginia, appointed to be minister to France, was also a member of Congress. The people of the United States should rejoice at the up-rearing of the standard of truth. Gen. Jackson would impose a provision, and let members of Congress serve out their time, and receive the approbation or disapprobation of their constituents; and as an evidence of despising Executive patronage, and preventing the interview of members of Congress with their constituents, he sends them to foreign countries, thus paying up the bounties for services rendered! This mode of proceeding is harmless; it is reform to the people's pocket. I have said the letter was written with adroitness, and its object was to reflect upon all who did not follow in his wake, and as a cover to hide from the world that he was seeking an office. At the same time, among others, he was reflecting upon the course pursued by Mr. Adams, the distinguished civilian, who, as he says, "will be an able helpmate." Many handsome productions were issued from the Hermitage during the canvass preceding the election of the President. Who wrote them? For the character of the United States, let the mantle of forgetfulness be cast over the productions. One bounty, however, has been realized, by way of reward, though it has been since checked.

When the tariff bill was passed, under Mr. Adams's administration, it was stated in the prints that the colors of some of the ships in the seaports of the United States were hung at half-mast, by way of mourning. It is my opinion that, if it be true that the colors of ships in the seaports were hung at half-mast on account of the tariff, the colors of the same ships should be nailed to the mast for the attack of the President, in his late message to Congress, upon the charter of the Bank of the United States. The President states in his message to Congress, or his prime scrivener for him, "The charter of the Bank of the United States expires in 1836, and its stockholders will most probably apply for a renewal of their privileges. In order to avoid the evils resulting from precipitancy, in a measure involving such important principles, and such deep pecuniary interests, I feel that I cannot, in justice to the parties interested, too soon present it to the deliberate consideration of the Legislature and the people. Both the constitutionality and the expediency of the law creating this bank, are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens; and it must be admitted by all, that it has failed in the great end of establishing a uniform and sound currency."

"Under these circumstances, if such an institution is deemed essential to the fiscal operations of the Government, I submit to the wisdom of the Legislature whether a national one, founded upon the credit of the Government and its revenues, might not be devised, which would avoid all constitutional difficulties, and at the same time secure all the advantages to the Government and country that were expected to result from the present bank."

It is well known, sir, that you and Mr. Clay were both favorable to the grant of the charter in question. The scrivener was not then in Congress. From some secret cause, it is found convenient, for love of country, but more particularly love of self, to make the attack upon the bank and the vested rights of individuals concerned, as well as the whole revenue of the United States, and indirectly to assist Mr. Van Buren to hug the South, kiss the West, and ride into the Presidential chair upon his intrigue and love of self, over you and Mr. Clay. I wish the facts in the foregoing sentence were the worst of this attack upon the bank; but the injurious effects to be dreaded from it upon the interests of the agriculturists, manufacturers, and merchants, are plain. I hope that I am mistaken. The President might as well have said the bank was unconstitutional, and not to be relied on. What he has said, is in the presence of all the grades of ministers now in the city of Washington from foreign countries. The message of the President will shortly be before the nations of all the world, and they will view his message as true, as to the constitutionality of the bank, and that it has failed in the great end of its establishing a uniform and sound currency. Our merchants trade in foreign countries largely, and we shall hear the difference of exchange against them; and if against them, the farmers, mechanics, manufacturers, and all other classes, out of twelve millions of souls who consume articles and labor from abroad, that afforded the products, will feel the effect of the President's attack upon the only safe moneyed institution of the people. Let the ministers from abroad, of all classes, know that Gen. Jackson possesses limited powers, and that, in the opinion of some, from the want of a proper understanding of the true charter, and of the honesty of the directors of the bank, his second in command will, for himself, seek the destruction of the people's bank to climb the Presidential chair.

Since the granting of the charter, though its officers had much to encounter, its friends have not been disappointed. All has been realized that its friends expected. Through the efforts of the bank, it has not failed to establish a uniform sound currency, the opinion of Mr. Van Buren to the contrary notwithstanding. Out of his shell he shall recede or advance. He would disgrace a coward's grave to refuse, as an honest politician, to aver his sentiments, and speak of the charter and constitutionality of the bank.

The bank has thus far been faithful to the United States in transmitting their revenues to the most distant part of the Union, clear of expense to the people, and always ready to pay in gold, or silver, any just claim upon them. Why, then, has the message of the President, attacking the legality of the bank, been made to Congress? Was it to preserve the "axiom which divides the three great classes of power into constitutional checks, and sustain more effectually in practice" the rights of the people? He should have recollected, if "axioms" ever struck his mind, he has violated them, and, to recede, let him retract, so far as he wishes to favor the few. He states that "both the constitutionality and the expediency of the law creating the bank, are well questioned by a large portion of our fellow-citizens." It is not the case. He has interfered with one class of power—the Judiciary. The only class of power that had a right to decide on the unconstitutionality of the charter of the United States Bank, known to our laws, was, and is, the Supreme Court of the United States, as the dernier resort. The "constitutionality and the law creating the bank are well questioned," says the General, but I assert that the decision of the Supreme Court in the matter is final, and forms a part of the supreme law of the land. It was questioned by legal talents of the first order in the United States, and such as would grace any Bench in the known world. They settled the question of the constitutionality of the law creating the charter of the bank, and by that decision the country was satisfied and prosperous, till the outward rats, one from the North, the other from the South, visited Washington. The decision of the court was, that the charter was constitutional.

Gen. Jackson now wants a National Bank. Like the tariff, that he knew would be up for discussion under Mr. Adams's administration, and dreading more difficulty, he thought it prudent neither to "seek an office nor to decline one;" but his usual modesty invited him to resign, and cling to the willows and foliage of a "judicious" tariff.

What detail has he given to Congress for the National Bank? None. It is conjectured that, by a "judicious" one is meant the sword and purse combined. Farewell State rights, when the day comes that a National Bank is established under the arm of a tyrant! Farewell to religious and civil liberties, when crowned with a king and a consolidated government!

I shall have occasion to examine (or I may not) into some of the Departments, hereafter, to know who are in office, by affinity and consanguinity, to be more fully informed what is meant by reform. For the present, I have done.

ABOLITION OF DUTIES, TAXES, &c.

Mr. BENTON said he rose to ask the leave for which he gave notice on Friday last; and in doing so, he meant to avail himself of the parliamentary rule, seldom followed here, but familiar in the place from whence we drew our rule—the British Parliament—and strictly right and proper, when any thing new is to be proposed, to state the clauses, and make up an exposition of the principles of his bill, before he submitted the formal motion for leave to bring it in. And, before I do this, [said Mr. B.] I will make a single remark, to justify myself for presuming to propose a bill upon a subject which is already reported upon, by the able and experienced Committee of Finance. My justification is, that the bill of that committee does not present the best mode of accomplishing its own object; that a better one can be devised; and being myself the first mover of the great plan of abolishing unnecessary duties, on the extinguishment of the public debt, it is a natural effect of the meditation which I have bestowed on the question, that something should have occurred to me, which has not presented itself to the minds of others. This seems to be the case. Several bills have been reported for the abolition of duties; one in this chamber; some in the other end of the House; and no one has presented the subject under my point of view. Good or bad, my plan is at least new, a bill of its own sort; a bill without precedent in the legislation of the country; and, in bringing it forward, I discharge a duty to the Union, and to the public councils of which I am a member; and have no other wish but that the wisdom and patriotism of the Senate, from all that is presented, may select and prefer that which is best for the people of these States.

The title of my bill is adapted to its contents, and discloses its object as distinctly as the compendious nature of a title will admit. I will read it:

The Title.

"A bill to provide for the abolition of unnecessary duties; to relieve the people from sixteen millions of taxes; and to improve the condition of the agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation, of the United States."

The tenor of it is, not to abolish, but to provide for the abolition of the duties. This phraseology announces, that something in addition to the statute—some power in addition to that of the Legislature, is to be concerned in accomplishing the abolition. Then the duties for abolition are described as unnecessary ones; and under this idea is included the two-fold conception, that they are useless, either for the protection of domestic industry, or for supplying the treasury with revenue. The relief of the people from sixteen millions of taxes is based upon the idea of an abolition of twelve millions of duties; the additional four millions being the merchant's profit upon the duty he advances; which profit the people pay as a part of the tax, though the Government never receives it. It is the merchant's compensation for advancing the duty, and is the same as his profit upon the goods. The improved condition of the four great branches of national industry is presented as the third object of the bill; and their relative importance, in my estimation, classes itself according to the order of my arrangement. Agriculture, as furnishing the means of subsistence to man, and as the foundation of every thing else, is put foremost; manufactures, as preparing and fitting things for our use, stands second; commerce, as exchanging the superfluities of different countries, comes next; and navigation, as furnishing the chief means of carrying on commerce, closes the list of the four great branches of national industry. Though classed according to their respective importance, neither branch is disparaged. They are all great interests—all connected—all dependent upon each other—friends in their nature—for a long time friends in fact, under the operations of our Government; and only made enemies to each other, as they now are by a course of legislation, which the approaching extinguishment of the public debt presents a fit opportunity for reforming and ameliorating. The title of my bill declares the intention of the bill to improve the condition of each of them. The abolition of sixteen millions of taxes would itself operate a great improvement in the condition of each; but the intention of the bill is not limited to that incidental and consequential improvement, great as it may be; it proposes a positive, direct, visible, tangible, and countable benefit to each; and this I shall prove and demonstrate, not in this brief illustration of the title of my bill, but at the proper places, in the course of the examination into its provisions and exposition of its principles.

I will now proceed with the bill, reading each section in its order; and making the remarks upon it which are necessary to explain its object and to illustrate its operation.

The First Section.

"That, for the term of ten years, from and after the first day of January, in the year 1832, or, as soon thereafter as may be agreed upon between the United States and any foreign Power, the duties now payable on the importation of the following articles, or such of them as may be agreed upon, shall cease and determine, or be reduced, in favor of such countries as shall, by treaty, grant equivalent advantages to the agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation, of the United States, viz: coffee, cocoa, olives, olive oil, figs, raisins, almonds, currants, camphor, alum, opium, quicksilver, Spanish brown, copperas, tin and brass, in sheets and plates for manufacturers' use, black bottles and demijohns, silks, wines, linens, cambrics, lawns, Canton crapes, cashmere shawls, gauze, ribbons, straw mats, bolting cloths, thread and silk lace, bombazine and worsted stuff goods, spirits not made of grain, nor coming in competition with domestic spirits; on the following description of cotton goods not manufactured in the United States, viz: chintzes, muslins, cambrics, velvet cords, china and porcelain, and Brussels carpeting, Peruvian bark, chronometers, sextants, parts of watches, amber, pine apples, juniper berries and oil of juniper, Italian and French crapes, gall nuts, essence of bergamot and other essences used as perfumes, madder, turtle shell, and ox horn tips.

Also, on the following description of woollen goods, not manufactured in the United States, and necessary in carrying on the Indian trade, to wit:

This section contains the principle which I consider as new—that of abolishing duties by the joint act of the Legislative and Executive Departments. The idea of equivalents, which the section also presents, is not new, but has for its sanction high and venerated authority, of which I shall not fail to avail myself. That we ought to have equivalents for abolishing ten or twelve millions of duties on foreign merchandise is most clear. Such an abolition will be an advantage to foreign Powers, for which they ought to compensate us, by reducing duties to an equal amount upon our productions. This is what no law, or separate act of our own, can command. Amicable arrangements alone, with foreign Powers, can effect it; and to free such arrangements from serious, perhaps insuperable difficulties, it would be necessary first to lay a foundation for them in an act of Congress. This is what my bill proposes to do. It proposes that Congress shall select the articles for abolition of duty, and then leave it to the Executive to extend the provisions of the act to such Powers as will grant us equivalent advantages. The articles enumerated for abolition of duty are of kinds not made in the United States, so that my bill presents no ground of alarm or uneasiness to any branch of domestic industry.

The acquisition of equivalents is a striking feature in the plan which I propose, and for that I have the authority of him whose opinions will never be invoked in vain, while republican principles have root in our soil. I speak of Mr. Jefferson, and of his report on the commerce and navigation of the United States, in the year '93, an extract from which I will read.

The Extract.

"Such being the restrictions on the commerce and navigation of the United States, the question is, in what way they may best be removed, modified, or counteracted?

"As to commerce, two methods occur: 1. By friendly arrangements with the several nations with whom these restrictions exist: or, 2. By the separate act of our own Legislatures, for countervailing their effects.

"There can be no doubt but that, of these two, friendly arrangements is the most eligible. Instead of embarrassing commerce under piles of regulating laws, duties, and prohibitions, could it be relieved from all its shackles, in all parts of the world—could every country be employed in producing that which nature has best fitted it to produce, and each be free to exchange with others mutual surplusses, for mutual wants, the greatest mass possible would then be produced, of those things which contribute to human life and human happiness; the numbers of mankind would be increased, and their condition bettered.

"Would even a single nation begin with the United States this system of free commerce, it would be advisable to begin it with that nation; since it is one by one only that it can be extended to all. Where the circumstances of either party render it expedient to levy a revenue, by way of impost on commerce, its freedom might be modified in that particular, by mutual and equivalent measures, preserving it entire in all others.

"Some nations, not yet ripe for free commerce, in all its extent, might be willing to mollify its restrictions and regulations, for us, in proportion to the advantages which an intercourse with us might offer. Particularly they may concur with us in reciprocating the duties to be levied on each side, or in compensating any excess of duty, by equivalent advantages of another nature. Our commerce is certainly of a character to entitle it to favor in most countries. The commodities we offer are either necessities of life, or materials for manufacture, or convenient subjects of revenue; and we take in exchange either manufactures, when they have received the last finish of art and industry, or mere luxuries. Such customers may reasonably expect welcome and friendly treatment at every market—customers, too, whose demands, increasing with their wealth and population, must very shortly give full employment to the whole industry of any nation whatever, in any line of supply they may get into the habit of calling for from it.

"But, should any nation, contrary to our wishes, suppose it may better find its advantage by continuing its system of prohibitions, duties, and regulations, it behooves us to protect our citizens, their commerce and navigation, by counter prohibitions, duties, and regulations, also.

[SENATE.]

Abolition of Duties, Taxes, &c.

[FEB. 23, 1830-

Free commerce and navigation are not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations; nor are they likely to produce a relaxation of them."

The plan which I now propose adopts the idea of equivalents and retaliation to the whole extent recommended by Mr. Jefferson. It differs from his plan in two features: first, in the mode of proceeding, by founding the treaties abroad upon a legislative act at home; secondly, in combining protection with revenue, in selecting articles of exception to the system of free trade. This degree of protection he admitted himself, at a later period of his life. It corresponds with the recommendation of President Washington to Congress, in the year '90, and with that of our present Chief Magistrate, to ourselves, at the commencement of the present session of Congress. I will read them, to sustain and support the principles on which my bill is founded.

President Washington, in 1790.

"Our safety and interest require that we should promote such manufactures as tend to render us independent on others for essential, particularly for military supplies."

President Jackson, in 1829.

"It may be regretted that the complicated restrictions which now embarrass the intercourse of nations could not, by common consent, be abolished, and commerce allowed to flow in those channels to which individual enterprise—always its surest guide—might direct it. But we must ever expect selfish legislation in other nations; and are, therefore, compelled to adapt our own to their regulations, in the manner best calculated to avoid serious injury, and to harmonize the conflicting interests of our agriculture, our commerce, and our manufactures. * * *

The general rule to be applied in graduating the duties upon articles of foreign growth or manufacture is that which will place our own in fair competition with those of other countries; and the inducements to advance even a step beyond this point are controlling in regard to those articles which are of primary necessity in time of war."

These extracts from the Presidents Washington, Jefferson, and Jackson, cover all the principles which are contained in my bill; the mode of action, the means of putting them into operation, is the only part that is new and original. To this part I can see no objection but to its novelty: for it is free from all difficulty on the score of constitutionality or expediency, and combines the advantages of equivalents with those of retaliation: for, if any nation refuses to reciprocate an abolition or reduction of duties with us, our heavy duties remain in force against her, and she pays the penalty of her refusal in the loss of some essential branch of her trade with us.

I will not now stop to dilate upon the benefit which will result to every family from an abolition of duties which will enable them to get all the articles enumerated in my bill for about one-third, or one-half less, than is now paid for them. Let any one read over the list of articles, and then look to the sum total which he now pays out annually for them, and from that sum deduct near fifty per cent. which is about the average of the duties and merchant's profit included, with which they now come charged to him. This deduction will be his saving under one branch of my plan—the abolition clause. To this must be added the gain under the clause to secure equivalents in foreign markets, and the two being added together, the saving in purchases at home being added to the gain in sales abroad, will give the true measure of the advantages which my plan presents.

Let us now see whether the agriculture and manufactures of the United States do not require better markets abroad than they possess at this time. What is the state of these markets? Let facts reply. England imposes a duty of three shillings sterling a pound upon our tobacco, which is ten times its value. She imposes duties equivalent to prohibition on our grain and provisions; and either totally excludes, or enormously taxes, every article, except cotton, that we send to her ports. In France, our tobacco is subject to a royal monopoly, which makes the king the sole purchaser, and subjects the seller to the necessity of taking the price which his agents will give. In Germany, our tobacco, and other articles, are heavily dutied, and liable to a transit duty, in addition, when they have to ascend the Rhine, or other rivers, to penetrate the interior. In the West Indies, which is our great provision market, our beef, pork, and flour, usually pay from eight to ten dollars a barrel; our bacon, from ten to twenty-five cents a pound; live hogs, eight dollars each; corn, corn-meal, lumber, whiskey, fruit, vegetables, and every thing else, in proportion; the duties in the different islands, on an average, equalling or exceeding the value of the article in the United States. We export about forty-five millions of domestic productions, exclusive of manufactures, annually; and it may be safely assumed that we have to pay near that sum in the shape of duties, for the privilege of selling these exports in foreign markets. So much for agriculture. Our manufactures are in the same condition. In many branches they have met the home demand, and are going abroad in search of foreign markets. They meet with vexatious restrictions, peremptory exclusions, or oppressive duties, wherever they go. The quantity already exported entitles them to national consideration, in the list of exports. Their aggregate value for 1828 was about five millions of dollars, comprising domestic cottons, to the amount of a million of dollars; soap and candles, to the value of nine hundred thousand dollars; boots, shoes, and saddlery, five hundred thousand dollars; hats, three hundred thousand dollars; cabinet, coach, and other wooden work, six hundred thousand dollars; glass and iron, three hundred thousand dollars; and numerous smaller items. This large amount of manufactures pays their value, in some instances more, for the privilege of being sold abroad; and, what is worse, they are totally excluded from several countries from which we buy largely. Such restrictions and impositions are highly injurious to our manufactures; and it is incontestably true, the amount of exports prove it, that what most of them now need is, not more protection at home, but a better market abroad; and it is one of the objects of this bill to obtain such a market for them.

It appears to me, [said Mr. B.] to be a fair and practicable plan, combining the advantages of legislation and negotiation, and avoiding the objections to each. It consults the sense of the people, in leaving it to their Representatives to say on what articles duties shall be abolished for their relief; on what they shall be retained for protection and revenue; it then secures the advantage of obtaining equivalents, by referring it to the Executive to extend the benefit of the abolition to such nations as shall reciprocate the favor. To such as will not reciprocate, it leaves every thing as it now stands. The success of this plan can hardly be doubted. It addresses itself to the two most powerful passions of the human heart—interest and fear; it applies itself to the strongest principles of human action—profit and loss. For, there is no nation with whom we trade but will be benefited by the increased trade of her staple productions, which will result from a free trade in such productions; none that would not be crippled by the loss of such a trade, which loss would be the immediate effect of rejecting our system. Our position enables us to command the commercial system of the globe; to mould it to our own plan, for the benefit of the world and ourselves. The approaching extinction of the public debt puts it into our power to abolish twelve millions of duties, and to set free more than one-half of our entire commerce. We should not forego, nor lose the advantages of such a position. It occurs but seldom in the life of a nation, and once missed, is irre-trievably gone, to the generation at least, that saw and neglected the golden opportunity. We have complained, and justly, of the burthens upon our exports in foreign countries; a part of our tariff system rests upon the principle of retaliation for the injury thus done us. Retaliation, heretofore, has been our only resource; but reciprocity of injuries is not the way to enrich nations any more than individuals. It is an "unprofitable contest," under every aspect. But the present conjuncture, payment of the public debt, in itself a rare and almost unprecedented occurrence in the history of nations, enables us to enlarge our system; to present a choice of alternatives: one fraught with good, the other charged with evil, to foreign nations. The participation, or exclusion, from forty millions of free trade, annually increasing, would not admit of a second thought, in the head of any nation with which we trade. To say nothing of her gains in the participation in such a commerce, what would be her loss in the exclusion from it? How would England, France, or Germany, bear the loss of their linen, silk, or wine trade, with the United States? How could Cuba, St. Domingo, or Brazil, bear the loss of their coffee trade with us? They could not bear it at all. Deep and essential injury, ruin of industry, seditions, and bloodshed, and the overthrow of administrations, would be the consequence of such loss. Yet such loss would be inevitable, (and not to the few nations, or in the articles only which I have mentioned, for I have put a few instances only by way of example) but to every nation with whom we trade, that would not fall into our system, and throughout the whole list of essential articles to which our abolition extends. Our present heavy duties would continue in force against such nations; they would be abolished in favor of their rivals. We would say to them, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, free trade and navigation is not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations! But I feel entire confidence that it would not be necessary to use the language of menace or coercion. Amicable representations, addressed to their sense of self-interest, would be more agreeable, and not less effectual. The plan cannot fail! It is scarcely within the limits of possibility that it should fail! And if it did, what then? We have lost nothing. We remain as we were. Our present duties are still in force, and Congress can act upon them one or two years hence, in any way they please.

Here, then, is the peculiar recommendation to my plan, that, while it secures a chance, little short of absolute certainty, of procuring an abolition of twelve millions of duties upon our exports in foreign countries, in return for an abolition of twelve millions of duties upon imports from them, it exposes nothing to risk; the abolition of duty upon the foreign article here being contingent upon the acquisition of the equivalent advantage abroad.

I close this exposition of the principles of the first section of my bill with the single remark, that these treaties for the mutual abolition of duties should be for limited terms, say for seven or ten years, to give room for the modifications which time, and the varying pursuits of industry, may show to be necessary. Upon this idea, the bill is framed, and the period of ten years inserted by way of suggestion and exemplification of the plan. Another feature is too obvious to need a remark, that the time for the commencement of the abolition of duties is left to the Executive, who can accommodate it to the state of the revenue and the extinction of the public debt.

Second Section.

"That, from and after the 31st day of December, in the year 1831, the duties now payable on the following articles, imported from countries with which the United States have no diplomatic relations, shall be reduced one-half; and, after the 31st of December, 1833, shall cease and determine entirely, to wit: teas, mace, cloves, cinnamon, nutmegs, cassia, ginger, ivory, Turkey carpets, Cashmere shawls."

This section presents an exception to the principle of the bill; it dispenses with the idea of obtaining equivalents in the enumerated articles. The exception is the effect of necessity; the articles excepted being desirable to us, and obtained from Powers with whom we have no treaties. The exception is unavoidable, but it is not wholly disadvantageous. We shall get the articles for one-third and one-half less than we now pay for them; and if two or three millions of revenue should be suddenly wanted, they present the ready means of raising it. The abolition being by law alone, the duty may be laid again by law whenever needed.

Third Section.

"That, from and after the 31st day of December, in the year 1831, a duty of thirty-three and a third per cent. on the value, shall be levied on all furs and raw hides imported into the United States, from countries which shall not have secured their free admission by granting equivalent advantages to the like productions of the United States."

This section, to a superficial observer, may seem to militate against the plan of the bill; but the inconsistency is in appearance only. It harmonizes completely with the spirit of the bill. It provides for a future, eventual, and contingent duty, upon two articles now introduced, free of duty, to a great amount. The terms in which the section is drawn show that its object is to obtain equivalents for their future free importation; and the following table of their annual imports, for the last nine years, will show the great value of the argument which they will put into the hands of the Executive, in the negotiations to which the section may give rise.

The Table.

	2,989,833	17,153,997	20,693,730

The aggregate exceeds twenty millions of dollars for the short period of the last nine years. And these free importations, so injurious to the fur trader, and the farmers who raise cattle and want a market for their skins, are derived from countries who exclude, or heavily tax, our furs and raw hides, and the articles manufactured out of them. They come, chiefly, from the Southern republics and Great Britain. If such large importations are to continue free, let those who enjoy the benefit reciprocate the favor. Let them abolish duties on American furs and American hats. Let them abolish duties on our raw hides; and where the privilege of sending hides would not be beneficial to us, as in the Southern republics, let something else be substituted for the abolition; as distilled spirits, manufactures of leather, cotton, glass, wood, &c. If they do not reciprocate advantages, thus offered, the penalty of their own election falls upon them. They incur the consequence denounced by Mr. Jefferson in the patriotic declaration, that free trade is not to be given in exchange for restrictions and vexations.

Here, sir, I make a single remark to illustrate the neglect with which the West has been treated in the progress of the tariff policy. The West produces furs and raw hides; they are leading articles of Western industry; yet no protection has been extended to them; the protective policy has never reached them; the country has been filled with foreign hides and foreign furs, free of duty, while the furs and hides of the United States, and the articles manufactured from them, are met by prohibitions, or heavy duties, in all quarters of the globe.

Abolition of Duties, Taxes, &c.

[FEB. 23, 1830.]

Fourth Section.

"That, from and after the 31st day of December, in the year —, the amount levied on foreign tonnage for 'light money,' shall cease and determine, in favor of the ships of such nations as shall grant the like or an equivalent favor to the merchant ships of the United States."

The object of this section is to gain some little relief for our navigating interest in foreign ports. The amount now paid by foreigners for "light money," that is to say, as a tribute to our light houses, is about fifteen thousand dollars per annum. Such a sum is no object to the treasury of the United States, yet it is something to our ship owners, for whose benefit the abolition of this small tax is intended. Nominally, it is a relief to foreigners; in reality, to our own navigators. The foreigners cannot be relieved here until the corresponding relief is secured abroad; and, as our shipping is most numerous, we may gain much more than we relinquish.

Fifth Section.

"That, from and after the 31st day of December, in the year —, the duties now payable on tonnage, passports, and clearances, and on the re-exportation of imported articles, shall cease and determine."

The amount of these little taxes and duties is about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum. The treasury will have no occasion for that sum after the extinguishment of the public debt; and being left in the pockets of the ship owners and merchants, will be felt as an advantage by them, and not missed as a loss by the Government.

Sixth Section.

"That, from and after the 31st day of December next, the duty now payable on the importation of alum salt, coarse or ground, shall cease and determine; and from and after the same day, all laws authorizing allowances to fishing vessels, and bounties on the exportation of pickled fish, shall be, and the same hereby are, repealed."

This section stands out as a clear exception to the peculiar policy of the bill—that of obtaining equivalents by treaty stipulation. The section proposes a speedy repeal of the duty on this description of salt, and by operation of law alone. The reasons for this exception, are—first, in the prime necessity and universality of the use of the article; secondly, in the small object it would present for negotiation, the number of Powers from which we get salt being above a dozen, which would render abolition by negotiation tedious and dilatory, and the amount of duty relinquished to each, too inconsiderable to affect her policy, while the aggregate to us is great; thirdly, in the necessity of repealing the fishing bounties and allowances, which are dependent upon the duty on this description of foreign salt, and must stand or fall with that duty.

I have now finished the exposition of the features and principles of my bill; but justice to my plan and to myself will not permit me to stop here. The plan is new; and whatever is new has the prejudices of time and age to encounter, and the fears of timidity and caution to overcome. Its novelty will excite many enemies; the reasons which I may give, and which are the fruit of much research and meditation, may satisfy some and convert them into friends.

It certainly presents the tariff question under a new point of view to the American people.

That question has heretofore rested upon two great principles:

1. PROTECTION; 2. RETALIATION.

Under the first principle we sought a home supply of articles essential to our general independence, and to our safety in time of war.

Under the second principle we retaliate upon other nations the evils of their own policy in piling duties upon our productions.

It is not to be dissembled that the tariff policy, on both principles, has powerfully appealed to the sympathies and the patriotism of the American people, and while kept within reasonable limits had the general approbation of all quarters of the Union; North, South, West, and Centre. The tariff policy has been in force in these States forty years, and has only excited discontent within the last ten or fifteen years, and since it has been pushed beyond its own principles. The results are, increased duties at home and abroad; imports burthened, and exports burthened—the candle lit at both ends.

Under the plan which I propose, the tariff question will present itself to the people in this point of view:

1. Protection to every essential branch of industry.
2. Retaliation, as an alternative, where equivalents are refused.
3. Reciprocity of benefits instead of reciprocity of injuries.
4. The abolition of twelve millions of duties, at home, on imports.
5. The abolition of an equal amount of duties, abroad, on exports.
6. Discrimination between the articles which a wise policy requires, or does not require, to be made at home, and between the nations which grant or refuse us equivalents.
7. Increased importations of gold and silver.
8. Increased value of the internal trade with Mexico.

The results of the new plan, according to this view of its advantages, would be overwhelming in its favor. Let us verify these results, and justify these views.

In the first place, under the protecting principle which it contains, duties will remain on foreign articles, rivals of our own industry, to the amount of about ten millions of dollars. The support of the Government will require this sum, and the raising of this sum will give protection to our domestic industry; it will give it as an incident to the collection of revenue, and to this there will be no objection in any part of the Union.

In the second place, we shall terminate the unprofitable contest which we are now carrying on with foreign nations—a contest in which the only question is, which shall do most harm to the commerce of the other—and substitute for it a beneficial rivalry in the walks of free trade, based upon the unfettered exchange of surplus productions, to the amount of forty millions at the start, to increase annually with the rapid growth and expansion of these young athletic States.

In the third place, the abolition of twelve millions of duties will be the repeal of sixteen millions of taxes, counting the merchant's profit at 33½ per cent; and this repeal will be felt in every family in the purchase of its necessities, its comforts, and its luxuries. Linen for the person, the table, and the bed, would be one-third cheaper. Coffee would be seven cents cheaper in the pound; tea, one-third; wines and silks, one-third; and so of all the articles enumerated in the bill. Every family would save one-third, or upwards, of its annual store account; every State would retain, within its limits, its proportion of these sixteen millions; and all the shame and mischief of plotting and combining, and wrangling, here, about the division of so much spoil, would be avoided.

In the fourth and fifth places, the principle of equivalents would gain an abolition of duties on our productions in foreign ports, equal to the abolition made here upon foreign productions. We would buy cheaper, and sell higher. Instead of paying the value, and, in some instances, ten times the value of our products, for the privilege of selling them in a foreign market, we would get these foreign duties reduced to a reasonable amount. Our productions are chiefly dutied in foreign countries, not for protection, but for revenue; and the experience of all nations, and especially of Great Britain, proves that revenue is productive in proportion to its moderation and fairness; smuggling and non-consumption always disappointing the calculations of short sighted cupidity in the imposition of enormous duties. But these will be arguments for our ministers abroad, which they will handle with more ability than I can pretend to.

FEB. 23, 1830.]

In the sixth place, the principle of discrimination which my plan, for the first time in the progress of the tariff policy, introduces and establishes, will admit of a salutary distinction in the selection of articles for protection, and in the application of retaliatory measures to impracticable nations. Thus far there has been no discrimination, either in articles at home or nations abroad, in our tariff policy. To protect articles which can, and ought to be, made at home, we have dutied, and that most heavily, not only the cherished article, but all others belonging to the same branch, though of kinds not made, nor necessary to be made, in the United States. Blankets and strouds for the Indian trade, fine cottons, alum salt—I mention a few articles by way of example—are evidences of this want of discrimination. Among nations, this want of discrimination has been equally palpable. Great Britain has been severe upon our tobacco, grain, and provisions; to retaliate upon her we have been severe, not only upon her productions, but upon the productions of France, Germany, and all the nations with whom we trade. This want of discrimination among nations may be the necessary effect of regulating our tariff by law alone. If so, the argument becomes still stronger in favor of my plan by law and negotiation combined, which admits of discrimination; which offers the same advantageous terms to all nations, and leaves retaliatory duties in force against those only which justly incur our resentment, by refusing to receive our productions upon the terms that we offer to receive theirs. To them I say, in the thrice repeated language of the great Jefferson, "Free trade is not to be given in exchange for vexations and restrictions!"

Seventhly: in obtaining increased importations of gold and silver. The United States have no silver or gold mines, except those in my native State, (North Carolina.) They are dependent upon foreign countries for their supply of these metals. To the amount of one or two millions they are obtained from the West Indies, and other neighboring countries, in return for domestic productions, chiefly provisions. But the main supply is obtained by the circuitous operation of sending our tobacco, cotton, and rice, to Europe, exchanging them for fine goods, and selling these goods in the Southern republics. Our trade with Mexico is a complete illustration of this process. We obtained from her, in 1828—taking the last year to which the returns are made up and printed—four millions of dollars in gold and silver, and seven hundred thousand dollars' worth of other products; we exported to her about seven hundred thousand dollars' worth of our domestic products, just enough to balance hers, leaving the whole amount of gold and silver to have been acquired by other exchanges. What were these exchanges? They were the fine cloths and cassimeres, the linens, silks, cambrics, muslins, rich carpets, wines, and porcelain, which our cotton and tobacco had bought in Europe, and which were either carried direct to Mexico, or re-exported from this country under the system of drawbacks. This makes it clear that whatever will facilitate the exchange of our cotton and tobacco for the fine goods of Europe, will enhance the importation of the precious metals into the United States; and nothing can facilitate this exchange so much as reductions of duty upon the articles which compose it. The cotton plantations and tobacco fields of the South and West are thus the gold and silver mines of the United States; and blind, stupid, and suicidal is the policy which would destroy these fields and plantations!

Eightly: In promoting the internal trade with Mexico. This trade is carried on partly in domestic, partly in European goods. Its present returns are about a quarter of a million of dollars. So far as foreign goods enter into its amount, there is a loss to the trader of the whole amount of the duty paid; the want of custom houses on the frontiers rendering the application of the drawback system difficult and objectionable. The abolition of duties on the foreign articles used in that trade, chiefly fine goods, would put the inland trader on a footing with the shipper from the sea-port, and probably enhance the returns of the trade, in a brief period, from a quarter of a million, to one or two millions of dollars.

These are the results of my plan, verified, as fully as established facts, fair inductions, and probabilities approaching to certainty, can verify any untried experiment. They are the results of free trade, qualified by the policy of protection and the necessities of revenue; two qualifications which, in my view, reduce themselves to one: for they are convertible propositions—the revenue resulting from the protection, and the protection from the revenue. Anti-tariff citizens can have no objection to it, for they admit the protection which springs from a fair exercise of the revenue raising power; the supporters of the tariff policy, and especially the real manufacturers—not the political ones—but the actual owners and workers, can have no objection to it, for it leaves them all their present protection, procures them better markets abroad, gives them comforts and necessities, as tea, coffee, &c. cheaper than they now get them, and facilitates the acquisition of the material to several branches of manufacture, as the umbrella, the hat, the lady's shoe, bonnet, &c. in which silk is an essential part; and which will be got one-third cheaper when the duty on that article is abolished.

This being the case, the "crowning mercy" of my plan would be the speedy death and burial of the tariff question, and, with its interment, a restoration of that harmony of the Union which all true patriots desire, and which the progress of this question has so greatly impaired.

The last section of my bill still remains to be considered. It is the one which proposes to abolish the duty upon alum salt, and to repeal the laws which authorize the fishing bounties and allowances.

To spare to any gentleman [said Mr. B.] the supposed necessity of rehearsing to me a lecture upon the importance of the fisheries, I will premise that I have some acquaintance with the subject; that I know the fisheries to be valuable, for the food they produce, the commerce they create, the mariners they perfect, the employment they give to artisans in the building of vessels, and the consumption of wood, hemp, and iron. I also know that the fishermen applied for the bounties, at the commencement of our present form of Government, which the British give to their fisheries, and that it was denied them upon the report of the Secretary of State, (Mr. Jefferson;) and I have lately read the six dozen acts of Congress, general and particular, passed in the last forty years, from 1789 to 1829, inclusive, giving the bounties and allowances, which it is my present purpose to abolish, with the duty on alum salt, which is the foundation upon which all this superstructure of legislative enactments has been reared.

I say the salt tax, and especially the tax on alum salt, which is the kind required for the fisheries, is the foundation of all these bounties and allowances; and that, as they grew up together, it is fair and regular that they should sink and fall together.

To prove this, let the laws speak.

The Laws.

1. Act of Congress, 1789, grants five cents a barrel on pickled fish and salted provisions, and five cents a quintal on dried fish, exported from the United States, in lieu of a drawback of the duties imposed on the importation of the salt used in curing such fish and provisions.

N. B. Duty on salt, at that time, six cents a bushel.

2. Act of 1790 increases the bounty in lieu of drawback to ten cents a barrel on pickled fish and salted provisions, and ten cents a quintal on dried fish. The duty on salt being then raised to twelve cents a bushel.

3. Act of 1792 repeals the bounty in lieu of drawback on dried fish, and in lieu of that, and as a commutation and equivalent therefor, authorizes an allowance to be paid to vessels in the cod fishery (dried fish) at the rate of one dollar and fifty cents a ton on vessels of twenty to thirty tons; two dollars and fifty cents on tonnage of vessels above thirty tons; with a limitation of one hundred and seventy dollars for the highest allowance to any vessel.

4. A supplementary act, of the same year, adds twenty per cent. to each head of these allowances.

5. Act of 1797 increases the bounty on salted provisions to eighteen cents a barrel; on pickled fish to twenty-two cents a barrel; and adds thirty-three and a third per cent. to the allowance in favor of the cod fishing vessels. Duty on salt, at the same time, being raised to twenty cents a bushel.

6. Act of 1799 increases the bounty on pickled fish to thirty cents a barrel, on salted provisions to twenty-five.

7. Act of 1800 continues all previous acts (for bounties and allowances) for ten years, and makes this proviso: That these allowances shall not be understood to be continued for a longer time than the correspondent duties on salt, respectively, for which the said additional allowances were granted, shall be payable.

8. Act of 1807 repeals all laws laying a duty on imported salt, and for paying bounties on the exportation of pickled fish and salted provisions, and making allowances to fishing vessels—Mr. Jefferson being then President.

9. Act of 1813 gives a bounty of twenty cents a barrel on pickled fish exported, and allows to the cod fishing vessels at the rate of two dollars and forty cents the ton for vessels between twenty and thirty tons, four dollars a ton for vessels above thirty, with a limitation of two hundred and seventy-two dollars for the highest allowance; and a proviso, that no bounty or allowance should be paid unless it was proved to the satisfaction of the collector that the fish was wholly cured with foreign salt, and the duty on it secured or paid. The salt duty, at the rate of twenty cents a bushel, was revived as a war tax, at the same time. Bounties on salted provisions were omitted.

10. Act of 1816 continued the act of 1813 in force, which, being for the war only, would otherwise have expired.

11. Act of 1819 increases the allowance to vessels in the cod fishery to three dollars and fifty cents a ton on vessels from five to thirty; to four dollars a ton vessels above thirty tons; with a limitation of three hundred and sixty dollars for the maximum allowance.

12. Act of 1828 authorizes the mackerel fishing vessels to take out licences like the cod fishing vessels, under which it is reported by the vigilant Secretary of the Treasury that money is illegally drawn by the mackerel vessels—the newspapers say to the amount of thirty to fifty thousand dollars per annum.

These recitals of legislative enactments are sufficient to prove that the fishing bounties and allowances are bottomed upon the salt duty, and must stand or fall with that duty. I will now give my reasons for proposing to abolish the duty on alum salt, and will do it in the simplest form of narrative statement; the reasons themselves being of a nature too weighty and obvious to need, or even to admit, of coloring or exaggeration from arts of speech.

1. Because it is an article of indispensable necessity in the provision trade of the United States. No beef or pork for the army or navy, or for consumption in the South, or for exportation abroad, can be put up except in this kind of salt. If put up in common salt, it is rejected absolutely by the commissaries of the army and navy, and if taken to the South must be repacked in alum salt, at an expense of one dollar and twelve and a half cents a barrel, before it is exported, or sold for domestic consumption. The quantity of provisions which require this salt, and must have it, is prodigious, and annually increasing. The exports of 1828 were, of beef sixty-six thousand barrels, of pork fifty-four thousand barrels, of bacon one million nine hundred thousand pounds weight, butter and cheese two million pounds weight. The value of these articles was two millions and a quarter of dollars. To this amount must be added the supply for the army and navy, and all that was sent to the South for home consumption, every pound of which had to be cured in this kind of salt, for common salt will not cure it. The Western country is the great producer of provisions; and there is scarcely a farmer in the whole extent of that vast region whose interest does not require a prompt repeal of the duty on this description of salt.

2. Because no salt of this kind is made in the United States, nor any rival to it, or substitute for it. It is a foreign importation, brought from various islands in the West Indies, belonging to England, France, Spain, and Denmark; and from Lisbon, St. Ubes, Gibraltar, the Bay of Biscay, and Liverpool. The principles of the protecting system do not extend to it: for no quantity of protection can produce a home supply. The present duty, which is far beyond the rational limit of protection, has been in force near thirty years, and has not produced a pound. We are still thrown exclusively upon the foreign supply. The principles of the protecting system can only apply to common salt, the product of which is considerable in the United States; and upon that kind, the present duty is proposed to be left in full force.

3. Because the duty is enormous, and quadruples the price of the salt to the farmer. The original value of salt is about fifteen cents the measured bushel of eighty-four pounds. But the tariff substitutes weight for measure, and fixes that weight at fifty-six pounds, instead of eighty-four. Upon that fifty-six pounds, a duty of twenty cents is laid. Upon this duty, the retail merchant has his profit of eight or ten cents, and then reduces his bushel from fifty-six to fifty pounds. The consequence of all these operations is, that the farmer pays about three times as much for a weighed bushel of fifty pounds, as he would have paid for a measured bushel of eighty-four pounds, if this duty had never been imposed.

4. Because the duty is unequal in its operation, and falls heavily on some parts of the community, and produces profit to others. It is a heavy tax on the farmers of the West, who export provisions; and no tax at all, but rather a source of profit, to that branch of the fisheries to which the allowances of the vessels apply. Exporters of provisions have the same claim to these allowances that exporters of fish have. Both claims rest upon the same principle, and upon the principle of all drawbacks, that of refunding the duty paid on the imported salt, which is re-exported on salted fish and provisions. The same principle covers the beef and pork of the farmer which covers the fish of the fisherman; and such was the law, as I have shown, for the first eighteen years that these bounties and allowances were authorized. Fish and provisions fared alike from 1789 to 1807. Bounties and allowances began upon them together, and fell together, on the repeal of the salt tax, in the second term of Mr. Jefferson's administration. At the renewal of the salt tax, in 1813, at the commencement of the late war, they parted company, and the law, in the exact sense of the proverb, has made fish of one and flesh of the other ever since. The fishing interest is now drawing about two hundred and fifty thousand dollars annually from the treasury; the provision raisers draw not a cent, while they export more than double as much, and ought, upon the same principle, to draw more than double as much money from the treasury.

5. Because it is the means of drawing an undue amount of money from the public treasury, under the idea of an equivalent for the drawback of duty on the salts used in the curing of fish. The amount of money actually drawn in that way is about four millions seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and is now going on at the rate of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum, and constantly augmenting. That this amount is more than the legal idea recognizes, or contemplates, is proved in various ways. 1. By comparing the quantity of salt supposed to have been used, with the quantity of fish known to have been exported, within a given year. This test, for the year 1828, would exhibit about seventy millions of pounds weight of salt on about forty millions of pounds weight of fish. This would suppose about a pound and three quarters of salt upon each pound of fish. 2. By comparing the value of the salt supposed to have been used, with the value of the fish known to have been exported. This test would give two hundred and forty-eight thousand dollars for the salt duty on about one million of dollars' worth of fish; making the duty one-fourth of its value. On this basis, the amount of the duty on the salt used on exported provisions would be near six hundred thousand dollars. 3. By comparing the increasing allowances for salt with the decreasing exportation of fish. This test, for two given periods, the rate of allowance being the same, would produce this result: In the year 1820, three hundred and twenty-one thousand four hundred and nineteen quintals of dried fish exported, and one hundred and ninety-eight thousand seven hundred and twenty-four dollars paid for the commutation of the salt drawback: 1828, two hundred and sixty-five thousand two hundred and seventeen quintals of dried fish exported, and two hundred and thirty-nine thousand one hundred and forty-five dollars paid for the commutation. These comparisons establish the fact that money is unlawfully drawn from the treasury by means of these fishing allowances, bottomed on the salt duty, and that fact is expressly stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, [Mr. Ingham] in his report upon the finances, at the commencement of the present session of Congress. [See page eight of the report.]

6. Because it has become a practical violation of one of the most equitable clauses in the constitution of the United States—the clause which declares that duties, taxes, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the Union. There is no uniformity in the operation of this tax. Far from it. It empties the pockets of some, and fills the pockets of others. It returns to some five times as much as they pay, and to others it returns not a cent. It gives to the fishing interest two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum, and not a cent to the farming interest, which, upon the same principle, would be entitled to six hundred thousand dollars per annum.

7. Because this duty now rests upon a false basis—a basis which makes it the interest of one part of the Union to keep it up, while it is the interest of other parts to get rid of it. It is the interest of the West to abolish this duty; it is the interest of the Northeast to perpetuate it. The former loses money by it; the latter makes money by it; and a tax that becomes a money making business is a solecism of the highest order of absurdity. Yet such is the fact. The treasury records prove it, and it will afford the Northeast a brilliant opportunity to manifest their disinterested affection to the West, by giving up their own profit in this tax, to relieve the West from the burthen it imposes upon her.

8. Because the repeal of the duty will not materially diminish the revenue, nor delay the extinguishment of the public debt. It is a tax carrying money out of the treasury, as well as bringing it in. The issue is two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, perhaps the full amount which accrues on the kind of salt to which the abolition extends. The duty, and the fishing allowances bottomed upon it, falling together as they did when Mr. Jefferson was President, would probably leave the amount of revenue unaffected.

9. Because it belongs to an unhappy period in the history of our Government, and came to us, in its present magnitude, in company with an odious and repudiated set of measures. The maximum of twenty cents a bushel on salt was fixed in the year '98, and was the fruit of the same system which produced the alien and sedition laws, the eight per cent. loans, the stamp act, the black cockade, and the standing army in time of peace. It was one of the contrivances of that disastrous period for extorting money from the people, for the support of that strong and splendid Government which was then the cherished vision of so many exalted heads. The reforming hand of Jefferson overthrew it, and all the superstructure of fishing allowances which was erected upon it. The exigencies of the late war caused it to be revived for the term of the war, and the interest of some, and the neglect of others, have permitted it to continue ever since. It is now our duty to sink it a second time. We profess to be disciples of the Jeffersonian school; let us act up to our profession, and complete the task which our master set us.

This concludes what I have to say on the present occasion. I flatter myself that I have vindicated the title of my bill; that I have shown it to be a bill to provide for the abolition of unnecessary duties; to relieve the people from sixteen millions of taxes; and to improve the condition of the agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation, of the United States. I now submit my motion, in form, for leave to bring it in.

[The leave was thereupon granted, and the bill read the first time.]

MR. FOOT'S RESOLUTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. FOOT.

Mr. WOODBURY addressed the Senate till three o'clock, when he yielded to a motion to adjourn.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1830.

Mr. WOODBURY resumed and concluded his remarks upon the great subjects of debate. They were to the following effect:

Perhaps [said Mr. W.] I could best repay the kind indulgence of the Senate yesterday, in adjourning so early to accommodate me, by an entire silence to-day. But it was my lot, possibly my misfortune, to offer an amendment to the resolution, which has occasioned such a long, and, in some respects, unpleasant debate. The amendment was offered in that spirit of kindness towards the West, which I had rather practice, than merely profess; and, after opinions on the subject had become controverted, it was offered with a view to elicit fully the real disposition felt in this body concerning the surveys and sales of the public lands. The unexpected motion to postpone both the resolution and the amendment, evidently tends to defeat a distinct expression of opinion upon either, and has opened the door to a course of argument, and a latitude of discussion, I believe, somewhat unprecedented. It seems to have metamorphosed the Senate, not only into a committee of the whole on the state of the Union, but on the state of the Union in all time past, present, and to come. So be it, if gentlemen please. This is not alluded to in the spirit of rebuke against either side, as every Senator in such cases is doubtless at liberty to pursue the dictates of his own judgment, and is doubtless able to vindicate his own course to his constituents and his country.

But, in one view, this wide range of discussion has proved a subject of deep regret to me individually, as it has led gentlemen into remarks on the amendment, and on matters and things in general, some of which bore personally on myself, and on that portion of my constituents with whom I had the pleasure to act in the late Presidential election. Those remarks, if unnoticed, may lead to a misapprehension of our real opinions on questions of public moment—which opinions I disdain to conceal, so far as regards myself; and to imputations on those constituents, utterly derogatory, and utterly unmerited—imputations, about which I cared little, if flung in the scavenger slang of the day on myself alone, because I have long been injured to them from certain quarters, like all other men in the East, who refuse to bow the knee there to certain political Dragons; but imputations, against which, when gravely made by conscript fathers, and extended to a large body of my constituents, I feel it my duty to defend them, here and elsewhere—now and henceforth, while I have power left to defend any thing.

But let us first advert a moment to the amendment offered by me to this resolution, and my opinions on its subject matter. The amendment has been considered by some in debate, and roundly asserted in the numerous libels that issue from the epistolary mints in this city—those manufactures so exorbitantly protected—to be, substantially, a proposition to give away the whole public domain of the Union. Whereas, in truth, it contemplates nothing beyond an inquiry for that light and information so earnestly urged by others; a mere inquiry in a less exceptionable, less questionable shape, into the expediency of making a more rapid survey and sale of the public lands.

The reasons for that inquiry have before been stated, and need not be repeated, except to observe, that they rest on the facts of increasing competition in the sales of land by other governments on our Northern and South-western frontier; the vast quantities yet to be surveyed and sold by ourselves, and on our duties to the new States equally, in respect to the survey, sale, and settlement, of our untaxed domain within their respective boundaries. To discharge such duties; to give a wider sphere for choice to the enterprising yeomanry from the East and the Middle States, as well as the West; to obtain sooner the means for extinguishing the public debt, that great millstone on the neck of every popular government; all will admit to be legitimate objects; and an amendment seeking these objects could not but tend to fulfil, promptly and justly, the condition on which most of these lands were originally and generously ceded to the Union. This is the whole length, breadth, and depth, of the amendment; but when we travel beyond the amendment and the resolution, to speculate on what has been done, and what shall be done, with these lands in future time, after paying the public debt, then these lands become the apple of discord—then we open a Pandora's box of fears, jealousies, and fierce collisions. On this point, I have heretofore said nothing in this discussion, and should say nothing now, had not my views on the disposition of these lands been misrepresented, and some of my votes at former sessions perhaps misunderstood.

By the terms of the grants, I had always supposed that, as all lands north of the Ohio were expressly obtained "for the common benefit and support of the Union;" as Congress had resolved they "shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States;" and as the residue of our lands were purchased by our common funds, no doubt could exist that they must be used and granted only in a way to be beneficial to the whole. All sales of them, even at reduced prices, and whether to States or individuals, would always, in my opinion, be thus beneficial if competition was open to all; because all would participate in the purchase money obtained, and all could embark in the purchase itself. The hardy and enterprising yeomanry of the East and the Middle States, who seem almost entirely to have been forgotten in this debate, would then find constantly opened to the ambition of themselves and their sons, the benefit of lands at prices within their frugal means, and under democratic institutions of their own choice; and every valley and river of the West would in part become, as many of them are now, vocal with New England tongues, and would, in part, be improved and gladdened by New England industry. So a division of the lands among all the States, who are as joint proprietors, whether divided for specified or general objects, would seem to me a disposition of them for the "common benefit;" but whether it would ever, in other respects, be a judicious disposition of them, considering the new relations and dependency it might create between the General Government and the States, is a grave question, not now material to me to discuss. On our claim and title to these lands, the State I partly represent has expressed a similar and decisive opinion, and one from which I have yet seen no sufficient reason to dissent.

June 22, 1821. "Forasmuch, therefore, as the property and jurisdiction of the soil were acquired by the common means of all, it is contended that the public lands, whether acquired by purchase, by force, or by acts or deeds of cession from individual States, are the common property of the Union, and ought to enure to the common use and benefit of all the States, in just proportions, and not to the use and benefit of any particular State or States, to the exclusion of the others; and that any partial appropriation of them, for State purposes, 'is a violation of the spirit of our national compact, as well as the principles of justice and sound policy.'"

And further, "that each of the United States has an equal right to participate in the benefit of the public lands, as the common property of the Union."—[Niles's Reg. p. 391, Res. of N. H. Leg.]

Those who passed that resolution seek no injustice or inequality towards the new States. The democracy of New Hampshire, neither then nor now, any more than in the last war, would refuse any aid or relief to the West, within the permission of the constitution; they would, neither in peace nor hostility, taunt her when distressed, or mock when her calamity cometh. Grateful for the sympathies and kindnesses shown them in this debate, from some of the West, as well as the South, I presume they stand ready now, as ever, to make any modification in the system of the public lands, or in the prices, the surveys, or sales, which can prove useful to the new States, and, at the same time, not prove unequal or unjust to the old States, nor conflict with the condition of the original cessions or the specific powers of the General Government over the common property of the Union. They stand ready to do this, also, because it is right: and not to form new, or perfect old alliances, since they seek no alliances with the South, the West, or the Centre, but those of mutual respect, mutual courtesy, and mutual benefits, according to the provisions of the constitution.

Such a division of the lands as the New Hampshire resolution approves, without reference to other notions concerning what has before been granted for education and to the other consideration before named, would, to every unjaundiced eye, seem to keep up the symmetry of our political system as a confederation, and not a consolidation of States; and hence would keep up an adherence to their mutual rights as States in the whole public property. Any such disposition of them, if effected speedily, would likewise relieve Congress from a subject of legislation most burthensome, invidious, and vexatious. Whether our bills be four hundred or four thousand on that subject, they certainly engross much time, and subject us to vast expenditures. Either a sale or division would bring relief.

FEB. 24, 1830.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

The West would be double gainers by either, as they would get an equal share in the division, and a speedy power of taxation over the whole.

But the contrary course, of a yearly scramble for scraps of these lands, sometimes for roads, sometimes for canals, sometimes for asylums, and sometimes for colleges, seems to me any thing but a disposition for the "common benefit," and seems likely to prove an endless source of favoritism, jealousies, and corrupt combinations. If the lands do not all, in time, become thus wasted and frittered away for little of good to any quarter, they surely will be disposed of very unequally; they will excite dissatisfaction in the States not made donees, rather than tend to the "support of the Union;" and they will be appropriated to objects, not, in my opinion, specified in the constitution as within the cognizance of the Government of the Union.

The test adopted by some gentlemen, in voting for a grant to a road, canal, or college, that, if it be a good to the place where located, it is a good to a part of the whole, and thus a good to the whole, seems to me a very convenient argument to support a donation in any place, to any object, however limited, if the object be only beneficial in any degree; and the whole domain certainly might thus be taken off our hands in a single week. To contend, also, that the lands may be given to such objects in small quantities, and may not at once be given to one, or a few, or all the States, in large quantities, seems to me a suicidal position, and to make a distinction without a difference.

Without reference to that kind of sales the Government can make for the common benefit, such as grants to the new States for schools, and receive a virtual compensation therefor, by having the rest of the land freed from taxation, we merely lay down what we suppose to be the general principle.

No reasoning has been offered which convinces me that lands can be legally appropriated to any object for which we might not legally appropriate money. The lands are as much the property of the Union as its money in the treasury. The cessions and purchases of them were as much for the benefit of all as the collection of the money. The constitution, as well as common sense, seems to me to recognize no difference; and if the money can only be appropriated to specified objects, it follows that the land can only be so appropriated. Within those specified objects, I have, ever been, and ever shall be, as ready to give lands or money to the West as the East; but, beyond them, I never have been ready to give either to either. Towards certain enumerated objects, Congress have authority to devote the common funds—the land or the money; because those objects were supposed to be better managed under their control than under that of the States; but the care of the other objects is reserved to the States themselves, and can only be promoted by the common funds, in a return or division of those funds to the proprietors, to be expended as they may deem judicious.

The whole debate on these points goes to satisfy my mind of the correctness of that construction of the constitution which holds no grants of money or lands valid, unless to advance some of the enumerated objects entrusted to Congress. When we once depart from that great land mark on the appropriations of lands or money, and wander into indefinite notions of the "common good," or of the "general welfare," we are, in my opinion, at sea without compass or rudder; and in a Government of acknowledged limitations, we put every thing at the caprice of a fluctuating majority here; pronouncing that to be for the general welfare to-day, which to-morrow may be denounced as a general curse. Were the Government not limited, this broad discretion would, of course, be necessary and right. But here every grant of power is defined. Many powers are not ceded to the General Government, but are expressly withheld to the States and people; and no right is, in my opinion, given to promote the "general welfare" by granting money or lands, but in the exercise of the specific powers thus granted, and, in the modes prescribed by the constitution.

Such limitations of power are admitted by all to be the great glory of a written constitution, and, since the Magna Charta at Runny Mead, can never be long violated with impunity among any of Saxon descent.

The General Government is well known to have been created chiefly for limited objects, connected with commerce and foreign intercourse: and so far from being unlimited in its jurisdiction, extent, or means, was based on express and jealous specifications; and designed not for the prostration, but the preservation of State rights and State governments, for most of the great purposes of political society. Without going further at this time, and on this occasion, into the argument, legal or constitutional, upon the broad and the strict constructions, I shall content myself with some references to the political bearing of these constructions on the public lands, and on the great topics of controversy introduced into this debate, and to some signal authorities in favor of my views, found in the records of the General Government, and of the State in which I have the honor in part to represent—a State whose instructions I shall not, like the Senator from Maine, refuse to obey, nor deny to be my only earthly "lord and master," rather than the individual "idol or image" of which he spoke so reverently.

We all know that, early as the year 1794, the division commenced in Congress between the advocates of extended constructive powers in the General Government, and especially in its Executive department, and the advocates of State rights, and of restricted views on constitutional powers.

In relation to Jay's treaty, and the questions connected with it, the lines began to be distinctly marked, and the head of the present administration was found, as the author of the Declaration of our Independence was found, among the firm opposers of indefinite constructive powers; and the vote of the former, on the retirement of the first President, so often appealed to and misrepresented in the late canvass by his opposers, appears to have been predicated entirely upon part of the policy and measures then pursued under these views of the constitution. He has repeated his former opinions in his message at the opening of this Congress, by warning us not "to undermine the whole system by a resort to overstrained constructions," and by warning us against "all encroachments upon the legitimate sphere of State sovereignty." The same course of division among our leading statesmen was evinced in the debate on the foreign intercourse bill, in 1798; and the distinguished agent on the Northeastern boundary, now in this country, then, as since, bent the whole force of his acute and profound mind to show the evil tendency of such an administration of the General Government. The alien and sedition laws soon after brought the hostile parties to a crisis; and then the strong reasoning of Mr. Madison, in the Virginia resolutions of 1798, and the acute mind of Mr. Jefferson, in those of Kentucky, and the whole influence of their democratic coadjutors throughout the Union, were concentrated against those alarming doctrines, and their fatal, practical consequences. One of the Virginia resolutions was in these words: (Virg. Res. p. 4.)

"That this Assembly doth explicitly and peremptorily declare, that it views the powers of the Federal Government, as resulting from the compact to which the States are parties, as limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, as no farther valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that compact; and that, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the States who are parties thereto have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them."

Another resolution is in these words: (Virg. Res. p. 9.)

"That the General Assembly doth also express its deep regret that a spirit has, in sundry instances, been manifested by the Federal Government to enlarge its power, by the forced constructions of the constitutional charter which defines them; and that indications have appeared of a design to expound certain general phrases, which, having been copied from the very limited grant of powers in the former articles of confederation, were the less liable to be misconstrued, so as to destroy the meaning and effect of the particular enumeration, which necessarily explains and limits the general phrases, and so as to consolidate the States by degrees into one sovereignty; the obvious tendency and inevitable result of which would be, to transform the present republican system of the United States into an absolute, or, at best, a mixed monarchy."

Mr. Jefferson, in his letters, has followed up the same ideas, and never parted, till he parted with life itself, from this democratic view of the constitutional compact.

"You will have learned that an act for internal improvement, after passing both Houses, was negatived by the President. The act was founded, avowedly, on the principle that the phrase in the constitution, which authorizes Congress 'to lay taxes, to pay debts, and provide for the general welfare,' was an extension of the powers specifically enumerated to whatever would promote the general welfare; and this, you know, was the federal doctrine. Whereas, our tenet ever was, (and indeed it is almost the only land mark which now divides the federalists from the republicans) that Congress had not unlimited powers to provide for the general welfare, but were restrained to those specifically enumerated; and that, as it was never meant they should provide for that welfare but by the exercise of the enumerated powers, so it could not have been meant they should raise money for purposes which the enumeration did not place under their action; consequently, that the specification of powers is a limitation of the purposes for which they may raise money."—4 Jeff. Works, 306.

Other remarks of his, in like terms, have been before cited, and need not be repeated.

They were opinions which then endeared him to a majority of the Union, and, in 1800, effected the first great political revolution in the administration of our General Government. They were the views of his talented successor, in after times, as well as in 1798, as evinced in numberless of his public acts; and they, in substance, remained the views of his second successor, at least during his first term of office. They long continued every where the watchword of democracy. With many they always have remained the strongest test of political orthodoxy. Such was Mr. Jefferson's own remark, as late as the year 1819. [4 Jeff. 306.] And though, in after and more recent days, some departures may have been witnessed in our ranks from these doctrines, yet they have in general been apparent and local, rather than real and general departures from the doctrines themselves, and have existed rather in a difference of opinion, in particular applications of those doctrines, and in a difference about details, than about fundamental views on the true mode of construing the constitution. Some have been misrepresented on this head, and none I believe, sir, more than yourself. These differences have been rather "the clouds that hang on freedom's jealous brow," than any palpable darkness, or any desertion of the great principles contended for the democracy of the Union, in the great revolution of 1798. Some differences, and honest differences, may, and doubtless do, exist on this point, in all parties; but I am now speaking of this as one basis of the change in administration at that era, and as one of the doctrines of the party at large, as a party, which effected the change. That the opinions of New Hampshire have coincided with these views, whenever her politics have been democratic; and that I, on them, as on the subject of the public lands, am representing truly these sentiments of her democracy, and not as a Judas, so courteously insinuated more than once, is easily demonstrable by a reference, not to pamphlets or newspapers, forgotten or fresh, but to her legislative records. While that State continued under the control of men opposed to Mr. Jefferson, and of principles so fatal to his predecessor; while her Representatives here were voting for Aaron Burr, she, as would naturally be expected, voted against the doctrines of the Virginia resolutions.

But when, politically, she became regenerate, and moved harmoniously with a majority of her sister planets in the democratic system; when the tendencies and progress of the opposite doctrines, urged so often and so strenuously by that gentleman's [Mr. HOLMES's] "matchless spirit of the West," and under his lead; when those tendencies began to alarm the watchful, and call forth deliberate and decisive expressions of State opinions on questions so dear to the purity of the constitution; New Hampshire came out, in both her Executive and Legislative Departments, against the favorite views of that "matchless spirit." She came out with directness and independence, as sovereign States ought to come out, on all great emergencies. She showed her disregard, as a State, of men, whether Southern or Eastern—whether politicians or judges—in high places or low—who, in her opinion, had attempted to seduce the people of the Union, by gradual and stealthy attacks, into the same enlarged and constructive views of the constitution which the revolution of 1800 had openly exposed and defeated.

The Executive, in June, 1822, declared [see 21 Niles's Register] that "The measures of the National Government are justly regarded as subjects of great interest to the people, but they become more peculiarly of this character when believed to be founded on doubtful or erroneous constructions of the constitution, tending to an extension of their own powers. When a case of this kind occurs, or even if it appears probable that it is about to happen, it becomes the duty of the Legislatures of the individual States to adopt such constitutional measures as may tend to correct the error or avert the evil.

"The constitution gives to Congress the power 'to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare, of the United States,' and immediately proceeds to define and vest the specific powers which were deemed necessary to effect these objects. Amongst these it is thought no more can be found, which, on any known principles of construction, can authorize Congress to expend the public resources in mere objects of Internal Improvement. The power to impose taxes to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare, seems to have been construed as a specific grant of power to Congress to do any act, or adopt and carry into effect any and every measure, without restriction, which it might suppose would conduce to the general welfare. This construction is believed to be wholly unwarranted.

"When we advert to the great caution with which the powers vested by the constitution were defined and guarded by that distinguished body of men by whom it was framed, we find it impossible to believe that the indefinite phrase 'to provide for the common defence and general welfare,' in the connexion in which it is, is susceptible of that broad and sweeping construction, which must, of necessity, merge in it, and render utterly superfluous, every special grant of power in that instrument. A power to provide for the general welfare, without restriction or limitation, is, in fact, a power to do whatever those who are invested with it choose to consider promotive of those objects. This is, in truth, the power of a despotism, and can have no place in a free Government, the first principle of which is, that the powers delegated to rulers shall be distinctly and clearly defined and limited.

"At times this is so obvious, that they are seen to possess the effrontery to endeavor to influence public opinion, by boldly affecting to hold up to scorn every measure, having for its object the correction of a wasteful misuse of the public resources, as unbecoming national dignity; as if it were possible that real national dignity and respectability could acknowledge any connexion with profusion and extravagance."

For expressing such opinions, that Executive was then rebuked by the worshippers of enlarged powers, as the same class of persons now taunt any principles or measures leading to reform, or any men who advocate reform. Here, in the capital of the Union, it was sneeringly said: "The Hercules approaches who is to cleanse the Augean stable." [National Intelligencer, June, 1822.] The advocates of reform were then, as now, a theme of daily ridicule, and held up for the "slow unmoving finger of scorn to point at." But the Legislature of New Hampshire responded to the Executive in an able report, and concluded with the following memorable resolutions, with scarcely a dissenting vote:

"1. Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, the constitution of the United States has not vested in Congress the right to adopt and execute, at the national expense, a system of Internal Improvements.

"2. Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, it is not essential so to amend the constitution of the United States, as to give the power to Congress to make roads, bridges, and canals."

She thus evinced, on this point, her democracy, and her jealous attachment to State rights; and this, not only by a decision against the enlarged powers being already reposed in the General Government, but declaring it "not essential" they should be placed there. She believed it dangerous to the welfare and independence of the States either to give these powers to the General Government by construction or express grant; and the former mode was only the more alarming, as it united usurpation and encroachment on State rights with the exercise of a power that she believed tended directly to a consolidation of the Government.

Gentlemen may describe the exercise of such powers as beneficent and splendid; and picture a government with them as having all the "pomp, pride, and circumstance" of Russian or Assyrian greatness. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HOLMES] may again, as in the Panama debate, picture his present martyr, then his "matchless spirit of the West," sighing for such "gorgeous kingdom;" "all the natives of this vast continent to be arrayed" together for "the great occasion;" and the whole "the magnificent scheme of the favorite—the genius—the master spirit of the West." [2d Reg. Deb. 270.] Others may reverse the picture, and describe a government without these powers as too much trammelled in its movements; as "palsied by the will of its constituents;" as too "rigid in its expenditures;" and certainly as too plain and republican in its institutions for those who talk of their political "lord and master" in the person of their Presidents. But nothing seems clearer to me, than that one is the only true government to preserve and perpetuate a mere confederacy of independent and democratic sovereignties; and the other, by whatever name baptised, is a government tending to consolidation—to consolidation, not of the Union, but of all political powers in the Union. The difference does not consist so much in words as in things; not in professions, but in effects: the one tending to a republican confederation; the other, in the language of the Virginia resolutions, to a "practical monarchy."

The Virginia Resolutions, p. 13, say further:

"Whether the exposition of the general phrases here combated, would not, by degrees, consolidate the States into one sovereignty, is a question concerning which the committee can perceive little room for difference of opinion. To consolidate the States into one sovereignty, nothing more can be wanted than to supersede their respective sovereignties in the cases reserved to them, by extending the sovereignty of the United States to all cases of the 'general welfare,' that is to say, to 'all cases whatever.'"

Grant that a different opinion on this construction has now, and ever has had, from Hamilton, Ames, and the elder Adams, honest and able advocates; yet the tendencies of it, whether to consolidation and monarchy, or not, have been, and are still, matter of fair argument and just criticism. In that view, and in the importance of this construction to the present mode of making donations of the public lands, and to a just judgment on the imputations cast on myself and my constituents, as having little claims to real democracy, I have attempted to vindicate my own notions, and those of my own State, without a detailed collection of the reasoning on the abstract question, and without any strictures on the motives of those who differ from me. A word more, and I dismiss this consideration.

Who is so blind as not to see, in the approaching condition of our Government, on the extinguishment of the national debt, and with our present enormous duties retained, creating a vast surplus revenue of ten or fifteen millions of dollars; who does not see a cause of new and most fearful apprehension to the States, if all that surplus, as well as all the public lands, can, and shall be employed under the General Government, in objects that Government may think conducive to the "common good," or "general welfare?" Who does not see a door opened to favoritism and corruption, which may let in irretrievable ruin to sound political justice and equality, and overwhelm every vestige of State independence? Who does not see—I care not by whose hands administered—I say the same in a majority as when in a minority—I say the same under this as under the last administration—who does not see a power never contemplated at the formation of the constitution, and which can never be exercised under our present political system, without tainting to the core, both those who exercise and those who feel it? Do I say this because hostile to Internal Improvements? No! But because hostile to the degeneracy, if not the ruin of our confederacy; and because I would advance Internal Improvements at the expense of the States and individuals, and not at the expense of the Union. I would do it the only way they ever can be advanced, with safety and usefulness—according to the resolution of New Hampshire, before read; and in those cases only in which individuals and States can see their private and local interest to be so much promoted by these improvements, as to warrant the undertakings by themselves.

Has it then come to this, under such a Government, that one of the parties cannot, in any way, interpose and correct its ruinous tendencies, and its insidious constructions, when the great exigencies of the country demand it? I think there has been more apparent than real difference on this point, in the present debate. Most must admit that they can interfere in some way; so said the fathers of democracy in '98; so said the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions; and so do those say whom I represent. They can interpose in various ways. My theory on this subject may vary more in form than substance from other gentlemen's, but as each speaks for himself on this floor, I may be permitted to state briefly it is this: that the parties to the constitution are the agents of the people and the States, placed in the General Government on the one hand, and the agents of the people placed in their State Governments on the other hand; and that the people, separated from their agents, are only the great primary power and foundation of the whole, never acting as one whole upon or about the constitution, either legislatively, executive, or judicially; but acting on it in those forms, or any others, only by their agents in the States and in the General Government. But the people themselves are still a power behind the throne greater than the throne itself; and, encroach yourselves as you may, to the teeth, in parchments and constructions, they, by their agents, in convention in the States, can abolish every institution, political or civil, of the Union or of the respective States.

SENATE.]

Mr. Foote's Resolution.

The parties, then, in collision as to the extent of the powers given by the constitution of the Union, are seldom the people with their agents of either class, and never so any length of time without a sufficient redress; but the opposing parties are generally, on the one hand, the agents of the people and the States, under that constitution, and, on the other hand, their agents under the State constitutions. I say the agents of the people and States in the General Government, as the States are technically represented here, in the Senate, and may always technically and solely choose all the electors of the executive branch. The former, acting in the administration of the General Government, causes the former, properly enough in common parlance, to be called the General Government, and the latter the States. The people, as such, unless in a revolutionary condition, cannot cast a single vote, hold a single town meeting, or lay out a road of ordinary highway, except through State power and State agency. I shall not repeat what reasoning and illustration the gentlemen from Kentucky [Mr. ROWAN] and South Carolina [Mr. HAYNE] have adduced, in proof of these views, but merely cite a clause, in the Virginia resolutions of '93, to show, that these views, whether right or wrong, were the views of the fathers of the democratic party, and if I err, I err with the Platos and Socrates of my political faith. [Virg. Res. p. 8.]

"The other position involved in this branch of the resolution, namely, 'that the States are not parties to the constitution or compact,' is, in the judgment of the committee, equally free from objection. It is indeed true that the term 'States' is sometimes used in a vague sense, and sometimes in different senses, according to the subject to which it is applied. Thus it sometimes means the separate sections occupied by the political societies within each; sometimes the particular governments established by those societies; sometimes those societies as organized into those particular governments; and lastly, it means the people composing those political societies in their highest political sovereign capacity. Although it might be wished that the perfection of language admitted less diversity in the signification of the same words, yet little inconvenience is produced by it, where the true sense can be collected with certainty from the different applications. In the present instance, whatever different constructions of the term 'States,' in the resolution, may have been entertained, all will at least concur in that last mentioned; because in that sense the constitution was submitted to the 'States,' in that sense the 'States' ratified it; and in that sense of the term 'States,' they are consequently parties to the compact from which the powers of the Federal Government result."

The States, then, being one party, is it to be contended that still the other party, the General Government, may adopt any extended construction of the powers granted under the constitution, without any efficient right on the part of the States to murmur, remonstrate, alter, or resist? Certainly not, I should think, on either side of the debate.

But how far can they go, and "where shall their proud waves be staid?" The opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, a tribunal appointed, organized, and accountable only to one party to the Government, and one party to the decision, is urged on us to be the great final balance wheel of the whole machinery. But if the States be another party to the compact, it is manifest that, on ordinary principles of compact, they have the same right as the opposite party, or its agents, to decide on the extent of the compact. This is conceded between two parties, in the case of treaties, and in the case of ordinary bargains and conventions; and it cannot be denied here, admitting we have shown the States to be one party, unless both the parties have expressly agreed upon some tribunal intermediate, as an umpire or judge, to decide, irrevocably, this kind of differences between the parties to the constitution. On the other hand, I understand it to be argued that the Supreme Court has been agreed on as such a tribunal. But, the Supreme Court of the United States would not be likely to be so agreed on, reasoning a priori, because its members are all appointed by, and answerable to, only one of the parties, and indeed go to form a portion of one of the parties, being mere agents of the General Government. The amendments of the constitution, reserving rights and powers to the States or People, would be nugatory—a mere mockery, if the suicidal grant was made to the Supreme Court, to the mere agents of one party, to decide finally and forever on the extent of all their own powers. The reasoning for this grant, therefore, seems to me argumentum ad absurdum, as clear as any axiom in Euclid. But on this head I am anxious not to be misapprehended, and am willing to resort to the words of the charter itself to see what the legitimate powers of that court purport to be, in deciding such controversies.

From the very fact of there being two parties in the Federal Government, it would seem a necessary inference that the agents of each party, on proper occasions, must be allowed, and are required, by an official oath, to conform to the constitution, and to decide on the extent of its provisions, so far as is necessary for the expression of their own views, and for the performance of their own duties. This being, to my mind, the rationale of the case, I look on the express words of the constitution as conforming to it by limiting the grant of judicial jurisdiction to the Supreme Court, both by the constitution and by the acts of Congress to specific enumerated objects. In the same way there are limited grants of judicial jurisdiction to State courts, under most of the State constitutions. When cases present themselves within these grants, the judges, whether of the States or the United States, must decide, and enforce their decision with such means as are confided to them by the laws and the constitutions. But when questions arise, not confided to the Judiciary of the States or United States, the officers concerned in those questions must themselves decide them; and, in the end, must pursue such course as their views of the constitution dictate. In such instances they have the same authority to make this decision as the Supreme Court itself has in other instances.

Thus the Virginia Resolutions, page 13, say: "However true, therefore, it may be, that the Judicial Department is, in all questions submitted to it by the forms of the constitution, to decide in the last resort, this resort must necessarily be deemed the last in relation to the authorities of the other departments of the Government; not in relation to the rights of the parties to the constitutional compact, from which the judicial as well as the other departments hold their delegated trusts. On any other hypothesis, the delegation of judicial power would annul the authority delegating it; and the concurrence of this department with the others in usurped powers, might subvert forever, and beyond the possible reach of any rightful remedy, the very constitution which all were instituted to preserve.

Thus, Mr. Jefferson says: "They contain the true principles of the revolution of 1800, for that was as real a revolution in the principles of our Government as that of 1776 was in its form; not effected, indeed, by the sword, as that, but by the rational and peaceable instrument of reform—the suffrage of the people. The nation declared its will by dismissing functionaries of one principle, and electing those of another; and the two branches, the Executive and Legislative, submitted to their election. Over the Judiciary Department the constitution had deprived them of their control. That, therefore, has continued the reprobated system; and although new matter has been occasionally incorporated into the old, yet the leaven of the old mass seems to assimilate to itself the new; and after twenty years' confirmation of the Federal system by the voice of the nation, declared through the medium of elections, we find the Judiciary, on every occasion, still driving us into consolidation."

"In denying the right they usurp, of exclusively explaining the constitution, I go farther than you do, if I understand rightly your quotation from the Federalist, of an opinion that 'the Judiciary is the last resort in relation to the other departments of the Government, but not in relation to the rights of the parties to the compact under which the Judiciary is derived.' If this opinion be sound, then, indeed, is our constitution a complete felo de se. For, intending to establish three departments, co-ordinate and independent, that they might check and balance one another, it has given, according to this opinion, to one of them alone, the right to prescribe rules for the Government of the others, and to that one, too, which is unelected by, and independent of, the nation. For experience has already shown that the impeachment it has provided is not even a scarecrow; that such opinions as the one you combat, sent cautiously out, as you observe, also, by detachment, not belonging to the case often, but sought for out of it, as if to rally the public opinion beforehand to their views, and to indicate the line they are to walk in, have been so quietly passed over as never to have excited animadversion, even in a speech of any one of the body entrusted with impeachment. The constitution, on this hypothesis, is a mere thing of wax in the hands of the Judiciary, which they may twist and shape into any form they please. It should be remembered, as an axiom of eternal truth in politics, that whatever power in any government is independent, is absolute also; in theory only, at first, while the spirit of the people is up, but in practice as fast as that relaxes. Independence can be trusted no where but with the people in mass. They are inherently independent of all but moral law. My construction of the constitution is very different from that you quote. It is, that each department is truly independent of the others, and has an equal right to decide for itself what is the meaning of the constitution in the cases submitted to its action; and especially where it is to act ultimately and without appeal."

In confirmation of this, almost every Eastern constitution authorizes the departments of Government, not Judicial, to call on the judges for aid and advice merely, in questions of difficulty, still leaving those departments to act finally on their own matured information, and their own responsibility. But all the difficulty does not arise here. Suppose the State agents, judicial or otherwise, decide wrong in the opinion of the people; or the agents of the General Government decide wrong in the opinion of the people, on subjects admitted to be within their jurisdiction; is there, first, no remedy for the people? Are not they supreme?

As I before remarked, the people, in their omnipotence, if the case excite them enough, can, and will, in such event, always apply a most sovereign remedy; sometimes reach the disease by changing the agents who have misbehaved; at other times, when unable, by the tenure of office, as in the case of the judges generally, to reach that class of agents by new elections, they can, by conventions, alter or abolish the whole system of government, and the whole course of decisions under them; and improve and create anew whatever may have been objectionable. This is a doctrine neither revolutionary nor leading to anarchy, but rational and democratic, and lies at the foundation of all popular Governments. But granting this, the argument still holds, that, though the people can effect a change, yet the States, one of the parties to the compact, cannot reach or correct what they may deem an erroneous decision by the agents of the other party on the powers given by the compact, and especially that they cannot reach or correct an erroneous decision made by the Supreme Court of the Union. Again, it may be answered, reasoning a priori, that, if this be true, it is deeply to be lamented, as the people seldom act unitedly or efficiently except through their State agents—those agents who come so frequently and so directly from among the people themselves. If this be true, it is quite certain that the Supreme Court might, if so disposed, proceed, case by case, from year to year, on one subject and another, in this and that section of the Union, to give constructions to the constitution, tending slowly, but inevitably, to a consolidation of the Government, and to the utter prostration of State rights: and yet the people, as a people, would not widely and at once become enough excited to interpose in their primary authority, and stay or correct such encroachments. If this be true, any Supreme Court entertaining political views hostile to those of a majority of the people, would be able, in time, by cautious approaches, not exciting general and deep alarm, to defeat the majority, to render the reservations to the States and people a mere brutum fulmen, turn the doctrine of State rights into a jest, and ride triumphantly over all probable and feasible opposition.

There is wanting in me no respect to the members of our Supreme Court which their great personal worth deserves: but I would inquire if, from the case of Marbury and Madison, in 1801, down to that of the Bank and McCulloch in 1821, there has not been evinced on that Bench a manifest and sleepless opposition, in all cases of a political bearing, to the strict construction of the constitution adopted by the democracy of the Union, in the great revolution of 1801? I say nothing now against the honesty or legal correctness of their views in adopting such a construction. I speak only of the matter of fact, and of its political tendency; and I ask, if, while the people, through their democratic agents in the Legislatures of the State and General Governments, have been, in the main, adhering to one construction—a strict and rigid construction—if their Judicial agents in the General Government have not been, with a constancy and silence, like the approaches of death, adhering to a ferent construction? Thus sliding onward to consolidation; thus giving a diseased enlargement to the powers of the General Government, and throwing chains over State rights—chains never dreamed of at the formation of the General Government. What says Mr. Jefferson on this head? [4 Jefferson's Works, page 337.]

"But it is not from this branch of Government we have most to fear. Taxes and short elections will keep them right. The Judiciary of the United States is the subtle corps of sappers and miners, which is constantly working under ground to undermine the foundations of our confederated fabric. They are construing our constitution from a co-ordination of a general and special Government to a general and supreme one alone. This will lay all things at their feet, and they are too well versed in English law to forget the maxim, 'boni judicis est ampliare jurisdictionem.'"

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[FEB. 24, 1830.]

No institution, in this free country, is above just criticism and fair discussion, in regard to its political views, and the political consequences of its proceedings. Hence, in the States, and every where, the field of inquiry and comment is, and should be, open to all; and a sacredness from this would render any institution a despotism. What, then, let me ask, what have been the illustrations of the bearing of the decisions of that court upon State rights, in particular cases? At one time, has not Georgia been prostrated by a decision, in a case, feigned, or real, between Fletcher and Peck? At another, Pennsylvania's humbled, in the case of Olmstead's executors? At another, Ohio and Maryland subdued, in the case of McCulloch and the Bank? At another, New York herself set at defiance, in the steamboat controversy? And last, if not least, New-Hampshire vanquished in the case of Dartmouth College? These decisions may, or may not, have been legally right; that is not my present inquiry; but who is not struck with the difference between the progress and effect of these decisions, and what was witnessed in the earlier days of the republic? When Massachusetts, in the height of her glory, was threatened to be brought to the bar of that court for trial, she, in the person of Hancock, set on foot a remonstrance, and a proposed amendment of the constitution, which her great influence carried throughout the Union—an amendment exempting a sovereign State there, in certain cases, from the humiliation of a trial and sentence. Even this amendment, so plausible on its face, has, since 1801, been almost wholly evaded in practice, by suing the agents of a State, instead of the State itself. So again, before 1801, when Virginia, in her might and chivalry, took the field against the alien and sedition laws, and against the decision of the Supreme Court on their constitutionality, an alteration of the constitution, to be sure, did not follow, but an alteration in the administration and the laws did follow; and she effected the political revolution which suffered those laws to expire without a renewal, and will probably prevent their re-enactment, until democracy itself shall have become a forgotten tale. I shall enumerate no other cases, nor detain the Senate by a moment's inquiry into the correctness of any of these decisions: though it may be observed that my own State, on an attempt to obtain her political approbation of the decisions in the cases of Ohio and Maryland, and of the principles therein involved, postponed indefinitely the resolutions on that subject, by the following vote, in one branch of her Legislature;

June 24, 1821. The Senate voted, seven to five, to postpone indefinitely the following, among other resolutions:

“Resolved, That, in the opinion of this Legislature, the proceedings in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Ohio, in the before mentioned report stated, do not violate either the letter or the spirit of the 11th article of the amendment of the constitution of the United States, nor constitute any just cause of complaint.”

The only time she ever expressed any opinion, as a State, hostile to my views concerning the powers of the General Government and its Judiciary, was in rejecting the Virginia resolutions, at an era in her politics when, having just cast her votes for the elder Adams, she might naturally be expected to be hostile to the democratic principles of those resolutions.

It will thus be seen how the powers of the General Government have been gradually brought, through one of its departments, to bear on the States; and how the decisions of that department have gradually tended to the dangerous enlargement of those powers. This subject has been adverted to, not for the purpose of questioning the constitutional competency of that court so to decide, when it thinks best, but to ask whether no way exists for the States, when opposed to the political bearing of those constructions; when opposed to such a political operation of the constitution, to check or control the influence of such a course of decisions? And, if any way does not exist, whether the Government is not likely soon to end in consolidation? And whether our future Presidents and Vice Presidents, without reference to any of the signs of the times about a new alliance, are not, as more than once intimated in this discussion, from the West and East, to be lifted hereafter from that Bench, to preside over the new destinies of a consolidated Government? My own answer, to some of these inquiries, is, firstly, that, by the States, as States, the erroneous decision of the Legislative and Executive departments of the General Government can generally be corrected by changing, in the State Legislatures, and at the ballot boxes, the agents here who made those decisions. This has been the ordinary remedy in ordinary cases. Another class of decisions, and especially those by the Judiciary, when the judges are not removable by the people, or the States, or Congress, as those of the Supreme Court are not, can be corrected, sometimes by the States, as States, through public expressions of opinion in their Legislatures, acting by their intrinsic reasoning and force on the agents who made those decisions, and inducing them to revise and alter their doctrines in future. It would not be derogatory to any court to listen to any expressions of opinions and arguments such as those contained in the Virginia resolutions of 1798; in the resolutions of South Carolina on the tariff; or in the Executive message, resolutions, and report, of the Legislature of New Hampshire, in 1822, on the constructive powers claimed for the General Government. When all these modes fail, another and decisive resort, on the part of the States, is to amendments of the constitution, by the safe and large majority of three-fourths. The acknowledged power of the States, by their resolutions and concert, in this way, to effect any changes, limitations, or corrections, shows clearly that in them the real sovereignty between the two Governments is placed by the constitution; and in them the final, paramount, supremacy resides. They can alter this constitution; but we, here, cannot alter their constitutions. We, then, are the servants, and they the master. On the contrary, whatever others may hold, I do not hold that any certain redress, beyond this, on the part of any State, can be interposed against such decisions of the Supreme Court as are followed by legal process, unless that State resorts, successfully, to force against force, in conflict with the Federal agents. It is admitted by me, however, that a State may resolve, may express her convictions on the nullity or unconstitutionality of a law or decision of the General Government. These doings may work a change through public opinion, or lead to a co-operation of three-fourths of the sister States, to correct the errors by amendments of the constitution. But whenever the enforcement of the law or decision comes within the scope of the acknowledged jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and can be accomplished by legal process, I see no way in which that court can be controlled, except by moral and intellectual appeals to the hearts and heads of her judges, or by amendments to the constitution, or by the deplorable and deprecated remedy of physical force. This latter resort I do not understand any gentleman here to approve, until all other resorts fail; and even then, only in a case where the evil suffered is extreme and palpable, and, indeed, more intolerable and dangerous than the dissolution of the Government itself.

Such was the doctrine of Jefferson and Madison. (Virginia resolutions, p. 18.)

“The resolution has accordingly guarded against any misapprehension of its object, by expressly requiring, for such an interposition, ‘the case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous breach of the constitution, by the exercise of powers not granted by it.’ It must be a case, not of a light and transient nature, but of a nature dangerous to the great purposes for which the constitution was established. It must be a case, moreover, not obscure or doubtful in its construction, but plain and palpable. Lastly, it must be a case not resulting from a partial consideration, or hasty determination; but a case stamped with a final consideration and deliberate adherence."

Beyond these views I trust no member of this confederacy will ever feel either the necessity or inclination to advance, and thus put in jeopardy that Union which we all profess so highly to prize. Most of the States, as States, in most of the exigencies that have arisen under the constitution, though all other efforts failed, have thought it better still to suffer—

"To bear the ills we have,
Than fly to others that we know not of."

How far the official authorized State acts under Pennsylvania, in the case of Olmstead; and the same authorized State acts in Massachusetts, in withholding the militia from the General Government; and of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, as States assembling by their delegates in the Hartford Convention, in a time of war, and with such objects as the late Chief Magistrate imputed to them in 1828, and the present Chief Magistrate recognized in his letter to Mr. Monroe in 1816; how far these were exceptions from their history to the obedience of the States as States, to the laws and constitution, I see not, now, any pleasure, or profit, or necessity, in inquiring. Every sovereign State, who has or who may, decide on forcible collision, decides for herself, though she manifestly does it under a high responsibility to her people and the Union; and of course, must consent to be judged upon, however harshly, by public opinion, and be willing to abide on her course the decision made by the scrutiny of argument and time.

Having stated some of my deliberate views on the interests of the States in the public lands, and on the power of Congress in the disposal of them, and having attempted to fortify those views by my opinions on the just construction of the constitution, as regards the power of Congress to appropriate either land or money, I have next hastily adverted to the rights of the States and the people to control Congress and the Federal Judiciary, when disposed to place a construction on those powers not in accordance with the opinion of the States and the people.

Under these limitations of the constitution, as expounded by the State I represent, and by myself, I here profess, on this unpleasant controversy between parts of the West and the East, that I am willing to go, on all subjects connected with the public lands, into equal and useful reform in our present system of either surveys or sales. But, I am frank to confess, I have uniformly voted against appropriations for general surveys for roads and canals, and against donations of land or money towards roads and canals, unless so far as our express contract requires in relation to the Cumberland road, and the extension of it; or unless the roads were military, or situated in territories owned by the United States. Other gentlemen have doubtless done the same, for the same reasons; whether from the South or East; and it is a mistake, evinced by our own records, to suppose that all, or even a majority of the East have uniformly gone in favor of these objects. On other subjects, the case may be very different in respect to the vote of the East or the South, arising from local prejudices, or political opinions; but on that question enough has been said by other gentlemen, and enough shown by documents and records, to render farther comment useless, and to throw some additional light and interest upon the political and party history of this country for the last fifty years. A farther reason for refraining upon these subjects is, that the strictures made here, unfavorable to the East, concerning these subjects, have expressly, repeatedly, and from all quarters, excepted the democracy of the East; and hence I see no occasion for myself, as one of that democracy, to enter into that part of the discussion for either inquiry or vindication. If any other political party than the democracy in the East has been attacked, and has felt aggrieved—if the peace party in the late war has met with undue severity, they, if not their associates, will speak for themselves. But this much I will add on the graduation bill of my friend from Missouri, [MR. BENTON] and on his good name. I cannot agree, with the gentleman from Maine, [MR. HOLMES] that they have never come to the knowledge of my constituents; but, on the contrary, however they may doubt the expediency of parts of that bill, they stand ready at all times, and on all occasions, so far as that democracy is represented by me, to pay due homage to the vigorous intellect of its author, and to his indefatigable and faithful services on this floor, not only to the West, but the country at large, upon almost every great question, agitated here since my personal acquaintance with this body. Whatever others in the East may profess, I do not contend that every Western measure, whether for Internal Improvement or different objects, has been indebted for its success to Eastern votes; and I appeal to no alliances, new or old, in confirmation or in consequence of it; nor do I ask, like one of the gentlemen from Maine, [MR. SPRAGUE] one vote against the West to be judged by the motive and not its effects, another by its effects and not the motive; one by the aid received of a minority from the east of the Hudson, and another by a minority northeast of the Potomac. I, for one, put forth no such claims or arguments; but frankly avow, though generally supporting the Western measures before named, I have in other cases voted against the West, as I have against the South, the Middle States, and the East itself. But I have done it on principles of equal right, of general justice, and devotion to my official oath; and on no principles of peculiar favoritism to either, except as I might know better, and love dearer, the interests and welfare of my immediate constituents. However scoffed at for hearing New England blood called in question, and holding silence, I claim no exemption from that frailty of predilection towards my native soil, which, if frailty it be, may be thought to lean on virtue's side.

"Breathes there a man with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
"This is my own my native land?"

The examination which has accompanied this debate will not show, I believe, that the West has, in truth, been more benefited by different constitutional opinions, than she would be by those of a strict and democratic character. All the political kindnesses which can be accorded to the West on these last principles of construction, by such of the democracy of the East as entertain them, always has, and I am confident always will, be granted with cheerfulness. Thus, for one, I have voted for the improvement of her lake harbors, and of her navigable rivers, because the power of imposing tonnage duties and imposts, by which such improvements can alone be generally accomplished, is expressly granted to Congress, coupled with the power to regulate commerce: for the relief of her actual settlers on the public lands, many of whom are hardy and honest emigrants from the East, who, flying from the blast of misfortune there, have sought an asylum for all they hold dear, in the bosom of the mighty West: for the extinguishment of Indian titles, because we too have once had such savage neighbors, and often seen our dwellings in a blaze, and our wives and infants perish under their bloody and barbarous warfare: for remuneration against Indian depredations, because those also our early settlers in the East endured frequently, and frequently beheld in a single night the total wreck—the smoking ruins of years of honest and patient industry. Lastly, I have voted for military and territorial roads, and stand ready to vote for lowering the prices of the public lands. But, on some other questions, I have not, and cannot go with the West, any more than they can always go with us. In fine, whenever, under constitutional limitations, I could confer a benefit on the new States, I have, heretofore, and will, in future, attempt it as heartily, as to confer one on Pennsylvania or South Carolina; but beyond those limitations I trust that no honorable statesman from beyond the mountains—and I know that none of the chivalry there, who fought with the democracy of the East, in the late war, for free trade and sailors' rights, can, for a moment, wish me to go, or for a moment can question the sincerity of this avowal in their behalf, or the genuine devotion to the durable welfare of the West, cherished by the democracy I represent. It has not been questioned in this debate, by my friend on the right or the left, [Mr. BEXTON and Mr. HAYNE] but both have eloquently bestowed on that democracy in the East, the praises it richly deserved, and which praises tend to bless both giver and receiver. That democracy has the ties, the sympathies, and affections of the heart, arising from common sufferings and sacrifices, beside the political brotherhood of a common tongue, faith, and institutions, to bind them to the West with stronger ties than any temporary alliances, for purposes whether party or personal. Whether the same ties of the heart can exist between the West and the opponents of that democracy in the East, the peace party in war, who refused relief and succor to the bleeding West, it is for any representatives of those opponents to show. If the Government, on those principles of strict construction of the constitution, cannot be prosperously administered, it requires no spirit of prophecy to foresee that, in a few brief years, in a new crisis approaching, and before indicated, it must, as a consideration, probably cease to be administered at all. It will, in my judgment, become a government of usurped, alarming, undefined powers; and the sacred rights of the States will become overshadowed in total eclipse. When that catastrophe more nearly approaches, unless the great parties to the Government shall arouse, and in some way interfere and rescue it from consolidation, it will follow, as darkness does the day, that the Government ends like all republics of olden times, either in anarchy or despotism.

On some accounts, sir, it would give me most unfeigned pleasure could I close my remarks here. But, for an adherence to what I consider democratic doctrines, on these and other points of controversy, and for an adherence to such men, wherever resident, as practise those doctrines through evil and through good report, it has been the lot of a class of people in the East, for the last third of a century, to be stigmatized by all the opprobrious epithets and insinuations which, in different stages of this debate, have been accumulated on such of them as support the present administration.

On one hand, here, these last have been alluded to as if mere worshippers of a rising sun, and for that, manufactured into democrats dyed in the wool, from the very doors of the Hartford Convention. On another hand, jeered as if democratic only for an adherence to Southern men, and taunted as being small in number, and diminutive in importance. On another hand, stigmatized as Judases and apostates from the true New England faith; and, in fine, loudly denounced, in common with all the supporters of the present administration, as a heterogeneous mass of renegades, from all parties, with no common bond of principle or feeling, and doomed soon to become an easy conquest to the courteous and modest opponents, of what is called this cruel administration. Though one of the supporters of this administration, still [said Mr. W.] nothing short of a strong sense of peculiar duty, on this occasion, could have compelled me to take any part in answering such angry criminations. They seem only the escape of the steam from a high pressure engine, fitted for an eight years' voyage; but the vesse having unexpectedly been compelled to stop its wheels at the end of four years, thus lets off its heated vapor in the midst of its career. I consider the debate, however, in this respect, if no other, as somewhat fortunate, since it may prevent any injury by the bursting of the boilers. But, sir, averse as I am to party bitterness, and the whole Senate can bear me witness that, unless in self-defence, I never make either sectional, party, or personal imputations; and, little regardless as I am of abuse when heaped only on myself—for I have long since learned to let my life, rather than my language, answer personal slander—yet I stand in such a relation to those friends of this administration, in my own State, as to render it unmanly and dishonorable to permit any imputations on them, from however high sources, to pass unnoticed. Much less will I permit them so to pass, when showered upon us chiefly, not by the South, or the West, or the Middle States, but by persons, some of whom claim to be the only lineal sons of the East itself, and the real Simon Pures of all that is democratic, and all that is New England; persons also, who vauntingly march to the attack here, with eleven twelfths against the administration to one in its favor, willing to repel the aggression, and sustain the cause of its Eastern supporters. But this, I suppose, is another specimen of that magnanimity and true greatness, which, when in a minority, always talks of lifting its quadrant to the sun, and of forgetting and forgiving by-gone strifes, by-gone parties, by-gone oppositions; but which, in a majority, directs its vision and its wrath to the smallest light that twinkles. Let me ask, then, more in sorrow than in anger, why are these aggressions made on us? Have any provocations been given for an attack, by Eastern men, on that part of the democracy of the East which supports the present administration? Had a syllable been uttered here, by any of that democracy, against any of their former brethren, whether or not intimating they were now in other ranks, or in other alliances? Had aught been said from the East, reproaching any of them as Swiss troops, coming from, or going to, the peace party in war? On the contrary, not only the Eastern friends of this administration, but the whole democratic party in the East, whether opposers or supporters of this administration, had been studiously, in the whole charge, excepted from any censure flung by any gentleman, on the East itself, or on the excesses of its federalism, during the late war. Thus, my friend on the left [Mr. BEXTON] explicitly said, he flung no reproach or complaint on the Eastern democracy; and we have the printed, as well as spoken declarations of my friend on the right [Mr. HAYNE] to the same effect, and in a strain of the highest, if not most merited eulogy. He said:

"God forbid, sir, that he should charge the people of Massachusetts with participating in these sentiments. The South and the West had then their friends—men who stood by their country, though encompassed all around by their enemies: the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SILSBEE] was one of them; the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FOOT] was another, and there were others now on this floor. The sentiments I have read were the sentiments of a party, embracing the political associates of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER]."

Again, to exempt, with specific certainty, the democratic party at large, as well as the people of Massachusetts, not in concert with the peace party, he [Mr. HAYNE] said:

"I wish to be distinctly understood, that all the remarks I have made on this subject are intended to be exclusively applied to a party, which I have described as the "peace party of New England," embracing the political associates of the Senator from Massachusetts; a party which controlled the operations of that State during the embargo and war, and who are justly chargeable with all the measures I have reprobated. Sir, nothing has been farther from my thoughts than to impeach the character or conduct of the people of New England. For their steady habits, and hardy virtues, I trust I entertain a becoming respect. I fully subscribe to the truth of the description, (given before the Revolution, by one whose praise is the highest eulogy) 'that the perseverance of Holland, the activity of France, and the dexterous and firm sagacity of English enterprise,' have been more than equalled by this 'recent people.' Hardy, enterprising, sagacious, industrious, and moral, the people of New England, of the present day, are worthy of their ancestors. Still less has it been my intention to say any thing that could be construed into a want of respect for that party, who, trampling on all narrow sectional feelings, have been true to their principles in the worst of times—I mean the democracy of New England. I will declare that, highly as I appreciate the democracy of the South, I consider even higher praise to be due to the democracy of New England, who have maintained their principles 'through good and through evil report;' who, at every period of our national history, have stood up manfully for 'their country, their whole country, and nothing but their country.' In the great political revolution of '98, they were found united with the democracy of the South, marching under the banner of the constitution, led on by the patriarch of liberty, in search of the land of political promise, which they lived not only to behold, but to possess and to enjoy. Again, sir, in the darkest and gloomiest period of the war, when our country stood single handed against 'the conqueror of the conquerors of the world'—when all about and around them was dark and dreary, disastrous and discouraging, they stood a Spartan band in that narrow pass, where the honor of their country was to be defended, or to find its grave. And in the last great struggle, involving, as we believe, the very existence of the principle of popular sovereignty, where were the democracy of New England? Where they always have been found, sir; struggling side by side with their brethren of the South and the West for popular rights, and assisting in that glorious triumph by which the man of the people was elevated to the highest office in their gift."

"Thus has he so ably and eloquently poured upon our democracy every commendation they deserve, and for which he is entitled to most grateful thanks, both from myself and them; and thus the naked truth puts to rest the attempts since made to pervert his remarks into a sectional attack on the whole East, and to excite improper and unfounded prejudice against the South and West, as if they had put "the whole East to the ban of the empire."

But, in truth, the sectional attempts to inflame public sentiment will appear to have come from the East itself, if not from some of that party there which alone was censured; and the injunctions of Washington against such sectional appeals, which have been read us, might well furnish admonitions against the course pursued by those on my right, who have read them, [Mr. NONLE and Mr. HOLMES.]

"One of the expedients of party to acquire influence within particular districts, is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You cannot shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heart burnings which spring from those misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection." [5 Marshall's Wash. 300.]

With a charge, then, against only the leaders of the peace party in war, what have we seen in reply? Not an avowed defence of that party, which alone was assailed, and which, by its representation here, commenced the assault on my friend upon the right, by taunts against the South; but we have invocations to forgetfulness, we have protestandos and disclaimers. Not the lions of democracy rousing when not attacked, but the real game pursued rousing as it feels the huntsman in the chase, and seeking to infuse alarm into all within its influence, and all starting aside, from anger or mortification that the democracy was not also attacked, to fasten upon our throats with all the bitterness of our most virulent defamers for the last third of a century.

I cherish, sir, quite too much self-respect, and too great personal regard for that portion of the federalism of this Union which has been honest, consistent, and faithful to the country, however much we may differ in our political views, ever to cast on any of its number personal or party strictures, beyond what is necessarily involved in settling historical facts, and in defence of myself and my constituents. But I shall endeavor, with all the decorum so exciting a subject permits, to show, if God spares me strength, that the imputations before enumerated, come whence they may, are the worst kind of revilings from a very ancient school of politics in the East, and that they are just as unfounded now as the atrocious slanders were which have been uttered by heated partisans against this same democracy in every great political struggle for thirty years past. It matters not who utters them—whether some of the authors have always claimed to support republicanism, as opposed to federalism, or some have never so claimed; or whether some of them, during the whole administration of the writer of the Declaration of Independence, marched together, shoulder to shoulder, in opposition to that administration, as they now march in opposition to this, or not. But the scoffs themselves have internal evidence of their character, which no professions can rebut: they smell of a lamp, they spring from a school not to be mistaken. Whoever unites in these scoffs cannot complain if judged by the maxim, noscitur a sociis. They are the old lessons of an old school. The stain and brand can no more be torn off, than Hercules could tear off the poisoned robe of Nessus.

Under the lead, then, which all have witnessed, that part of the democracy of the East, friendly to the present administration, have first been kindly reminded that they are a new manufacture; and next, that their democracy chiefly consists in their adherence to Southern men and Southern measures. How novel and how true are these taunts, will be seen in a moment, by "setting history right."

Had gentlemen forgotten that the seeds of division were sown in the East, early as 1791, and that, whoever then rose above sectional views, and pursued an independent and democratic course on public measures, was jeered at by some, in such language as once they applied to Hancock: he "is with the Yorkers and Southern bashaws?" Repeated from the same quarter in 1798, against the intrepid Langdon: that he was "a slave—an apostate to the South," because he was averse to the principles and policy of the then administration, and rose against it and above sectional clamor and Massachusetts dictation, supposing that New Hampshire "was, and of right ought to be," as independent of her, as of Georgia or Kentucky, and that any other course by her delegates here would indeed be apostacy, degrading apostacy from democratic principles, and all those holy and inspiring sentiments of pride and patriotism which ought to govern a free and sovereign State, and any delegates worthy of a free and sovereign State. Echoed again, in 1808, against the last President, when professing democracy, and moulded into every variety of bitterness, and, peradventure, from some of the same lips now repeating the sarcasms against us, that he was seduced by the South, and was a Judas and traitor to New England, because he denounced what he called "narrow" and "sectional" schemes, in the East, tending to disunion and treason. Re-echoed in 1812 against one of your distinguished predecessors in that chair, the revolutionary veteran Gerry; and many others in favor of that war, by stigmatizing them as "whiteslaves of the South," because, in a crisis of great perplexity and peril, they stood by their brethren of the South, the Middle States, and the West, in attempts to vindicate our country's rights, and "pluck up drowning honor by the locks," rather than standing by the mere leaders of a party in the East, who cried out then as now, that the whole of New England was put to the ban of the empire.

Few can be ignorant how often, within the last four years, the same kind of taunt has been reiterated against all those who, in the late Presidential canvass at the East, supported the present Executive. Coming this very morning, and now in my hand, in a paper now under the banner of National Republicanism, but during that war, under the five striped flag, is the very repetition, for the ten thousandth time, of one of these same groundless scoffs.

"If New Hampshire chooses to send Representatives who can thus desert the best interests of their constituents, and become the white slaves of the South, she must blame herself."

The ear-mark of this attack on a part of my constituents is, therefore, too large and long not to show at once its true origin and character, and to prove anew how much easier it is to alter names than things. The inconsistency of these sneers from such quarters will also be apparent, when we set our history right, by finding that these same authors of them have also voted for Southern candidates nearly, if not quite, as often as the democrats, and always when their party success could be promoted by it; because, omitting 1789 and 1793, when all united for a Southern man, they appear to have voted for one as President in 1804, 1808, 1816, and 1820.

The smallness of the number, and the diminutive importance of the supporters of this administration in the East, is another magnanimous taunt from the same source, against the genuineness of their democracy; as if, when history is set right, the present Executive did not obtain more votes in New England than did Mr. Jefferson in 1800, and, with the exception of one State, more than Mr. Madison did in 1812. We are accustomed in the East, sir, to new trials for correcting mistakes. New Hampshire, as a State, since the late election, has already changed her delegation in the other House, so as to be entire in favor of this administration. And has not Maine herself, beside an electoral vote for it, sent an equal number there in its support? On this, I think her democrats have some little claim to respect, in point of numbers, however charged with apostasy; and I may be pardoned in the guess that, from the signs of the times there, they will at least try to show a majority in favor of this administration sooner than the present delegation from Maine here shall succeed in obtaining all the Maine and Massachusetts claims for the misconduct of their peace party in the late war.

The resemblance between the political character of the opposition and administration parties, in 1798, 1812, and 1828, would seem to give us some little title to old fashioned democracy. The same democratic States, with one or two exceptions only, are found, at each era, side by side, in favor of Jefferson, Madison, and the hero of Orleans. On one side, Virginia and Pennsylvania, Carolina and Georgia, Tennessee and Kentucky. On the other, Delaware and Massachusetts, Connecticut, and divided Maryland. The same distinguished statesmen of the first era, who survive and who were honored with every species of abuse, from the most malignant of their enemies—those republican statesmen, of 1798, the Livingstons, the Maccons, the Smiths, the Randolphs, and the Gileses, are again found acting and stigmatized with the humble democrats of the East, who support the present administration. Yes, sir, when that gentleman, [Mr. LIVINGSTON] little more than a year since, not in old "by-gone days" of virulence, was defeated in an election to the other House, one of the first papers at the "head quarters of good principles" that hoisted the new banner of National Republicanism, exulted that he "was consigned to the tomb of all the Capulets," and farther added, "when we recollect that Mr. L. is an old sinner, and that we are inflicting punishment for the backslidings of thirty years, we may safely say he falls unwept—unhonored."

Little did they then expect his Antæan vigor, in rising from that fall, would so soon restore him to the councils of his country, as the representative of a sovereign State, rather than of a single district. And little did they heed, as in "by-gone days," the base injustice they are perpetrating on one, of whom it is no flattery to say, he is a civilian, no less than a politician—an ornament both to that State, and his country, if not to our race. Accessions have, of course, been made from other ranks to swell the increased majority of 1828 over those of 1800 and 1812; but they have been, I trust, accessions of principle, and not of bargain; and, if such accessions, then they will endure, flourish, and bear good fruit, long as the original stock upon which they have been engrafted. But if they have not been from principle, who regrets how soon they may be severed from the stock?

Whether the same doctrines, in the main, are also not now advocated by us and by the opposition, as were advocated by the administration of 1801, and by its opposition, is of too common notoriety, and has been too fully shown in the progress of this debate, to need much further illustration. On the part of the administration, abused as it has been, or at least on the part of its supporters in the East, whose claims to democracy have been so modestly challenged, I venture with frankness to assert, that there is, in general, the same adherence to a strict construction of the constitution, and to the reserved rights and sovereignties of the States, as under Jefferson; the same acquiescence in instructions by State Legislatures; the same desire for reform and economy; the same abhorrence of implied and doubtful powers, whether over the press, the deliberations of this body, or the industry and free trade of the country. On the contrary, on the part of the opposition, there are, and have been, the same scoffs at reform and economy; the same denial of the right of instruction in the States to their Senators; the same struggle for enlarged constructions of the constitution; a refusal "to be palsied by the will of their constituents;" implied powers carried to the greatest extent, in assuming to accept, in the recess, invitations to Panama, and in claiming the right, in that recess, without the consent of the Senate, to appoint ministers on such an expensive and hazardous mission; and, finally, certain movements of a "specific" character, bearing on the press, not quite in coincidence with a bill introduced here the same day, by my friend from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKINSON] to refund a fine collected under the sedition law of 1798.

This attitude of a party now in a majority, disclaiming implied and enlarged powers in the Legislative as well as the Executive branches, is a most cheering sign of the times for the safety of our liberties; and is an attitude worthy imitation in all Governments, especially by all republican magistrates, in all future time. I say nothing against the past administration as men, for some of them possess my entire respect; but I am speaking of some of the political measures they, or their friends, have proposed and approved. If any part of the democracy of the East, friendly to this administration, were once in favor of the late Chief Magistrate, and sincerely intended to support his administration, for having, as they supposed, become united with that democracy, and inclined to enforce its principles, and many of them honestly did so intend and believe; if any of them, in "by-gone years," vindicated him against attacks from the same political school whence we ourselves are now assailed, and, like the present President, in the letters here cited against him to Mr. Monroe, did think well of the talents and patriotism of that Chief Magistrate, the world will see, when the history of the East is set right, where, and on what side, has been any change of principle.

They will see whether the treachery and apostasy, so often insinuated here, and elsewhere, and formerly applied by the same political school, in the same way, to that very Chief Magistrate, do not now, if applicable at all, if courteous and just to any body, more properly apply to the course of that magistrate and of his administration, than to those democrats in the East, who continued faithfully to cling to the platform of democratic principles? What verdict, on this point, have all the democratic States in the Union, standing together in 1798, 1812, and 1828, almost unanimously returned? Is it not that the past administration, in many respects, departed from the principles of democracy? And what verdict has New Hampshire herself, within the last year, returned? That those who were seither by democratic votes, and to defend democratic principles, and who abided by those principles to the hazard of both popularity and office—that they were faithful among the faithless, and their course to be approved? or that the desertion, if it existed at all, was on the side of that part of her delegation in the other House, who, for adhering to all men and measures indiscriminately of that administration, have been permitted to retire to private life?

One only of that delegation, a man whose stern democracy never quailed, or bent to any fellow-man, has, for that, been borne back here triumphantly by the suffrages of the people, proving again, what is, and always should be, a proud excellence in a free Government; that however the waves of faction or sectional prejudice may, for a time, dash against a consistent and faithful Representative—

"An honest man is still an unmoved rock;
"Washed white r, but not shaken by the shock."

Gentlemen know but little of that democracy, if they suppose their object is to go themselves, or have their Representatives go, for mere men rather than measures: that they are slaves enough, or ever have been, or ever will be, to bend the servile knee to any "lord or master" but the Supreme Lord of all; or to acknowledge any such in office, as intimated, except their constituents and their State. You do them foul injustice and reproach, if you believe that democracy has not the justice and patriotism to uphold those who uphold their country; and if ever misled, for a time, by local prejudice or personal regard, that they will ever long go for men, unless those men go for their cause; ever long go for any slavish and monarchical doctrine of unlimited devotion to particular individuals, or particular dynasties. These principles, I am proud and thankful for the opportunity to say, in behalf of my faithful constituents—whose attachment, when I forget, may my God forget me—these principles belong to that part of the New Hampshire democracy which supports this calumniated administration. But whether they are the principles of that kind of national republicanism in Maine and Massachusetts, which opposes this administration, the world has enjoyed an opportunity of judging in the course of this debate.

The country will thus be able to set right the history of the East, in the late Presidential canvass; and I repeat, that it is only in self defence, and in vindication of a large portion of my constituents and myself, thus attacked on this floor, for their want of real democracy, in supporting the present administration, that I could have overcome my repugnance in this assembly to make any allusions to those fierce party struggles that so often have raged between the modern Spartans and Athenians of the rocky East.

My mind is recalled to one other direction given in this debate, to the history, merits, and glories of the East, entirely at war with the real worth of that democracy.

Yielding, as I cheerfully do, and always shall, due praise to political opponents, yet, I can never consent that all the excellencies and applause bestowed on the East, by gentlemen from that or other regions, shall at once be assumed and appropriated, as if exclusively belonging to the opponents of that vilified democracy—to the peace party in war. Thus we see, that when nobody has been attacked from any other quarter, except those opponents, every change of eulogy has been rung in reply, as if the eulogy was all deserved, all won, and all to be monopolized by only those who were attacked—by only those opponents. Little did my friend from South Carolina [Mr. HAYNE] think his prophecy would so soon be apparently verified, when he spoke of what might be done by some future biographer of one of the members of the Hartford Convention. "I doubt not," said he, "it will be found quite easy to prove that the peace party in Massachusetts were the only defenders of their country during the war, and actually achieved our victories, by land and sea." Have gentlemen not been pursuing here a constant course of argument, tending, in fact, whatever may have been the intent, to something very like a confirmation of this prediction?

Thus, when members of the Hartford Convention are assailed, there is in reply a flourish of trumpet after trumpet, in defence of those who stood by the country, and who, in fact, resisted that convention, and denounced, as loudly as has been denounced here, its leaders and its doctrines: thus creating an impression that that convention stood by their country, or that those who resisted that convention had been assailed. Is this course of reply one of the means referred to by Washington, for converting any party charge, or excitement, into a sectional shape? Thus, again, if schemes for disunion and for a Northern confederacy are charged home upon the leaders of a party in the East, before the Hartford Convention, and before the embargo, on the authority of assertions by the late President, cited by the gentlemen on my right and left, then we have, in reply, eulogies on Eastern bravery and fidelity, as if belonging exclusively to those implicated in the above schemes. Some doubts, to be sure, on the constitutionality of purchasing Louisiana, and some charges of corruption in purchasing it, are re-intimated, perhaps from the same quarter that repeated those charges twenty years since, and which have been so fully proved to be groundless, from the recent account of that purchase by the Abbe Marbois: and in conclusion, we have again the sectional attempt to make the whole East believe, when the peace party in the East was alone assailed, that the whole East has now, in this hall, been put to the ban of the empire.

As a farther specimen, the Senate, in answer to charges against the patriotism of the peace party in the late war, have again and again been invited to look at the glories of Bunker Hill, and Bennington, and Saratoga, and Monmouth—as if these glories had been denied or attacked; and provided they had, as if the democracy of the East, which supported the late war, and those of them which support the present administration, had no part or lot in those sanguinary conflicts. As if the gallant Pierce, who now presides in my native State, and the brave Stark of the same neighborhood, who fought by the side of his immortal father, so singularly eulogized in this very debate, as if the intrepid Hall, who trod in blood on the deck of the Ranger, as lieutenant to Paul Jones, all were not now living monuments in New Hampshire of the part which some of the distinguished survivors of the Revolution take among the democracy of the East, in rallying round the present Executive of the Union. If you turn there to the whole muster roll of the survivors in that contest, you will find the proportion of them as large, entertaining the same political views with their heroic officers. The peace party in the Revolution, for there was also a peace party in that war, might with just as much propriety claim all the honor of the victories of the Revolution. Just as well, as the peace party of the last war, might they seek to engross all the credit of those victories from that part of the democracy of the East, who survived to mingle in the political contest in favor of either Mr. Jefferson's, Mr. Madison's, or the present administration. So, again, from the same quarter, in answer to censures bestowed only on the peace party in the East, we are invited to gaze on the brilliant achievements of the bloody ninth, the twenty-first, and eleventh regiments, in 1814; and in exultation against those attacking only what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HOLMES] then pronounced "treasonable" opposition to that war, we are informed of the prowess, chivalry, and descent from New England loins, of those who, in fact, put all in jeopardy to support that war.

Did it never occur to gentlemen that history would be set right, and that those regiments, and their brave officers, their Ripleys, their Millers, their McNeils, and their Weekses—all these last natives of the scoffed New Hampshire—would be known to have sprung chiefly from the democracy of the East; and that all of these before named officers, with perhaps a single exception, are decided supporters of this abused administration?

On the contrary, lofty as were the principles and deeds of all the whigs of the Revolution in the East, yet, on all hands, it must be confessed that, during the late war, the patriotism of the leaders of a party there took a most unfortunate direction. While those taunted heroes of those brave regiments, taunted then, as most of them now are, with being slaves to the South, and apostates from New England principles; while they, I say, were flying to the then derided flag of our Union, and were pouring out their blood at Bridgewater and Chippewa, in defence of their country's rights, the leaders of the "peace party in war" were seen flying to far different scenes at Hartford, and pouring out from their pulpits, presses, and legislative assemblies, anathemas against the administration, the war, and all their supporters. Sorry am I to say it, sir, except to "put history right" in our defence, that not the mere maniacs of the party, as intimated by the gentleman on my left, [Mr. SPRAGUE] were engaged in this unfortunate display of this new species of patriotism, but with the leaders, in their pulpit services and opinions, were found some, at least, of their confiding congregations. With the delegates of the three sovereign States, and parts of two others, at Hartford, were found, in principle, some constituents to elect them. With eloquent Representatives and Senators here, were found to support them at home, at least a party, a whole party, and nothing but a party. On this occasion, what I say is not to be misunderstood, however much it may be misrepresented. When, in self defence, I allude to a certain party and its acts in the East, about the period of that war, far be it from me to include all of them, or of those in other quarters of the Union who had borne the same party name.

It is well known, in the history of this country, that, having lived under a limited monarchy till the Revolution, not only then, but in the formation of our State and General constitutions, some honest diversity of opinion existed, as to the extent and limits of power safely to be entrusted in the hands of the people's agents. Without dwelling on the titles which should be given to the one side, for asking large power and much confidence in office holders; and to the other, for granting only small power and limited confidence; it is sufficient to notice that this division, coupled with other matter, from time to time, connected and incidental, separated the whole country into opposing parties—parties, too, which not then being chiefly sectional, were useful rather than injurious, in rousing vigilance, and in preserving unimpaired the reserved powers of the people and the States. But, as some more exciting and more local topics of difference occurred—an Eastern Chief Magistrate being removed from office, under complaints and remonstrances, as doleful and violent as any heard here on account of more recent removals, and his place being supplied by a Southern successor, and a vast addition being soon made, under that successor, to our Southern territory, and expected also to be made thereby to any peculiar Southern influence, which might prevail in the administration of our Government—these general parties, so far as respected one of them, gradually assumed almost an entire sectional character; and, contrary to the injunctions of Washington, so often urged on our consideration in this debate, its leaders began to drag into the controversy every sectional interest and prejudice that nestle closest round the heart of erring man.

The attempts, which two of the distinguished members of that party have recently avowed were soon after made for separating the Union, had a poor apology, in any belief that the purchase of Louisiana was unconstitutional, as one of their then number, now on this floor, seems still to hold; and must have been, from the account of those members, of a mere rash and sectional character; and, I have no doubt, met with no approbation among many of the honest disciples of that party, even in the East; or among few, if any of them, south of the Hudson. These last had no motives to cherish such local and pernicious views. The embargo, non-intercourse, and war, which soon and successively followed, pressed with extreme severity upon the Eastern States, and gave the leaders of the party, having thus become separated by sectional views from their brethren elsewhere, an opportunity to appeal still more strongly to sectional prejudices, and to renew, or begin for the first time, as the truth may be, a course of opposition to the General Government, violent in language, disorganizing in its measures, and, whether aiming or not at a Northern confederacy, certainly ending in the Hartford Convention—a course of opposition which, to say the least, was any thing but practising the lessons of Washington—any thing but real national republicanism—any thing but respect for the constituted authorities—any thing but eulogy on the great minds and patriotic hearts, then sent to cheer and to bless us in the prosecution of that glorious war—any thing but devotion to our country, our whole country, and nothing but our country. Whoever took the lead then, in that course of opposition, in Congress or out; whoever is attacked by the South or the West, for taking such lead, I, for one, protest, that the whole East, as a section, is not to be involved in the defence; and that its democracy, so far as represented by me, has neither been implicated in the attack, nor seen any occasion for angry retort. The whole controversy, so far as regards my friend to the right, [Mr. HAYNE] has been shown, by a reference to his remarks, to have arisen from strictures by him solely on the peace party in the late war, and the violent movements of its leaders in that course of opposition. Leaders and movements then officially, and as strongly as here now, denounced by a large minority in the East itself, as having been exclusively British, and by which leaders and movements the late Executive has publicly repeated that a separation of the Union was openly stipulated. Thus it will be seen how different a character this course of opposition, both before and during the war, had given to that party in the East in respect to its attachment to the Union, and its patriotism at large, from what justly belonged to the same nominal party elsewhere. It is by setting history right, in this way, that proper discriminations can be made between nominal federalists, in and out of the East, and even between those in the East itself, who led, and those who were misled or betrayed, by sectional violence.

If gentlemen please, I for one have so little party bitterness, on merely old party grounds, as to be willing to go, in meeting their invitations, to forgetfulness of bygone acrimony, and party feuds, more than half way, and to take the epoch of the late war as a period of amnesty, beyond which, like the era of Richard I. for other purposes the memory of man runneth not, about parties, except as connected with historical facts and constitutional principles, bearing on the present administration of the State and the General Governments. But I never can go for any abandonment or compromise of these principles.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

Still another concession will I make, in justice to the yeomanry of the East, many of whom, in the late war, were deluded into opposition, by what Mr. Jefferson called "the Marats, the Bantons, and Robespierres, of Massachusetts." (4 Jefferson's Notes, 210.)

The same sectional attempts were, by that class of leaders, then brought to bear on their honest hearts and warm heads, which were made to bear on them in the late canvass, and are now continued, with a view to prejudice them against the South, and to seduce them into a belief that the whole of New England is proscribed, and that the real interest of the two regions is hostile, rather than united, as closely as the interests and inclinations of married life. Is it strange, then, that the large mass, even of the peace party, should thus have been misled for a time, by those leaders, clerical or political, in whom they had been accustomed to place implicit confidence? and that they should fallaciously appear, as if with deliberation, giving sanction to those violent party acts, instigated by the mere leaders, such as official refusals, when our hearths and altars were invaded, to place the militia under the officers of the Union, for defence; such as legislative exhortations against loans and enlistments; public votes and speeches in Congress, against raising additional troops for protection; motions here, at one time, to impeach Mr. Jefferson, and threats at another, that Mr. Madison deserved a halter. Yet, with a similar lead to what then led, we are told, again and again, in defence of attacks on this violent course of opposition, about New England patriotism and New England respect for order and regular government, as if these virtues belonged to those alone who required a defence: and as if that class of politicians possessed all, effected all, and were all in all. As if, for a moment's illustration, the soldiers' bones that moulder on our Niagara frontier were those of patriotic volunteers from the Massachusetts remonstrants, whom the gentleman on my right then fearlessly charged with taking the enemy's ground, supporting his claims, and justifying his aggressions; as if the saving loans in aid of that glorious struggle came from those who pronounced the struggle unjust and murderous; and as if our sailors, who "pulled down the flag of the Guerriere and Peacock," were of those who deemed it immoral and irreligious to rejoice at our naval victories. Not such as the last—not such aid, nor such defenders, did that crisis need.

Tempus eget.*

Far be it from me to utter or feel a single sentiment of unkindness to one individual who did not participate in those measures of opposition, and much less to any one who did participate, from honest convictions they were right, and who still has the frankness and magnanimity to avow it; and to award full justice to the abused democracy of the East. Such thought and acted for themselves like freemen, and disdain to shrink from their responsibility for it. But that those of the democracy of the East, friendly to the present administration, and who bore a full share in all the perils, sufferings, and glories of that war, should now be sneered at, as witnessed here, is what none who sincerely sympathized with them in that conflict, and have partaken with them in fidelity to principle since, could be guilty of without blushing blood; or could in others listen to without indignation and abhorrence. It is, then, I trust, distinctly understood, that I have cast no strictures on federalists, even in the East, except those who, after war was declared, still opposed their own Government and its measures; and, according to Governor Eustis, thus occasioned double sacrifice of life and treasure, while the citizens of other States were exercising their utmost energies against the common enemy. Even many of those I would censure only as misguided and unfortunate politicians; men who, from sectional clamor, were made to believe that the whole East was put to the ban of the empire; who trusted too far to the groundless assertions, by those who have been here called [by Mr. SERRAQUE] the bedlamites of the party. Thus it happened, undoubtedly, that so many grave legislators, holy priests at the altar, and other seigniors of the land, both in public and in private life, were deluded to join in that violent opposition. This alone can account, also, for the Hartford Convention, as a solemn, deliberate, and official act, by the Legislatures of three sovereign States, and by primary meetings in the federal portions of two others, at a moment when the foreign enemy had his foot planted on our sacred soil; and when, with a different commander in the Eastern department, some of its members might, we are told, have had a different trial than what has yet been held on them. For withholding the militia from the General Government, as another official act in which the Judiciary and Executive ceremoniously united, and which has since been justly denounced by one of their own Executives, as withholding from the Government the constitutional means of defence. For the exhortation against enlistments, against joining the stars and stripes of their country, over which we have had such eloquent eulogies, as another of those cold blooded official acts instigated by Hotspur leaders. The Massachusetts Legislature, in June, 1812, say, "If your sons must be torn from you by conscription, consign them to the care of God; but let there be no volunteers." The loans, on which gentlemen dwell with so much complacency, as evidence of Eastern patriotism, were also as violently denounced by the leaders, and came mostly from that abused democracy, one of whom, a principal leader, my near and dear relative, still survives in that Cumberland district, so justly denominated the star in the East, to see flung upon him, as a supporter of this administration, the sarcasm of being a new made democrat, from near the doors of the Hartford Convention. The patriotism of such supporters of this administration among the democracy of the East, and I thank God there are many of them, took rather a different direction from the unfortunate one pursued by the violent opposers of that war. Their patriotism was not as early as 1806, to ridicule Mr. Jefferson for his pacific war by proclamations, though losing thousands by French and British decrees; was not to denounce and violently resist an embargo as unconstitutional, and charge the President with French influence and falsehood in recommending it, though their remaining vessels were rotting at their wharves; was not to vote, speak, and write, in constant hostility to the war and the measures for its success, though their funds and their industry were forced out of customary employment. But it was, if not "above all Greek, above all Roman fame;" it was the patriotism of the noblest days, of the noblest of our race. Though scoffed as slaves to the South, by persons now professing to deprecate sectional jealousies, it was to devote all to their country; to enter the alarm list themselves for the defence of the sea-board; to advocate enlistments; to lend their remaining and impaired fortunes to the cause, and, in fine, for the salvation of all those great principles of civil liberty their fathers had bled to secure; intrepidly to meet the domestic enemy at the polls, and send their sons on the ocean, the lakes, and the land, to meet the foreign enemy at the cannon's mouth. From the history of all republics, they knew that God had preserved liberty only to vigilance and valor,

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[FEB. 24, 1830.]

They, therefore, braved the lion in his den; they rose as their country rose, and fell only as her prospects fell. The victories of the common enemy were a true barometer, in every year, of the victories and hopes of the conflicting parties at home. I was then of an age, sir, to feel such things somewhat deeply, and hence, I may speak of them too strongly. But this much can with safety be asserted, that the political war at home was but little less arduous and exciting than the foreign one abroad. That democracy, though a minority then as now, in every State in the East save one, though abused then as now, and buffeted both in private and public life by their opposers, had, and still have, thank God, some knowledge of their rights, and, "knowing, dare maintain them." In the darkest hours of that war, when civil butchery was in some places threatened, when schemes for disunion were supposed to be maturing, and, according to my friend here, [Mr. GARDNER] "moral treason" stalked abroad; when the ardent yeoman sometimes slept with his fire arms at his pillow; when his sons were absent as volunteers at Chippewa and Plattsburg—on the lakes and the ocean—then the members of that democracy, who were at home, fought and endured the moral and political warfare, hardly paralleled: the proscription and persecution of private life; the shameless attacks of the press; the insults of heated partisans; the anathemas of the pulpit; and, minority as they were, they fearlessly faced the apologist of the common enemy, and the libeller of their own Government, whether in the courts of justice, the halls of legislation, or in those primary meetings of the thousand town democracies which cover our granite hills.

Grant that individuals of the party opposed to Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison did not unite in what the former calls in Massachusetts "the parrieide crimes and treasons of the late war," but went gallantly for their country when in peril. They have earned for themselves laurels which they richly deserve to wear, and which, God forbid I should attempt to soil. They relinquished opposition when the common enemy approached, and stood by their country and their whole country, and did not lend a helping hand to those sectional excitements that often belittle and dishonor the politics of New England. By such excitements, groundlessly defaming the democracy of the East and of other parts of the Union, has the glory departed from her Israel, more than by any change of relative population and territory. But if the violent leaders of the Eastern opposition to the war, then, as since, constantly poured out on the democracy of that section the uncourteous epithets of Jacobins and Judases, and styled them, as the whole administration has been styled in this debate, a motley collection of the fragments of all parties, with no common bond of principle, and held together by a mere rope of sand; if these abusers then, as now, made very modest claims to all the talents, order, and religion; I stand not here to retort in kind, but courteously to seek justice for myself and my political friends, from unfounded imputations; and to say, with sober mindedness and charity, that, leaving our opponents to the enjoyment of all their real worth, which, in many respects, I freely admit to be enviable, yet I do contend, that, in private or public life, there is no ground for discrimination in their favor against that much vilified democracy—in all the hardy and heroic virtues which have distinguished New England, if not more highly, yet in common with the middle States and the South, since the Puritan and merchant adventurers first landed at Plymouth Rock and Strawberry Bank—virtues deeply founded as her hills, and pure as her mountain streams. No ground for discrimination against that democracy, in either correct morals, tireless industry, or unsleeping enterprise—no ground of discrimination in doing their full share to build up the fisheries, extend commerce, and scatter plenty over a sterile soil; to erect and preserve all the Doric if not Corinthian columns of our whole social edifice in the East, and in doing more than their full share, because their political principles did not forbid them to take a full share with their brethren of the Middle States, the South, and the West, in bearing the flag of victory, whether over land or ocean, in the Revolution or the late war. They have always met the struggle with firmness, and, in common with other parts of the Union, with entire devotion, in times of peril, to the common cause, of their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor. They never halted between two opinions when the wolf was on the walk—when the enemy was on our soil. They had, and still have, quite too much of the Roman, not to endure embargoes and wars, and even death, for their country, whether on their own seaboard, or on a distant and savage frontier, when that country and its honor call for the sacrifice. This they have shown by deeds, not words; and this, I will give my pledge, they will always show, when occasion demands. But, once for all, I will repeat, that that democracy make, and have made, no pledges to men, independent of their measures, and that, so far as represented by me, they will offer or seek no new alliances, and consent to none. They have made no old alliances and consented to none, whether with the West or the South, except the general alliance of all in the bond of the Union. They will neither cajole, nor flatter, nor bargain. Those of New Hampshire would fain stand among the other States as a peer among peers, a sovereign among sovereigns, an equal among equals; recognizing the rights of no mere man from the East to tender or pledge them, either to make or unmake Presidents—to pull down or build up administrations. They mean to go where democratic principles go—palam ferat qui meruit; and when those principles disappear, they mean to halt. Such were the views that led their young men, in the late war, to succor the bleeding West; and in their cause, as well as that of their country at large, to moisten with their blood the fields of Tippecanoe, and the forests of Brownstown, while from the ranks of a different party in that war, however prodigal in professions of friendship now to the West, not a drum was heard—not a gun was fired. These views in peace, likewise, have led them to aid, to populate, and protect from the savage, the smiling valleys of the Ohio and Mississippi. And their brethren in principle, whether there, or at home in the East, will cheerfully unite in every measure they believe constitutional, for the relief or improvement of those who have suffered with them in the common cause.

Can it be doubted that the same feelings would not lead them to assist, in the same way, either the Middle States, or the South, in the embarrassments of their industry and trade, or in their utmost need, by invasion or war?

On the exciting topic of slavery, as connected with the South, and introduced into this debate, it is true they have honest and deep rooted opinions. But this Congress knows, and the Union knows, that, aversive as the democracy of the East is to slavery, and aiding as they have, within only about the last half century, to abolish it all over New England, and anxious as they are for its extirpation from the whole country, yet, never have they joined, and never will join, in the sectional tirade against the South as "black States." They are convinced that there, as in the East half a century ago, slavery must be left to be regulated by the domestic opinions of each sovereign State itself, founded on its own better knowledge of its own climate, productions, industry, and social policy; and that any great change in the civil institutions of a State must, to be wise, useful, and permanent, be cautiously considered and gradually commenced.

They cherish, too, I am satisfied, the same kindly feeling towards the South, on the subject of the tariff, that they do, and have done to the West, on subjects deeply affecting the interests and the prosperity of that West.

FEB. 24, 1830.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

Instead of laughing at the calamities of the South, and mocking their complaints, God knows we have of late sufficient reasons at the East to make us feel, in common suffering, common sympathies; and to cast about, if possible, for the consideration of any measures likely to bring relief and harmony. The very Executive who signed the last tariff bill officially declared it, "in its details, not acceptable to the great interests of any portion of the Union, not even to the interests which it was specially intended to subserve." [See President's message, December, 1828.]

Among the merchants and manufacturers, the wide and desolating failures at the East, since that declaration, have more than verified the evils naturally to be anticipated from a bill of that character. The present Executive also, has declared, that "some of its provisions require modification." [See President's message, 1829.]

The gentleman before me [Mr. SILSBEE] can testify, that nothing like a parallel to those failures has occurred in the East for a quarter of a century. How much of this deep distress there has been caused by our present unequal tariff, I, and my constituents, I am satisfied, wish to inquire, not from hostility to the protecting principle, as an incident to raising revenue, or as countervailing legislation against oppressive foreign measures, or in some cases as a means of preparation in peace for the wants of war—on that point most of us harmonize—but to see whether any just and equal legislation requires, in profound peace, and with a prosperous revenue, that the people of New Hampshire alone should pay more than their State tax yearly, as a duty on salt—on a single article of the first necessity of life; should pay over one hundred per cent. tax on molasses and other great necessities; and should be taxed most expensively for every nail driven in a farmer's door, every bolt in a vessel, every yard of canvass spread on the ocean, and every pound of sugar, coffee, or tea, that brings comfort to the domestic fireside. I wish to inquire whether this is to be persisted in, after the impost will not be needed for either revenue or protection, but merely to enable this or any other administration to dole out sopas or bribes to win States that hold the balance of political power, or who give signs of insubordination to the powers that be. They do not wish to attempt any thing but equal justice between the three great branches of industry, but agree with the Executive of New Hampshire, in 1822, that,

"No policy can be more obviously unsound than that of creating manufactures, unconnected with national defence, or important to national interest, at the public expense, to be permanently supported by the same means. However disguised such procedure might be, it would be, in its effects, the imposition of a perpetual tax upon the productive branches of national industry, to be applied to the support of an unproductive one." [19 Niles' Register, page 262.]

They never can agree that the eight-tenths of our population as farmers are not entitled to full consideration in tariff legislation; and that our old fashioned fisheries and navigation are to be sent to sea adrift, without their due proportion of favor and protection. We have lords of the soil as well as lords of the spindle, and I for one, though friendly to a moderate and equal tariff, on the principles before named, can never consent that the self-styled American System shall be confined in its bounties to spinning jennies alone, and exclude as worthless and undeserving our agriculture and our commerce. Much less can I consent that the American System shall be converted into a hobby-horse, on which any aspirant whatever may ride into political power. "Ill vaulting ambition doth o'erleap itself." And the notions of a distinguished member of the other House, in 1824, on American industry, have ever met with my entire approbation. [Mr. WEBSTER.]

"Gentlemen tell us they are in favor of domestic industry; so am I. They would give it protection; so would I. But then all domestic industry is not confined to manufactures. The employments of agriculture, commerce, and navigation, are all branches of the same domestic industry; they all furnish employment for American capital and American labor. And when the question is, whether new duties shall be laid, for the purpose of giving further encouragement to particular manufactures, every reasonable man must ask himself, both whether the proposed new encouragement be necessary, and whether it can be given without injustice to other branches of industry."—[26 Niles' Register, 412.]

Entertaining such notions on these topics, I must be pardoned if, as one of the majority, I decline to accept the invitation of the gentleman on my right, from Missouri, [Mr. BARTON] to stand on his new political platform, whether of nine or thirty-nine articles, of opposition to the present administration. Without claiming for this administration infallibility, I still believe its general course of policy democratic and constitutional; and my friend from Louisiana can inform him or the gentleman from Maine of as severe Jeremiahs for the loss of office in 1800, as now: can inform him that, on the principle of rotation in office for even political motives, this policy only follows up the doctrines of the great revolution of 1800; and that, since, it has in practice had the sanction of the people and the States in every quarter of the Union. Even in Maine, "without respect to sex, age, or condition," to use its Senator's language, when parties are strongly divided, the same policy has been pushed through, to the removal of doorkeepers.

It is the true republican doctrine. A rotation first made by the people themselves, in the highest office in the land the Chief Executive of the Union; and made for political cause, for probata as well as allegata, according to the verdict returned. Does not the same cause affect most of the active deputies and subordinates as well as the principal? Whatever disappointment and suffering by removal some individuals may sustain—deserving and receiving in many respects my private sympathy—yet they know the legal tenure of their offices, and, if violent partisans, should disdain to hold them under men and an administration they have wantonly calumniated. Hence, the agents of the people cannot fear the cry of cruelty, persecution, or Neroism, when following calmly the example set by the people themselves; when, at the worst, if the power of removal be discreetly exercised, doing no injury to the public, but to change one good man for another good one; and when teaching to many the salutary lesson in a republic, that office holders have no property in their offices, and that liability to removal tends to increase industry and fidelity. Nor need those agents dread the discussion of the constitutionality of the exercise of a power of removal, which was legislatively recognized by the very first Congress under the constitution; was then advocated by the framers of that constitution; and has been practised on, at pleasure, by every Executive, from Washington down to the present Chief Magistrate.

The extent of the exercise has been left to the discretion and policy of that branch of the Government whose duty it is "to see the laws faithfully executed;" and if it was less under one and more under another administration, it has always been influenced by the state of that administration, whether coming in as opposed or hostile to their predecessors, and whether in a minority or a majority, so as to be able to accomplish their wishes. The other doctrine is the doctrine of minorities, and, if correct, the tenure of all office might as well be changed to life, and our Government become, in name, as in practice, a monarchy. Then, in earnest, well might we accept the proposition of the gentleman, to go over to the minority for greater tranquillity, and, as in other monarchies and despotisms, see how admirably minorities can govern. One accidental instance of such a government, by way of illustration, may possibly have been given to us this session, in respect to the printing of the public documents; and, I must confess, it has not diminished my aversion to such kind of governments, and especially to their practical doctrines on public economy. If the gentleman from Missouri, on my right, [Mr. BARRON] seeks by such measures to pull down this administration, he may not find it so "downhill a business" as he represented the pulling down administrations in this country usually to be. Perhaps it would be well, before further taunts of this kind are repeated, to set history right, and to recollect that pulling down administrations in this country has never proved quite so easy and downhill a business as seems to be supposed, when the administrations have been democratic—not a very downhill concern when it was attempted on either Mr. Jefferson's, Mr. Madison's, or Mr. Monroe's administration; but rather easier to be sure—rather more of a downhill concern—in the two four-year administrations in this country, suspected, at least, of no very great devotion to some of the leading principles of democracy.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

But I shall neither vaunt nor prophesy; but only express a doubt that, if the present administration may yet be as easily pulled down, it will not be pulled down by such measures as the printing resolution, nor exactly by such politicians as now lead in the attack on that administration. If beaten ever in that way for a few days, the friends of it probably have Antean vigor enough to rise stronger from the fall. If the administration, relying upon its real friends, and on the true principles of democracy, is still occasionally beaten, whether in fact, or only on paper and in party credulity, the opposition may find it will not long stay beaten. And this "downhill business" may prove an uphill job to the undertakers. At least if this administration is ever, by such leaders, and in this way, rolled to the bottom of the hill, I may, as a Yankee, be allowed to guess, that those leaders, like Sisypheus, will find it must speedily be rolled back again.

I have thus finished [said Mr. W.] what my sense of duty, painfully, in some respects, has urged me to say on this occasion; and if, in the cause of my political friends, I may have flung myself on the spears of my enemies to perish, I shall be content to perish in a cause which my heart loves, and my judgment approves.

[Here the debate closed for this day.]

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1830.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. FOOT.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, addressed the Senate until three o'clock, when he gave way for a motion to adjourn.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1830.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, addressed the Senate in continuation and conclusion of the speech which he commenced yesterday.

He remarked that the debate had assumed a wide range, and encircled almost every political subject that had agitated the Government for the last forty years, and more. Although about to give my own views to the Senate, [said Mr. S.] I do not aspire to ornament, but to illustrate what I may say. This debate has been one of feeling; and especially as it related to the disposition, by the General Government, of the public lands. And if I am to judge from the manner in which it has been treated by gentlemen who have said a great deal concerning it, I should suppose they had examined but superficially its extent and importance to the people of the United States. If your treasure is worth preserving for the use of the Government, why should you sport away your public land more than your public moneys? For the manner in which it is proposed to get rid of it, if not sporting it away, is probably as bad.

I do not intend to limit my remarks to the subject of the public lands, entirely, but, after I shall have done with that, will take a cursory view of several other topics that have excited much interest; which, perhaps, I may not treat precisely as other gentlemen have done, yet, I will endeavor to treat them fairly. I have always found that matters of fact give a fairer view of party subjects than your abstract speeches. A gentleman who speaks abstractedly generally does little more than give you what is best suited to his purpose. But if these topics are discussed for public use, the public are entitled to hear all; otherwise the public are imposed upon; they are misguided by seeing but one side of the question. The public are always prepared to judge rightly, and, if correctly informed, will always do so. On the subject of party politics—a subject from which there is more to fear than from any other that agitates your Government—the truth has not been half told; and when I reach it, I may perhaps differ from other gentlemen in the view that I may take of it.

On the subject of the public lands, their importance, which seems to be overlooked, and the manner in which the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. WOODBURY] and my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] propose to dispose of them, their views are so totally different from my own, as to require my first attention. And believing, as I do, that they have not treated that subject as its importance requires, I will first notice what they have respectively said on that question, and then give my reasons, founded on facts, why I differ from them.

The gentleman from New Hampshire says, in addition to doing justice to the people of the Western States, it is necessary to accelerate the sales of your public lands, as fast as possible, lest you drive your citizens to foreign countries, to seek for lands and comfortable homes. In support of this opinion, that gentleman informs us that the British Government is now selling lands at reduced prices, not only in their colonies in New Holland, but in the Canadas, and are thereby holding out inducements to your citizens to emigrate thither. That other European nations have adopted the same seductive policy. Even Persia holds out inducements to emigrants, by selling her lands at reduced prices. In consequence of your own delays, and this liberal policy of other nations, your citizens, we are told, are actually departing from the United States; by which we are to understand, your States are to be depopulated, and your physical strength transferred to other countries, and to foreign enemies. This would be an injudicious policy, indeed, on the part of our Government, could we assent to the premises. But what possible inducement could an American citizen have to break up his household, sell off every thing, and transport himself to New Holland—a country that not one American in twenty thousand ever heard of—there to speculate upon a quarter section of land, when there are millions of acres lying at his own door, at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre? Or can we imagine that any motive whatever could induce an American to forego all the comforts held out at home, to look for better times in Persia?

What is the fact [Mr. S. inquired] as regards the Canadas? In 1825 I visited that country, and whilst at Quebec, and elsewhere, was informed, from high authority, that their Government imported from Ireland, annually, ten thousand people, and that another ten thousand, at least, came of their own accord, or were brought from that country by their wealthy friends. That most of these people went to Upper Canada, being esteemed the best portion of the British possessions in America, and there received a bounty in lands, farming utensils, and provisions, by the Government, and were there kept under some kind of guard, to prevent them from emigrating. Notwithstanding all those attentions, and all this vigilance on the part of Government, one-half of them, at least, made their escape to the United States. The reasons why they should do so are obvious. Whilst this country, sir, continues to present so many and such strong inducements to the enterprising, as well as the oppressed of other nations, we have none of the perils, which that gentleman has brought to our view, to fear.

My colleague [Mr. HAYNE] had been still more importunate; and would induce a belief that this Government would be overwhelmed, if you do not forthwith dispose of your public lands, and that to the Western States; and reproaches the General Government for selling, instead of giving them to the Western people. Before I offer my own opinion, I will give his, in his own words, as far as he has published what he expressed. He says:

"No gentleman can fail to perceive that this is a question no longer to be evaded: it must be met—fairly and fearlessly met. A question that is pressed upon us in so many ways, that intrudes in such a variety of shapes, involving so deeply the feelings and interests of a large portion of the Union, cannot be put aside, or laid to sleep. We cannot long avoid it—we must meet and overcome it, or it will overcome us. Let us, then, Mr. President, be prepared to encounter it, in a spirit of wisdom and of justice."

He further says:

"I believe that, out of the Western country, there is no subject in the whole range of our legislation, less understood, and in relation to which there exists so many errors, and such unhappy prejudices and misconceptions. There is a marked difference observable between our policy and that of every other nation that has attempted to establish colonies, or create new States. The English, the French, and the Spaniards, have, successively, planted their colonies here, and have all adopted the same policy, which, from the very beginning of the world, had always been found necessary in the settlement of new countries, viz: a free grant of lands, without money and without price. The payment of a penny, or a peppercorn, was the stipulated price."

Here he contrasts the policy of these foreign Governments with the policy of our own Government, it being their policy to give away their lands, and ours to sell them for a fair price. And says of our policy:

"It would seem that the cardinal point of our policy was not to settle the country, and facilitate the formation of new States, but to fill our coffers by coining our lands into gold. Let us now consider for a moment, Mr. President, the effect of these two opposite systems on the condition of a new State. I will take the State of Missouri, by way of example. The inhabitants of this new State, under such a system, it is most obvious, must have commenced their operations under a load of debt, the annual payment of which must necessarily drain their country of the whole profits of their labor, just so long as this system shall last. Sir, the amount of this debt has, in every one of the new States, actually constantly exceeded the ability of the people to pay. What has been the consequence, sir? Almost universal poverty. Sir, under a system by which a drain like this is constantly operating upon the wealth of the whole community, the country may be truly said to be afflicted with a curse."*

My colleague, [said Mr. S.] after passing a high eulogium on the English, French, and Spanish monarchies, for giving away their public lands "without money and without price, for a penny or a peppercorn," and a censure upon our own Government, for its oppression upon the people of the West, for selling, instead of giving them all the lands, has declared, [that after the public debt shall have been paid, if he should not give them away, he would at least sell them to the States in which they lie, for a mere nominal sum, and of that nominal sum he would not put one cent into the public treasury; and that he would now begin with the State of Ohio, as he considered that State ready for such a change in our policy.]*

In discussing subjects of public concern, [said Mr. S.] I will always go with my colleague, whenever good reasons exist to justify me in doing so. But, upon this occasion, my views are essentially different from his. He thinks the people of the Western States are excessively oppressed and borne down by the exactions of the General Government. I entertain a contrary opinion. I think the Government has been more than lenient to the people of the West. He has given his reasons for the opinions he entertains. I beg leave to give mine why I am opposed to his propositions. He says the people of the West are hardly dealt with: the profits of their labor were annually drawn off to fill the coffers of the treasury, and to be expended elsewhere; that the amount of their debts exceeded their ability to pay: that, under a system by which a drain like this is constantly operating upon the wealth of the whole community, the country may truly be said to be afflicted with a curse, &c.

It is not from any unkind feelings towards the people of the West [said Mr. S.] that I am induced to differ from my colleague. On the contrary, I shall always rejoice in their prosperity. An overgrown prosperity, however, was not to be cherished, at the entire expense of the rest of the Union. I will endeavor to ascertain if these complaints, which seem to grate with such severity upon our feelings, were well founded, or imaginary only. The Western States are compared to the colonies of the monarchical Governments of Europe, and their policy had been urged by my colleague as worthy our imitation. The colonies of monarchical Governments, and the new States adopted into this Union, are totally different in their character. A colony founded by a monarch is never with a view to promote human happiness, or the private interest of the subject, but for the aggrandizement of the monarch himself. He does it to augment his power. He gives his domain to his subjects, "without money and without price;" "for a penny or a peppercorn." But he can strip them of every vestige of civil and religious liberty, if he chooses to do so. The lands composing the Western States do not belong to Congress; they belong to the people of the United States; not obtained by conquest, but purchased with their money. Congress is nothing more than their agent to dispose of them upon fair terms, and for a price, and that price to be placed in the public treasury; not for the benefit of any particular portion of the States, but for the benefit of the Union, in which the Western States enjoy a full participation. These lands are not sold to, or forced upon, any portion of your citizens, who had no alternative. They were the common property of the people. They were sold at auction to the highest bidder. Those who chose to buy, and every one had their option, bought with a view of going there to better their condition. They did not buy until the country was conquered and at peace. They were at no expense in conquering the country. It was conquered by the Government, and the lands surveyed, ready for the highest bidder to take possession immediately. Is it right, sir, because a small portion of the people have, as a matter of free choice, bid off a small portion of your public lands, that you should surrender to them four or five hundred millions of acres for a mere nominal sum, for no other reason than because it is said they cannot pay their debts?

Sir, there are other insuperable objections to disposing of your lands in this way: for, suppose you were to sell to the State of Ohio all the public lands that lie within its chartered limits, for a mere nominal sum, could you expect thereby to purify the political morals of the community, or stay the importunities of the people of the West? Will not every other Western State demand the same indulgence? Then, sir, instead of being "lashed round the miserable circle of occasional argument," by a few individual debtors, you will be doubly "lashed" by the whole people of the West. They will at once ask you to remit that nominal sum; and if there be not virtue and firmness enough in Congress to resist the "lashings" and importunities of a few public debtors, how are you to calculate upon such delicate statesmen, as this argument would imply Congress to consist of, to resist the pressure of the whole Western States, united in one common cause, and propelled by the same common interest? If we have not firmness enough to listen to the arguments of two or three gentlemen from the West, without being subdued, against the convictions of our own minds, we ought to say so at once, and tell the people of the West, we know you ought not to have these lands, because they are the common property of us all; but we have no firmness to resist your importunities; therefore, take them, and save Congress from corruption.* Can any thing be more degrading? What can be more humiliating to a public assembly than to be informed it must prepare to get rid of an important public question, "or it will overcome us?" Such a prostration of your independence will put an end to your powers, and fit you solely for ministering to the vices and intrigues of all who may discover your imbecility. Sir, this is the argument with which Congress has more than once been assailed upon this question—the corruption it tended to introduce into Congress. Nothing can lead so directly to corruption as too great an imbecility in Congress to resist its approaches. If corruption cannot be met and resisted here, how is it to be resisted in the States, suppose you sell them the lands, where the State Legislatures can more easily be approached, and where there would be a more immediate access for the whole community? It is by no means my intention to impute corruption to the people of the West, or, in the least degree, to diminish their standing in this Union. I am proud to say I believe there does not exist a finer population in any State, in this or any other country, than the population of the Western States. The reasons were obvious, and which I will not stop here to render. It has been those who have been yielding to their importunities that have given rise to this imputation. I have found no difficulty in resisting those importunities myself; nor do I fear the influence of corruption from that source.

Sir, as I believe all the declamation that we have heard uttered against the General Government, for its unrelenting rigor in its exactions from the Western States, and the oppression and distress which they have fallen under, by the misguided policy of Congress, to be totally unfounded, I will here inquire what had been the policy towards the new States, and if not distinguished by its favors conferred on the Western people? Among the favors gratuitously bestowed, was the setting apart every sixteenth section of the public lands for the use of public schools, which amounts to the thirty-sixth part of all the public lands owned by the Government. They have also five per cent. of all the public moneys arising from the sales of all public lands sold within their respective States, to be paid out of the public treasury of the United States, and to be applied in the States, respectively, to make roads; lands for colleges, lands for every other public institution for which they have asked it; lands in great abundance for making roads and canals—half a million, and a million of acres at a time, have been given. When times grew hard, and they could not pay, without great inconvenience, for these over purchases, Congress enacted laws authorizing every purchaser to relinquish to the Government any portion of the lands he had purchased, and transfer the moneys paid therefor to the payment of such lands as he thought fit to retain. These laws had been re-enacted whenever asked for. All moneys that had been forfeited for not complying with the stipulated conditions of sales of lands, were returned. Sir, Missouri, which my colleague had selected as a State on which the oppression of the General Government had fallen with a heavy hand, had received all those indulgences, privileges, and donations, with the other Western States. They had, moreover, been peculiarly cherished by the General Government. The public laws, under which the trial of title to lands claimed by that State, and also by the United States, were to be decided, had been modelled and remodelled to suit the wishes of her citizens, whenever her Senators have said to Congress that a change of the law was desired by their constituents. An army had been sent there expressly to guard her frontier. A school of army discipline had been established at St. Louis, for no obvious reason but to scatter the public moneys for the benefit of her citizens. A military force is kept up for the express purpose of escorting her Mexican traders through a wide wilderness, and kept up at a great expense to this Government; and at this time it is about to be augmented by adding a corps of United States' cavalry of five hundred, that will cost this Government one hundred thousand dollars per annum. Yet it is urged by the Senator from that State [Mr. BENTON] and my colleague, that she is borne down and stript of her hard earnings, for no other reason than because the General Government will not surrender to her the vast domains, as a prey to inordinate speculation. The other Western States do not complain. They ask indulgences, and receive them; but they, with very few exceptions, believe that such a surrender would be destructive to their morals and harmony. Besides, sir, there were other considerations to be regarded. The United States had purchased those lands at a great expense. The original cost paid to France, Spain, to Georgia, and to the Indian tribes, amounts to more than thirty millions of dollars. There are also a vast number of Indian annuities, arising from Indian purchases, as a part of the price: some of them to terminate at a given period; more than fifty of them, however, are permanent annuities, and must endure as long as the tribes to which they are payable shall endure.* This perpetual yearly drain upon your treasury will be felt, if your public lands are to be sold to the Western States for a mere nominal sum, and not a cent of that sum put into the treasury. There are a vast many other incidental expenses, for removing Indians, for Indian treaties, and Indian agents. This is all to be left for the General Government to pay.

Sir, amidst all the ardor to relieve the Western States from the oppression of the General Government, neither my colleague [Mr. HAYNE] nor the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] had taken any notice of the interest which the United States have in this question. They have not referred to the vast quantity of lands which have been purchased by the General Government, nor to the condition of those lands. It would seem, from the views they have taken of the public lands, that they consider them of very little consequence, further than as a peace offering from the General Government to the Western States. But those who have examined the question more at large, consider the sacrifice too great. It had been requir-

To be called magnanimous, is but a poor compensation for the sacrifice of our dearest rights. This is about the amount of our portion in the benefit of the General Government. We have shared this largely. For it, we gave our control over the tariff and internal improvement.—Note by Mr. S.

ed, in order to ascertain the precise State of the public lands, that is, what quantity of acres had been purchased from the Indians by the Government; what portion of that had been surveyed by your public surveyors; what portion of it had been sold; what portion of the lands surveyed still remained to be sold; and what was the quantity of unsold lands, including what was unsurveyed as well as what was surveyed: also, the amount of moneys for the lands sold; the amount paid, and the amount then due from purchasers: a return of which had been made by the Treasury Department, as found recorded in the Senate documents, 2d session, 19th Congress, vol. 3d, No. 63, where there will be seen the following statement:

"A Statement of the Public Lands, 1st January, 1826."

	ACRES.
The quantity then purchased,	260,000,000
do. surveyed,	138,000,000
do. sold, only	20,000,000
The quantity surveyed and then unsold,	118,000,000
The quantity surveyed and unsurveyed, and unsold,	213,000,000
Amount of sales of public lands, 1st January, 1826,	$ 39,301,794
Amount of moneys paid by purchasers,	31,345,963
Amount due by individuals,	7,955,831
	ACRES.
Quantity of lands unsold,	213,000,000
Deduct for barren lands one-half,	107,000,000
Will remain of good lands yet to sell,	106,000,000
(a.) This, sold at the minimum price, $1 25, will give for revenue,	$ 132,500,000
	ACRES.
There yet remain, upon a moderate calculation, of lands yet in possession of the Indians, the titles to which you are constantly extinguishing. Deduct half for barren lands,	200,000,000
Leaves of good lands for sale,	100,000,000
Which, sold at minimum price, $1 25, will give for revenue, -	$125,000,000
(a.) Add to this the above $132,500,000, -	132,500,000
Will give a revenue of -	$257,500,000

This, [said Mr. S.] is not a supposed case, gotten up for the purpose of argument, that may be true, or may not be true, but is as certain as a mathematical axiom—a conclusion drawn from established premises, and cannot be controverted. And I would ask the Senate if they are prepared to sacrifice two hundred and fifty-seven millions five hundred thousand dollars of revenue, to appease the importunities of two or three members of Congress from the Western States, because this revenue could not be grasped in a moment? Or because it is said, "if we do not overcome the Western importunities, they will overcome us?" Or why, sir, should Missouri, already gorged with the bounties and privileges of this Government, be selected by the gentleman [Mr. HAYNE] as an example by which to illustrate the oppression of the General Government upon the Western States? That Government has "drained" from Missouri but very little of the profits of her labor, as yet, sir.

How stands the account between Missouri and the General Government?

	ACRES.
In Missouri there had been sold, only	980,282
There yet remains to be sold in that State,	34,000,000
Of this, there have been surveyed and ready to sell,	21,000,000

Before one thirty-fifth part of the public lands within her limits are sold, we are asked to withdraw the oppressive hand we are imposing upon Missouri, and forbear to draw from her people the whole profits of their labor.

We have come now [said Mr. S.] to the last view of this land question; one of much magnitude, and one that seems to have entirely escaped the observation of those gentlemen. During the Revolutionary war, in which all the States were engaged, it was suggested by some of them, that the wild lands of the West, although within the chartered limits of some of the States; yet lying beyond the limits of the population, and unappropriated, ought of right to belong to the Union. And whether this was a correct or an incorrect principle, so it was, that, when that immense tract of country lying northwest of the Ohio river was ceded to the United States, by the State of Virginia, a provision was made in the act of cession—

"That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for, or appropriated to, any of the before mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation, or federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."*

The public debt of the United States is now nearly extinguished, and will probably be quite so, without drawing much more from the public land fund, which has produced a long and ardent discussion in the House of Representatives, concerning a division of these lands among the several States of the Union, upon the provision in the act of cession. The proposition by those who are advocates for a division is, that the lands shall be divided among the several States, in proportion to representation. This principle, sir, is erroneous. If a division is to take place, the principle upon which it shall be made is laid down in the act of cession itself, and can admit of no alteration or modification to suit present circumstances. To divide, according to the ratio of representation, would give to the State of New York thirty-four two hundred and thirteen thousandths, but would give to South Carolina only nine two hundred and thirteen thousandths; making a difference in favor of New York, with her present overgrown population, of nearly four times as much as that of South Carolina. But if you take the rule as laid down in the act of cession itself, it will give a very different result in favor of South Carolina. The plain and obvious meaning of the act cannot be mistaken. The words which bear upon this question are—

"Shall be considered a common fund for the use and benefit of such States, &c. according to their usual respective proportion in the general charge and expenditure."

These words are altogether retrospective; and evidently refer to "their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure," incurred during the revolutionary war. To arrive at that conclusion, it is only necessary to ascertain why this cession was made by Virginia to the United States; and at what time it was made, and what purposes it was to accomplish. It was entered into whilst the Union was under the articles of the Confederation. And the purposes it was intended to accomplish were, to indemnify the several States for what they had respectively expended in support of that war. It is as plain as the English language can convey it to our senses, that the "respective proportions of the general charge and expenditure," expressed in that cession, can attach to

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[FEB. 26, 1830.]

no other "charge and expenditure" but the charges and expenditures of that war. They point to that object alone; no other existed. And the "respective proportions of the general charge and expenditure," incurred in effecting the objects of the war, were settled upon as the equitable standard by which "the respective proportions" of each State should be measured.

Now, [said Mr. S.] having laid down the premises so obviously deducible from the act of cession, we shall arrive at that conclusion which I anticipated would give a very different result in favor of South Carolina. To accomplish this, sir, it would be necessary to show what "the respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure" were. This I shall be enabled to do from the "Reports on the Finances." In this report, the balances that appeared, after the war, to be due to the creditor States, are specifically stated. Of the creditor States there were but five: Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Virginia, and South Carolina.

South Carolina is a creditor State to the amount of	$5,386,232
Massachusetts stands next in amount,	5,226,801
New York is a creditor State only to the amount of	1,167,575

I will not pursue the statement any further. My object was to exhibit South Carolina the highest creditor State, and to contrast the claims of that State with the claims of New York, upon the principle laid down in the act of cession. Upon this principle, South Carolina will receive, in the division of these lands, nearly five times as much as the State of New York, if they are to be divided among the States. To divide on the ratio of representation, which appeared to be the principle agreed upon in the House of Representatives, a few days since, the State of New York would obtain nearly four times as much of the public lands as South Carolina would. This, sir, is a matter worth looking into, as regards South Carolina. To divide on the representative basis, will give New York four for one over South Carolina. To divide on the cession basis, will give South Carolina five for one over New York. This will make a difference of nine to one in favor of South Carolina over New York.

I have endeavored [said Mr. S.] to demonstrate that, in dividing among the several States the public lands, or the proceeds that shall arise from the sales thereof, the division must proceed upon the principle laid down in the act of cession, according to their respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure. How far I have succeeded, the Senate will determine. One thing is certain, that it never was intended by the cession to make the division upon the principle of representation: and this for the plainest reason imaginable. At the time this cession was made, the General Government was administered under the articles of confederation; and under that system the representative principle was not known. The representation of each State was the same, and each State had but one vote: so that the division upon the representative principle could not have been thought of. It would have been nugatory, as every State had an equal representation. The negative of the representative principle is also sustained by the eighth article of the confederation. This shows that the operations of the Government were not carried on upon that principle. That principle has grown up under the present constitution of 1787, which, being after the cession, cannot control such rights of the States as existed before that constitution was ratified.

Sir, it appearing to me perfectly evident that the public lands are the property of the people of the several States, and not of the Western States, exclusively, and committed to the Government only to dispose of for their benefit; and if not necessary for revenue, then to be divided upon some given and settled principle, among them all, I have endeavored to prove that the settled standard by which the division shall be made is, "according to the respective proportions of the charge and expenditure" of each State, in the prosecution of the Revolutionary war. And if, at a time when the public funds are sought for with an avidity heretofore unknown, when all are looking to the extinguishment of the public debt, and consider all beyond as public spoil, either to be given as bounties to purchase the patronage of the Western States, or divided out upon some new principle, most favorable to the large States, I have been fortunate enough, in the view I have taken, to show that the principle is already established, it will secure to the State of South Carolina the largest dividend; but a dividend proportioned only to the "charges and expenditures" she bore in that Revolutionary war which gave you the sovereignty over those public lands. Notwithstanding it is a new view, and may essentially interfere with the propositions of other gentlemen, nevertheless, if it be a correct view, it is to be hoped, whensoever the partition shall take place, if a partition must be made, it will be made in pursuance of that principle, not the principle of representation.

I will not propose a system for disposing of your public lands; I will leave that, sir, to some other hand. If, however, the sales were to go on, as heretofore, I think the Government would profit by it. I would permit the surveys to progress. I would not lower the minimum price. There will be time enough to do that after the best lands are disposed of. However, I would do one thing, which heretofore has been rejected by Congress. It is this: I would give a fair commutation, in lands, to every pensioner, both of the revolutionary war, and of the late war, in complete extinguishment of their pensions. If the pension system is to be kept up, the commutation would save the Government many millions of dollars; and would afford a home to the disabled or indigent soldier, and an inheritance to his family. I would go further, sir: I would give to every man who would settle on the public lands, and reside there one year, a half section, a quarter section, or a half quarter section, at the minimum price. I would not give this, or any other quantity, to any man, unless he should make certain improvements thereon, and cultivate a certain reasonable portion of the lands for one year. This would be filling the Western States with that description of population which constitutes the strength of a Government. Such a system as this, will enable the poor and the enterprising man to procure a home. This privilege I would give to the occupant or cultivator only. The small quantity thus disposed of cannot lead to speculation. Let him who would speculate, buy at the sales, as heretofore, as the highest bidder. I clearly see, unless you hold out some such inducement as this, to keep the disposal of your lands going on, it is to become a source of bargain and sale, as the occasions of political speculations shall arise, and produce a scene of corruption that may overwhelm this Government—a scene more terrible than that produced by the Tariff and Internal Improvement, heretofore brought on you by degrees, and by a liberal policy, as it was called.

After closing his remarks relating to the subject of the public lands, Mr. S. said:

And here, sir, I might close; but this discussion has gone so far, and spread so widely, and public expectation has become so excited, on particular topics, on which I am not willing to be wholly silent, that I will pursue it a little further—

In the first speech with which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Webster] favored the Senate, he introduced the subject of slavery. I was sorry to find it brought into a debate of this peculiar character, and was not satisfied with that gentleman's remarks. However, I was pleased to find, when he addressed the Senate a second time, he gave such an explanation as to do away the odious impressions which had been received from his first remarks; and, in addition to his explanation, has very frankly acknowledged that slavery, as it exists in the United States, is protected by the constitution. I am willing to receive these admissions from the gentleman; and am equally willing to admit them to be sincere. Whilst I have ever been sorry to hear this subject brought into debate, I have been disposed to admit any concessions of its constitutionality. Whatever may be the present opinion of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HOLMES] who also touched upon this subject, I well recollect when he struggled with us, side by side, at the most important and gloomy period of this subject that has ever agitated this Government. We know the sacrifices he made on that occasion. We know there were other New England gentlemen who supported us with independence and manly zeal on that occasion. We know another gentleman from Massachusetts, a member of the other House, who, if we believe his own declarations, is willing to go farther with us than merely acknowledging the right we have to hold slaves; he is ready to arm in our defence in case of a servile war. Shall I reject such overtures as these, and pronounce them insincere? No, sir: I would rather thank him for his independence than challenge his motives. I have had, sir, as little reason to fear an improper interference with our slaves, from the New England States, as from any other States. There are, doubtless, some restless spirits in New England, as well as elsewhere, who, borne away by fanaticism, or something worse, are sending their seditious pamphlets and speeches among our slaves, and taking other improper steps to excite insurrections; but those who are most devoted to this unholy service are nearer to us.*

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] has compared the comforts and advantages of the people of the free and slave States, and given a decided preference to the former. I believe, without arrogance or ostentation, there is, to say no more, as much comfort to be found in the slave-holding States, as in any other portion of the Union. There is as much industry, as much kind feeling, as much charity, as much benevolence, as much hospitality, and as much morality; and all the social virtues are as much cherished as they are any where, either in this or any other country.

I am not disposed, sir, in this desultory manner, to examine this subject in all its bearings. The occasion is not a suitable one. Nor will I go into the origin of slavery in this country. If I were to do so, I might, without fear of contradiction, say, that "Plymouth, the place where the pilgrims landed," was the second port at which African slaves were bought and sold on our shores. I once examined this subject fully, but, at the same time, fairly and fearlessly. I say, sir, I will not inquire how slaves were first introduced here, but seeing they are here, and have been crowded from all the other States upon us to the South, I will address my arguments, or present my reasons, to the sober understanding of those that hear me, why they ought, and why they must be, left to time, and to the discretion of those who own them, to effect a change, if one can be effected, to alter (I cannot say to better) their condition. All the schemes of colonization, and returning them to their primitive country, are wholly visionary. These things do well enough to talk about; and sometimes have a political effect, or give pecuniary employment to those who have nothing else to do. But, sir, if they were now all free, and the Government had nothing farther to do than merely to transport them to Africa, you might take every cent from your treasury, your whole annual revenue, and it would not pay one-fourth part of the expense of their transportation—no, not one-fourth part.

Then, sir, what are we to do? Are we to turn them loose upon society; to shift places with their masters; they to become masters, and their masters to become slaves? for, be assured, the two cannot live together as equals. What other effect is such a state of things to produce upon this community?

When the subject of slavery was once before the Senate, on a former occasion, I recollect it was stated by a very distinguished gentleman, then a Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. DAGUERR] that in the town where he resided there were an hundred and fifty white persons for one black person; and that there were at least three black persons for one white person convicted of public crimes. To what extent would be the pillage and depredations of these people, were they all let loose upon society? What could check their rapacity? Its limits cannot be imagined. Some mad missionaries, and self-created philanthropists, with some of your raving politicians, affect to believe that the salvation of this Union depends upon the question of a general emancipation. But I will ask, if there be an orderly, honest, and peaceable citizen, either in the Northern, Southern, Eastern, or Western portion of this Union, who would calmly and deliberately give his assent to such a state of things. I will not believe, for a moment, there is such a one to be found. Therefore, I can scarcely believe that I ought here to make this a serious question. Whenever it shall happen that any State shall bring this subject, in any serious form, before the public, I shall then be ready and willing to meet it, in any shape in which it may present itself, be that shape what it may.

We have been egregiously misrepresented, sir, by visionary theorists, speculating travellers, and ranting politicians, who would impose upon the world a belief that the slaves of the Southern States are starved, and miserable, and tortured, and treated like brutes. It is utterly false. They may travel from pole to pole, and traverse every region of the civilized world, and they will find that there is not a peasantry on the face of the earth that enjoys so much civil liberty, and, at the same time, lives so comfortably, and so bountifully, as the slaves of the Southern States. The idea which has gone abroad, to the contrary, is visionary and fabulous. We are told, and the world is told, in the pamphlets and public speeches, written and uttered by blockheads that know nothing about it, that we never lie down to sleep in safety; that we are continually in fear of having our throats cut, before we awake. In some of the cities, where these pretended philanthropists are daily tampering with, and exciting the slaves to insurrections, they have occasionally had some alarms; but on the plantations, and in the interior of the State, such a thing has never been heard of. Did it become necessary for me to arm against an enemy, either foreign or domestic, and the laws of my country would permit me, I would select my troops from my own slaves; I would put arms into their hands, and tell them to defend me; and they would do it; not from the timid fears of abject slaves, but from their devotion and attachment to me, as their benefactor and protector. I will not deny that there are hard masters among the slave holders, but that evil is doing away; public opinion, and that attachment that is constantly growing up between the master and his slaves, have nearly put it down. There is not to be found, sir, more cheerfulness, and more native gaiety, among the population, in any condition in life, than on a plantation of slaves, where they are treated well. Moreover, the slaves themselves know all this; and what is more, they feel it. They have none of that sickly longing for freedom, with distress, poverty, and starvation. I repeat it, sir, that there is no portion, I do not say of black population, but of the peasantry, of the European continent or any where else, among whom there is more enjoyment, more hilarity, and more practical civil liberty—yes, civil liberty, in its true practical sense—than constantly exists among Southern slaves. As to crimes, they are so rare among them as to be almost unknown. In proportion to their numbers, there are fewer public crimes committed than among any other people, of any other condition living.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

This is not an exaggerated picture of their condition. Why, then, have we all this slang about emancipation and colonization? Were the Government able to pay for them, and transport them to Africa, it would be a sacrifice of their rights and their happiness. It would be sending them from a state of peace, protection, and plenty, to the miserable condition of starvation and butchery. I, sir, will never be the instrument of setting a negro free, or permitting the Government to do so, that he may be consigned to poverty and misery, when I am conscious I can make him comfortable the rest of his days.

Sir, one word more: In the State of Ohio, where slavery is not tolerated, there was at one time a great deal of this kind feeling, as regarded the emancipation of slaves; many took sanctuary there, who had escaped from their masters. So strong was this feeling, at the crisis which brought about the admission of Missouri into the Union, that all the members of Congress from that State opposed her admission, unless under an express prohibition of slavery.* Since that period, however, they have found, from experience, that a free black population cannot be tolerated in that State, but under peculiar restrictions, imposed by law. In consequence whereof, the laws of that State have recently been enforced, and the free people of color, being unable to conform to its rigid exactions, have been led to seek an asylum in the British province of Upper Canada; where, we learn through the medium of the public prints, they have made a settlement, and expect to augment it by applying to the British Government for a large donation of lands. Should this colony succeed, and grow to any extent, if I might hazard an opinion I would say, this might become a more formidable annoyance to the peace and safety of that State, than their former Indian neighbors. It is not for me to arraign the conduct of the good people of Ohio for any municipal regulations their Legislature may have thought fit to adopt. If they be satisfied with that policy which has driven from that State the black people, whom they call free people of color, but many of whom are the slaves of American citizens residing in other States, to the British possessions, it is not for me to complain. But suppose, by what has been called the humanity of their laws, slaves from other States should be still tolerated to take sanctuary there, and make that State a medium through which to pass from their rightful owners in the other States, to this new colony in Upper Canada, and that colony should be fostered by the British Government, may not the people of color, in case of a rupture between the two countries, become a thorn in the side of our fellow-citizens of Ohio? Perhaps there is no description of people in existence who so completely fill the character of marauding warriors and free-booters as a colony of free blacks brought together under such circumstances.

With these remarks upon a subject of deep concern to the Southern States, and which ought to be of little concern to any body else, I shall pass on to the subject of Internal Improvement, of much concern to us all, and which has occupied more or less of the attention of every gentleman who hath participated in this debate.

In pursuing this theme, although of great magnitude, and of much importance to this Government, it will be my course, as well as it hath been of those gentlemen who have preceded me, not to give it a thorough investigation.

The debate upon this question has thrown but little light on it. It has been a debate more of censure than of illustration. Each gentleman has at least justified his own political course, whilst he reproached that of others. And some warmth has arisen as regarded the origin of this measure—one asserting it originated in the South, another denying that fact, and imputing the origin to the North. Claiming no share of that honor myself, I am perfectly willing to leave that part of the controversy to those whom it may concern. But it is certainly worth remarking that, in all the warmth of discussion, they have confined themselves to expedience alone, without touching the constitutional question.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] has come out with his opinions very decidedly in favor of the power of Congress over the subject of Internal Improvement. His opinions and my opinions do not accord. However, whether they accord with mine or not, I like decided opinions upon political questions, because they can be met and combated. This gentleman assures us his mind is settled; that he has satisfied himself that the power exercised by the General Government, in constructing roads and excavating canals, is within that class of powers delegated to Congress by the constitution; and that the exercise of that power is for the great interest of the Union. However I may be pleased with the frankness which that gentleman has displayed in avowing what his opinions are, I am, nevertheless, by no means satisfied with opinions only. They illustrate nothing; settle no point; nor is it by any means satisfactory that that gentleman should inform us that he had been associated with other gentlemen, from South Carolina, in promoting the objects of Internal Improvement, or that it had its origin in South Carolina! It is enough that the people of South Carolina think for themselves upon this great question, and feel themselves bound by the opinions of no politicians. Without any compliments from me to place that gentleman conspicuously before the public, we know very well that he is well versed in the laws of his country, in the laws of nations, highly distinguished for his legal attainments, and long accustomed to the construction of legal instruments. I should have liked, therefore, to have heard from him, on this occasion, not only his opinions, but likewise his constitutional reasons, for his very decided opinions that Congress possessed this constitutional power.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ROWAN] has dwelt a good deal upon this subject, but has arrived at no explicit opinion upon the constitutionality of the measure. He is equally learned and equally experienced in law and legal construction with most gentlemen. It would have been desirable to have heard his constitutional views, but he has not favored the Senate with them. He has assigned, as a justification of the course he has pursued himself, not that it was constitutional, but that his constituents believe the General Government has this power, and that it is for their convenience that the General Government should exercise it; and, as their Representative, he felt himself bound to support it. He acknowledges the inexperience of the exercise of this power by Congress; yet he has uniformly voted for every appropriation, for the Louisville canal especially, as well as for every other road and canal for which an appropriation has been asked.

I do not see the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] in his seat. I am sorry he is not there; but not intending to say any thing, as regards his opinions, in his absence, which I would not say where he present, it is not material. He has not been altogether uniform on this question. He has voted according to circumstances. Of the Cumberland road he has been a uniform supporter, always voting for appropriations for its continuance, whenever asked for. He has uniformly, also, supported the appropriations for the Louisville canal, or for subscriptions by the General Government for stock in that company, which are appropriations of the most exceptionable character. He is, however, opposed to appropriations for roads and canals that lead from the Western States to the Atlantic States, because, as he alleges, they divert the commerce of the Western States from its appropriate channel, the Mississippi, and appropriate market, New Orleans.

To what purpose has this subject been brought into this debate? It has undergone an elaborate discussion by those gentlemen, but neither of whom have so much as attempted to give an exposition of the constitutional principle that confers this power upon Congress. It is not satisfactory to exercise the power without showing how the power is obtained. The exercise of this power produces a continued drain upon your treasury. It is much to be regretted that, whilst both the gentleman from Kentucky and the gentleman from Missouri have given such a display upon constitutional principles and State right principles, this constitutional principle should not have been illustrated. In support of State rights, they have bestowed much consideration. But there is something irreconcilable to my mind that gentlemen can raise the State right standard, and yet vote large appropriations for roads and canals, to be applied under the power of the General Government in the States. The State right party cannot admit that doctrine. They consider the appropriations by Congress for Internal Improvement as the source of the evil. It is Internal Improvement that keeps alive your tariff. It is fed by your tariff. Without the former the latter would perish. How a statesman can support Internal Improvement and oppose the Tariff, is a paradox which I cannot solve. But how he can vote for both, and still advocate State rights, is a paradox that nobody can solve.

Another gentleman [Mr. HARRIS] has said, the law of 1824, which appropriated thirty thousand dollars to enable the President to obtain plans and surveys of roads and canals, was an experiment—that the subject was not well understood. This was a woful experiment, sir; an experiment that has rendered the Southern States completely tributary to the other States of the Union. The enactment of that law was hailed by the advocates of Internal Improvement, which had been balancing for eight years, between victory and defeat, as a confirmation of the power of Congress over Internal Improvement. The subject was as well understood by the members of Congress then, as it is now. The people at large did not understand it; nor never would, had the discussions been confined to Congress. That Congress understood it, cannot be questioned. It had been debated warmly in Congress, from 1816 till that law passed in 1824. The great bonus bill of 1817 underwent a thorough discussion in both branches of Congress, and passed both Houses, and was negatived by Mr. Madison. The next year it was resumed, and then underwent another very long and very animated discussion. And so it did every year, in some shape or other, until the act of 1824, which act, alone, has taken from your treasury thirty thousand dollars every year since, except one, for plans and surveys, independent of millions for the making of roads and canals. On the bonus bill, sir, in 1817, only one fortnight after I first took my seat in the Senate, I made my stand. I voted against that bill in all its modifications. And I think, sir, I understood it as well then as I do now. I understood it then to be a political speculation, and a speculation in violation of the constitution of my country. In 1820 or 1821, when it was contemplated to extend the Cumberland road, a resolution was submitted to the Senate by General Lacock, then a Senator from Pennsylvania, to appropriate ten thousand dollars for a survey. I opposed it. On that occasion I stood alone, except that my worthy friend Mr. Macon, who I regret is not here, voted with me. I was then told that nothing would be asked of the Government but to survey. I replied, if you make the survey, you must make the road. My prediction has been fully verified; the road has been extended every year. And you have appropriated more than one million of dollars since that time, to continue that road. In this way, sir, we have suffered this system to grow up in our Government by gradual encroachments.

On this subject I have, on a former discussion, when it was properly before the Senate, in a shape upon which a vote could be directly taken, had the honor of giving my constitutional objections at full length. I shall forbear to do so here, and leave this subject precisely where I found it—a subject of debate, without a conclusion.

I come now to the subject of the tariff, concerning which there exists so much anxiety, and upon which there depends so much interest. It has occupied a conspicuous place in this discussion. And I have, from the commencement of the debate, felt an invincible reluctance to approach it here. I should have no reluctance, but, on the contrary, a great deal of pleasure, were this the time and place suitable for that occasion. The question is one of vital importance, not only to the State from which I come, but is of vital importance to the whole Union. In discussing it here, and at this time, who am I to address? I have the honor, it is true, to be surrounded by the Senate of the United States, who will, perhaps, do me the favor to hear me. Also, the galleries are full of respectable citizens, who will probably give me their ordinary attention likewise. To which of these bodies shall I appeal for a decision, whether I am right or wrong? If I appeal to the Senate, they have no such question before them. If to the galleries, they have no jurisdiction to decide upon any question here. And although we are in the Senate chamber, the Senate can no more decide upon this question than the merest stranger in the galleries. It is a subject, sir, that ought not to be impaired by any commonplace familiarity, in debate, where a complete investigation of all its bearings cannot be attained, and where no decision is sought for. It is lessening its consequence, and giving up more than half its importance. The time is approaching when we shall be able to bring it before the Senate in a different form, where it can be discussed upon its merits, and the vote of the Senate passed upon it to a useful purpose. But, seeing the subject has been brought before the Senate, although I do not intend to go into any thing like a general view of the question, I will, nevertheless, not pass it entirely unnoticed.

This discussion, sir, has involved the consideration of two great political questions; whether, if a State be borne down by the oppressive operation of a law of the United States, the proper appeal from that oppression is not to the Judiciary; or whether, in such a case, the State aggrieved has not a right to withdraw, and say to the rest of the Union, we no longer belong to you, because you have violated the compact with us; we have decided for ourselves that you have oppressed us; your laws are unconstitutional, and we will no longer continue a member of the Union.

On the first portion of this subject, if it could be heard before the Senate as a distinct proposition, and the Senate had the power to decide upon it, I would give it, as far as I should be able, the best consideration its importance would demand; but it is utterly out of the question for a speaker to investigate and descend upon a mere speculative political question, where no results are to be expected, as he would feel himself bound to do were the question a real one, from which some solid and permanent good was to flow, instead of one that should yield little more than an opportunity of making a speech to raise his own fame. But, as it has been the course, in this erratic flight of the Senate, that has drawn into its vortex any thing and every thing, civil, religious, and political, as the speaker may have thought fit to select, and this has been selected as one choice subject by those who have gone before me, I will offer a few unpremeditated remarks.

For the judges of the United States I entertain the highest respect, both in their judicial character as well as in their individual character: and am willing to attribute to them as much integrity, and as much talent, as falls to the share of any judges, in this or any other country. But it seems to me that their province is limited to decisions between citizen and citizen, and between the United States and citizens, the individual States, &c. and in all cases of meum et tuum their decisions are conclusive. But may not a distinction be taken, where a law is notoriously unconstitutional and oppressive upon the whole community of a State; where the ground of complaint would be, that Congress had enacted a law, not only against the letter, but likewise against the spirit and meaning of the constitution; which law was undermining all the private rights of individuals, as well as rights appertaining to them as the community of a State?

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

Then, sir, suppose the court of the United States always to consist of seven judges, as it now does; and suppose a question upon the constitutionality of a law of the United States that had vitally affected the people of a State in their private and municipal rights should come before these seven judges for their decision, and three of the seven should pronounce the law constitutional, and three others of the seven should pronounce it unconstitutional. Here the opinions of six of the seven are completely neutralized, and the whole weight of the question, be it of what moment it may, must devolve upon a single judge. This single judge would hold the balance, and have it in his power to decide the fate of the Union by his single dictum. The entire operations of the law must cease, if he should say no; or its operations must go on if he should say ay; be the consequences what they may. The peace and happiness of the Union must be destroyed or preserved as he should be guided by prudence and honesty on the one hand, or by caprice and ambition on the other; because judges are not always exempt from these passions. Or let us suppose a law, affecting in a special manner the private or municipal rights of the people of a whole State, should be enacted by Congress, to compel vessels going from one port to another, in the same State, or to a port in a different State, to clear out at the port of departure, and the master should refuse to do so because the law was unconstitutional, as the constitution expressly forbids it. Should your judges ever be misled to declare such a law constitutional, and the collector of the revenue should be resisted, could he who made the resistance be convicted of an offence against the constitution of his country? If the opinions of the judges are to be considered the constitution, or if the judges are clothed with this tremendous power—a power that gives to a single man the control of the destiny of this Union—is it not time to inquire whether it be not fit to place it in some more responsible repository?

The other great question, whether a State has a right to secede from the Union, if Congress should pass an unconstitutional law that should prove oppressive, is a question of still greater moment.

Were I to be asked what opinion I entertained of the power of a State to dissolve its political connexion with the Union, I would respond, go ask my constituents. This is not the time, and place, and circumstances, that will justify a discussion of that question between the United States and the State of South Carolina. If South Carolina is aggrieved by the tariff—and she most assuredly is, to an extent of great oppression—and the remedy is only to be found in a separation from the Union, it belongs exclusively to the people of that State to meet in convention, examine the subject, weigh the consequences, and settle the mode of operation. That is the course, and the only course, by which this question can be determined, and not by any flight of fancy that may exist in my imagination, or that of any other member of Congress. I unfeignedly believe there is at this time in the Legislature of South Carolina, much talent, much patriotism, much devotion to the Union, and as much independence and firmness as could possibly be wanting to adopt any plan of operation that wisdom, patriotism, justice, interest, or the love of union, may dictate, for the relief of their burthens. I do not withhold my opinion here from fear of responsibility. I shrink from no responsibility imposed upon me as a member of this Senate. If the wisdom of my Legislature, whose province it is to determine upon that measure, and act upon that great occasion, should think proper to call a convention, and my country should honor me with a seat there, I will assume any responsibility which the wisdom of the occasion, or the interest of my country, may require at my hands.

Sir, I will go further; and should the cupidity or the madness of the majority in Congress push them on to impose one unconstitutional burthen after another, until it can be no longer borne, and no other alternative remains, I will then take upon myself the last responsibility of an oppressed people, and adopt the exclamation of the poet, dulce et decorum est pro patria mori; and if the exigencies of my country should ever demand it, I will be ready to shed my blood upon the altars of that country. I am attached to the Union; I wish to see it perpetuated; I wish it may endure through all time. But if the same causes exist in our Government which have overturned other Governments, what right have we to expect an exemption from the fatality of other nations? We need not go abroad, or into ancient history, for instance to warn us. If we only go back to 1774 and 1775, we shall see a much less cause producing that revolution which separated these United States from Great Britain, than now exists between the United States and the State of South Carolina. What was the exciting cause of that revolution? A three penny tax on tea, which was then merely the beverage of the rich, and a small tax upon stamps. It was these small duties that set the whole United States in a flame: and that flame spread with the velocity of the winds, from one end of the United States to the other. Massachusetts, Virginia, and South Carolina, were united then in the same cause—the defence of their civil liberty; which was threatened by the small duty on tea. Memorials and remonstrances were resorted to, but for a short time, until a company in Boston, disguised in the habiliments of Indians, counselled, if not led, by the immortal Hancock, boarded the ships, and threw all the tea in the harbor overboard. May we not look for the same effects from the same causes, at all times, and in all places?

Whilst I regret that, under existing circumstances, this picture is not too highly colored, yet I believe there is a redeeming spirit at hand. The constitution itself, which has been made to bend to suit the interests of majorities, is undergoing a new version. Investigations of its true and plain common-sense construction is going on in more hands than one.

Among the distinguished writers engaged in this investigation is Dr. Cooper, who has been alluded to by gentlemen in this discussion; whose name is identified with every science; whose life has been devoted to the cause of civil liberty and human happiness. In his Political Economy, Consolidation, and other recent political pieces, he has torn the mask from the delusion of constructive powers and party intrigue.

A writer under the signature of "Brutus," in his "Crisis," has, with a master hand, given an exposition to the great agitated points of the constitution, on the subjects of the Tariff and Internal Improvement, that will remain a treasure to his country while talents shall be regarded.

The lectures of Mr. Dew, of Virginia, on the restrictive system, are more like a mathematical analysis than the lectures of a professor on political economy. His illustrations are so plain, and so strong, and so conclusive, that they are perfect demonstrations of the errors and absurdity of the American System.

None of these writers have ever been answered by the advocates of Internal Improvement and the Tariff System. To these may be added, a paper recently published, by order of the House of Representatives, which will be read with much interest. It is the report of the Committee on Commerce, written, as we understand, by Mr. Cambreleng, the chairman of that committee. It gives a more expanded view, and furnishes more evidences, drawn from facts, of the great impolicy and ruinous effects of the tariff, than have appeared in any state paper heretofore published by the Government. The disastrous effects which it has already, and will continue to produce upon our foreign commerce, are so fully and clearly established, that it must command admiration, and will be extensively read.

The flood of light which those distinguished writers have shed upon this subject, to which may be added this report, cannot fail to enlighten the benighted minds of an honest industrious community, and bring them to reflect, seriously, whether it be just to tax the many for the benefit of the few. The manufacturers themselves regret that this system has been introduced. And well they may: for it is now fully ascertained that at least one half of the moneyed capital of the New England States has been sacrificed by this mania, and a large proportion of the proprietors of manufacturing establishments bankrupted. Fortunes, that have been accumulating for half a century, have been swept away in an instant.

There can be no probability that men of business, raised to active pursuits, and accustomed to employ their capital in some productive and advantageous manner, can remain devoted to a system that must produce their certain destruction. In addition to so many reasons that exist, why we may hope for an early dissolution of this oppressive system, another reason, as strong at least, if not stronger than any other, is the certainty that the public debt of the United States will shortly be extinguished. When that period shall arrive, there will not be even a pretext for the continuation of the tariff, except it be for the explicit and avowed purpose of protecting the manufacturers. And I beg leave to ask if there be even one man who can for a moment suppose that twelve millions of the free people of the United States will calmly submit to have the direction of the whole of their labor taken out of their own hands, and placed under the management of the General Government; not to secure a revenue for governmental purposes, but that the Government may, at its discretion, parcel out the profits of the labor of one portion of the Union to bestow on those of another portion of the Union? Sir, it is morally certain that they will submit to no such tyranny. Nor will it be necessary for the people to rise in their might to put it down, either by one portion seceding from the rest, or by the more direful alternative of civil war, that must drench the States with the blood of their own citizens. Public opinion must, and will correct this mighty evil, and in its own way, and leave the States still further to cultivate their union, upon those pure principles that first brought them together. If I am mistaken, however, and these hopes should prove illusive, it will then be time for the States to determine what are their rights, and whether they have constitutional powers to secede from the Union.

But, sir, whilst I hope that a happy revolution in our political affairs awaits us at no distant period, resulting from this powerful combination of circumstances, I entertain not the least hope of relief from the justice or magnanimity of either the Eastern or Western States. They have got the tariff, however, fixed upon us, and will, no doubt, hold on until it becomes their interest to abandon it; and then, and not till then, can we hope for their concurrence in its repeal. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] appeared, at the beginning of this debate, to feel great sympathy for the oppressed planters of the Southern States; and some gentlemen hoped that he might probably join the South, and lend his aid to repeal at once the oppressive tariff. But, sir, that hope is gone. Instead of giving his aid to repeal the tariff law entirely, and especially such parts of it as bear most oppressively upon the Southern States, he has introduced a bill purporting to be "A bill to provide for the abolition of unnecessary duties; to relieve the people from sixteen millions of taxes; and to improve the condition of the agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation, of the United States."

This is the title of the bill, sir, which is very specious, and would seem to indicate that the tariff system was to be totally abolished, and that as soon as this specious bill should be acted on. When you leave the preamble, and look into the provisions of the bill itself, it gives you a very different view. You will there find the duties to be reduced are, for the most part, duties on articles of luxury; such duties as affect the rich classes of society only, and for which the laboring class of the community care nothing. Not a few of them are articles of extreme luxury. Amongst them are, "cocoa, olives, figs, raisins, prunes, almonds, currants, cambrics, lawns, cashmere shawls, gauze, thread and silk lace, essence of bergamot, and other essences used as perfumery, porcelain, Brussels carpeting, velvet cords," &c.

These are articles mostly used by the rich, the gay, and splendid. They are rarely used by that substantial class of citizens who move in the middle sphere of life. Indeed, there is not a single article in the whole catalogue the removal of the duties on which will materially affect the Southern States, but would prove as favorable to the Western States, and more so than to any other portion of the Union. All spirits, woollens, and cotton goods, that come in competition with spirits, woollens, and cotton goods manufactured in the United States, are not included in this exemption from duties. Besides, even this supposed relief is, by the provisions of the bill itself, postponed for ten years. In ten years, if the present tariff should continue, it will be perfectly immaterial whether they are ever taken off. If they are to be taken off, why not now? As well might it be postponed till another generation, as to postpone it ten years. The articles of iron and steel, in all their forms, and cotton and woollen goods, cotton bagging, and cordage, and many other articles, are passed by, unnoticed, in this bill. These are the articles we wish to see duty free. They would restore your commerce and navigation, and give real relief. But, sir, what is of still greater importance to the Southern States, the gentleman has concluded this relief bill, by laying a heavy duty of thirty-three and one-third per cent. on all foreign furs and raw hides—a duty heretofore unknown in any of our tariff laws; a duty perfectly suited to Missouri, as that State is a grazing as well as a fur State. Such a tariff is precisely what she wants. These duties, added to the duties laid on lead, in all its forms, in the tariff of 1828, which that gentleman [Mr. BENTON] voted for, with the express purpose of securing this duty on lead, will for the present complete her wishes. Furs and raw hides are articles of prime necessity in this great community; and, unless the people will consent to go without hats and shoes, or, in plain terms, go bareheaded and barefooted, the rest of the States must pay a very heavy tribute to enrich the people of Missouri. This may be a relief bill for Missouri, but for no other State. Besides, there is a bill reported more than a month before this bill, by the Committee of Finance, which embraces the whole tariff, without imposing any new burthens, and which, I hope, may be taken up in due time, and acted on.

Sir, I have pursued this subject much farther than I originally intended. I will here abandon it, and reserve what I may wish to say farther, until the question on the tariff shall be fairly before the Senate, and will now advert to another leading topic in this debate, as there are many to choose from.

The topic, sir, I have alluded to, is that which relates to

SENATE.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[FEB. 26, 1830.]

the party politics of other times. A contest had arisen, of a singular character; which was, whether the Eastern States, or the Southern States, had been most friendly and magnanimous in promoting the growth and advancing the interests of the States in the West. And in solving that question, the controversy had assumed a new aspect, and had been converted into one upon parties and party politics, of the most violent and personal character, between the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HAYNE] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WEBSTER.] The gentleman from South Carolina had brought before the Senate a full view of the old federal party of 1798. He had carried it back to the whig and tory parties of England, and derived the federal party from the tory party of that country. He had brought before the Senate the Hartford Convention, and read its journals, to prove that a settled purpose had existed in the New England States, to dissolve the Union. He had brought before the Senate the Olive Branch, and read many of its choice paragraphs, to illustrate the violent opposition in New England to the late war between the United States and Great Britain: and concluded with the "coalition," the ghost of which he supposed had haunted the gentleman's [Mr. WEBSTER's] imagination, and, like the ghost of "Banquo, would never down."

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] in reply to these charges of political heresy, says he had nothing to do with the Hartford Convention; that he had never read its journals; and if its ghost, like the ghost of Banquo, had risen to haunt the imagination of any body, "it could not shake its gory locks at him." And, in his turn, brings charges against South Carolina, and says, "other conventions, of more recent existence, had gone farther than the Hartford Convention;" and named what he called "the Colleton and Edgefield Conventions;" and read the proceedings of the Colleton meeting of 1828, after the enactment of the tariff law of that year. These proceedings, he argued, were more inflammatory, and tended more to disunion, than the proceedings of the Hartford Convention could possibly do.

If these conventions, as they have been called, have existed, either in New England or South Carolina, they are not chargeable to me. And should the ghosts of either, or all of them, arise, to haunt the imaginations of any concerned, I can exclaim, with the gentleman from Massachusetts, "they cannot shake their gory locks at me."

There has been much crimination and recrimination between those two gentlemen. One reproaches the other with political tergiversation, and it is reciprocated. The gentleman from South Carolina says the gentleman from Massachusetts had distinguished himself, whilst a member of the House of Representatives, in 1824, in opposition to the tariff; but in 1828, took a different course in the Senate, and supported the tariff. The gentleman from Massachusetts, on his part, says, the gentleman from South Carolina, in 1824, while the act to procure the necessary plans and surveys of roads and canals, "which covered the whole subject of Internal Improvement," was under discussion, opposed every modification of the law that tended to diminish the power of Congress over that subject, but that he had since shifted his ground, and had become opposed to Internal Improvements. The speeches, the yeas and nays, and the Senate Journals, have all been produced and read in the Senate, to substantiate those mutual accusations. Other members of the Senate, who have shared in this debate, have pursued the same course of crimination and recrimination; charging and proving on their opponents, whomsoever they may happen to be, that they had held and maintained, at different times, different opinions upon the same political subjects; and had voted on the one side at one time, and on the other side at another time, as party interest or party feelings might dictate. These reciprocal vituperations have not been the result of a sudden gust of ardent feelings, or unguarded expressions, to pass off with the moment and be forgotten; but the records and journals of Congress, as far back as the revolutionary war, have been ransacked and hunted up, and brought into the Senate—the speeches, and the yeas and nays, read, to establish the inconsistency of each other; and, moreover, all this has gone abroad to adorn the public prints, and mingle in the party strifes of the day.

When such scenes as these are playing off in the Senate chamber, with open doors, and a crowded audience, if it be not a duty, it is at least justifiable, for those who are conscious of having pursued a different course, to avow it in self-defence. In those accusings and defendings, in the course of this debate, a great deal of that kind of egotism which they necessarily involved had been indulged. I will beg leave to indulge a little in this egotistic style also. If any occasion will palliate this request, it must be such as the present.

I have had the honor of acting an humble part in public stations from an early period of my life; I have been eleven years in this Senate, and if it were not too ostentatious, I would invoke a scrutiny of my own votes and political opinions. I fear no challenges for inconsistent votes; I fear no Journals, no yeas and nays. I claim no exemption from human fallibility. I may have given many erroneous votes, but am conscious I have never given an inconsistent vote, or held, at any time, inconsistent political opinions. If I have, I ask them to be proclaimed.

The origin of parties is as old as the Government itself. When the division between the federalists and republicans first took place, the parties were nearly balanced, as regarded numbers, and as regarded talents; and were, moreover, pretty equally dispersed throughout the United States. But all parties unanimously concurred in the election of General Washington to the Presidency. At the close of his administration, the distinction of parties was fully developed, and the contest for supremacy between the two parties commenced. The federal party succeeded in the election of Mr. Adams, the elder. He had been a revolutionary man, of distinguished fame, and his party, a little the strongest, placed him in the Presidency, as the successor of General Washington. And Mr. Jefferson, who then stood at the head of the republican party, was elected Vice President. The federal party, considering themselves firmly fixed at the head of Government, for the next eight years at least, the better to secure the acquisition, and perpetuate their power, enacted the alien and sedition laws. The country became alarmed at this high-handed measure, and the republican party, very justly, laid hold of it to show the dangerous tendency of augmenting the strength of the General Government by the constructive powers of the constitution "to provide for the public good and general welfare." The consequences were, that the republican party gained strength from this, and other circumstances, and at the next Presidential election elected Mr. Jefferson over Mr. Adams. They held the power until the late war commenced, and through that war, until its termination, and the restoration of peace. The federal party were universally opposed to the war, at its commencement. The federalists of the Northern States, and many others, elsewhere, continued their opposition throughout the war. But the war having terminated triumphantly for the United States, the federalists soon became too enfeebled to act any longer as a party. And having no fixed object, some turned republicans, and, being new converts, like all other new converts, became exceedingly devout. Many respectable men amongst them, not disposed to abandon principles which they had honestly adopted, retired to private life. One portion, however, in the State of New York, about forty in number, the better to provide for themselves, made a formal renunciation of their principles, in a public address, in which they alleged there was no longer any federal party to which they could hold on; therefore, they avowed their adhesion, for the future, to the strongest republican party. Some humorous wag of the federal party, upon seeing this formal renunciation, drew up a regular deed of conveyance; in which, for divers good causes and valuable considerations him thereunto moving, he did bargain, sell, release, and set over in market, overt, forty thousand federalists, who had left their ranks, to the republican party, in fee simple forever.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

It was now supposed that the federal party had fallen to rise no more, and they were much sought after, and greeted as brothers of the republican family, by the leading politicians of the day. They were told there was but one party; that no such thing as a distinct federal party, or a distinct republican party, existed. But the phraseology was, "We are all federalists, all republicans." It became an invidious thing to denounce a gentleman as a federalist. In the State of South Carolina it was so taken and generally understood by all, and so acted on. The community were said to be satisfied with it. Good feelings were said to be generated by it. It was pronounced as the great desideratum to strengthen the Union. In fine, there was nothing great or good which it was not to effect.

As an evidence of the temper and understanding of the citizens of South Carolina, upon the happy results of the amalgamation of the federal and republican parties, among many other instances I will beg leave to read a few short passages from an eloquent oration, delivered in Charleston, on the 4th July, 1821, before the Cincinnati and Revolution Societies, by a distinguished gentleman of that place, who was a member of the Cincinnati Society. After speaking on other interesting relations between Great Britain and America, and the effects of the late war between them, he says:

"These are not the only reflections of an exhilarating character, which the late war is calculated to excite. It has led to the extinction of those parties, the collisions of which once weakened our country, and disturbed the harmony of its society."

"I come not here to burn the torch of Alecto; to me there is no lustre in its fires, nor cheering warmth in its blaze. Let us rather offer and mingle our congratulations that those unhappy differences, which alienated one portion of our community from the rest, are at an end, and that a vast fund of the genius and worth of our country has been restored to its service, to give new vigor to its career of power and prosperity."

"To this blessed consummation the administration of our venerable Monroe has been a powerful auxiliary."

"The delusions of past years have rolled away, and the mists that once hovered over forms of now unshaded brightness are dissipated forever. We can now all meet and exchange our admiration and love, in generous confraternity of feeling: whether we speak of our Jefferson or our Adams, our Madison or our Hamilton, our Pinckney or our Monroe, the associations of patriotism are awakened, and we forget the distance in the political zodiac, which once separated these illustrious luminaries, in the full tide of glory they are pouring on the brightest pages of our history. This unanimity of sentiment is not a sickly calm, in which the high energies of the nation are sunk into a debilitating paralysis."

"This Union can only annoy the demagogue, who lives by the proscription of one half of his fellow-citizens, and in the delusions of a distempered state of public opinion. But to him who loves his country as a beautiful whole, not scarred and cut into compartments of sects and schisms, such a picture is one of unmixed triumph and gratulation. The necessity for the existence of parties in a free State, in the sense in which we have unfortunately understood them, is one of those paradoxes which the world has rather received than examined, and seems allied to the sophistry which would lead us to believe that the pleasures of domestic life are promoted by its dissensions, or that the jarring of the elements is essential to the harmony of the universe. No! an united is a happy as well as an invincible people.*"

I have never acted with that portion of politicians who were denominated federalists. I formed my political creed at the eventful period of 1796. I then took my stand as a republican of the Jefferson school, and I have never departed from it. And if the politicians of that, or any other school, say I have, they slander me. I have been uniformly opposed to the federal principles, and am opposed to them now. I have been opposed to them, because I thought them wrong. But whilst I have been uniformly opposed to federal principles and federal measures, I have as uniformly treated the persons and reputations of the federal party with every possible respect. I am aware that I have never been a favorite with that party. I have never sought to be so. I am, nevertheless, willing to attribute to them all the integrity and honesty of purpose, of any other party; but I am not willing to adopt their creed. There are gentlemen of that party with whom I am upon intimate terms, and whose friendship and society I esteem as a treasure; but we never converse on party politics.

I cannot, sir, be annoyed by any condition of my fellow-citizens that contributes to their social happiness. Party dissensions hold out no charms for my gratification. There is no faculty of my nature that could take sides in a contest for the proscription of any portion of the community to which I belong, upon party principles. But when I consider the destruction of the federal, and its amalgamation with the republican party, and look at the consequences that have resulted from that union, I cannot but believe that it has been a misfortune, instead of a blessing, to this Government. It has defeated all the great purposes for which the republican party was originally instituted. The federal party was characterized by its constant tendency to extravagance; by its efforts to increase the powers of the General Government; by a free construction of the constitution; by the creation of new offices; profuse expenditure of public moneys; the establishment of banks, and the establishment of a standing army in time of peace. The republican party were opposed to all these operations. It was decidedly by their opposition to these political errors, that they broke down the federal party, and obtained the possession of the Government. Economy was the watch-word of the republican party; the purity of the constitution was their rallying point. They put down the constructive powers of the Government: the alien and sedition laws, based upon "the public good and general welfare" construction, withered and died at their bidding, and never revived. They operated as a complete check upon every abuse of power in the hands of the federal party, and particularly whilst that party held the Government.

By the operation of this powerful check, not a constitutional check, but of the vigilance of a strong opposition party, the constitution itself was brought back to its common sense construction, and the extravagances of the Government were levelled down to the proper exigencies of the Government.

When the republican party got possession of the Government, and Mr. Jefferson came to the Presidency, they enacted the embargo law which he recommended, and which the federal party opposed, upon the ground of its unconstitutionality, it being a creature of "the public good and general welfare" construction; which construction the federal party, although in the minority, yet a very strong minority, denied to be the legitimate construction; and, by their opposition, that law could not be enforced to any valuable purpose, even under the administration of Mr. Jefferson. The legitimacy of the war they could not deny; and whilst contending against the expediency of the war, with a large majority opposed to it, the war terminated successfully, and the federal party terminated with it, as to all efficient purposes of a party. And thence, this "happy union" of the two great leading political parties was consummated. And no party was henceforth known but the republican party, who have had the entire administration of the Government ever since; and whom it was expected would have administered the Government upon the pure democratic principles, and a strict regard to the fair construction of the constitution. And now the inquiry is, not what have they done, but what have they not done? They have given you an American System; they have given protection to that system, with all its train of evils; they have given away your public lands, with an unsparing hand, to the Western States, to private corporations, and to other associations; they have appropriated large sums of money to make roads, canals, clear out rivers and creeks; they have appropriated large sums of money for a joint stock co-partnership with private corporations; and they have now a proposition to divide the surplus revenue amongst the several States, like the spoils of war amongst a successful clan.

All these measures have been effected within the last fifteen years, and since the fall of the federal party. They have been effected by the republican party, many of whom are supporting and voting for most of those measures at this time. These are the blessed fruits of that union of parties which never existed until the federal party was extinct.

I would ask, sir, for what purpose federalism has been raked from its embers at this time? Why has this new impulse been given to a subject that we have been taught to believe had gone down to oblivion? A subject that had been put to rest, long since, by the republican party itself. What evidence have we that ought to alarm us at this period? There is no Presidential election pending; General Jackson has possession of the Presidential chair for the next three years; the Government is solely in the possession, and under the control, of the republican party. The federalists can never be formidable if left to themselves; they are only so when associated with the republicans.

It is not my intention to palliate the federal policy. But to denounce them, when crumbled into dust, appears to me like the lion in the fable. Indeed we know of no party existing by that name. Nor has any existed by that name since the grand union. We know of individuals who still retain that name, and are proud of it; and who still retain a devotion to federal principles. But as a body they are impotent: at least we think so in the Southern States; and they think so themselves. But they become an host when united with the republicans; republicans who call in federal aid, when necessary to do so, to put down a rival and secure their own triumph: and who often throw themselves into the federal ranks to help out a federal candidate, in return, to put down a republican, whom some republican leader wishes to see displaced. They are often associated together under the republican banner: contending in concert against other republican candidates, for the same honors. And if a federalist did not belong to the Hartford Convention, and approved of the war, no matter how late he came to that conclusion, they are, by public opinion, and the sanction of constant usage, entitled to participate in all the honors and offices of the Government. This toleration I am not disposed to complain of; but why are they alternately denounced and caressed? If the denunciation was only against the Hartford Convention, and federalists opposed to the war, they can excite no terror; if against them in mass, why are they cherished by the leading republicans, or such as assume to be leaders?

The great misfortune to our country is, the republican party, since its union with the federal party, have separated and formed themselves into three or four parties—all calling themselves republicans, each setting up for itself, and each striving to put down the others. And some politicians are not very fastidious about the means to be employed against a rival party. And when the repudiated federalist is to be used to aid in a project of destruction, he is used in either character, as a federalist or a republican, as the occasion may require.

After the election of President Monroe, three or four republican parties rose upon the ruins of the federalists. Amongst them was the Crawford party. Mr. Crawford being a man of distinguished talents, excellent morals, and greatly esteemed, more than ordinary means were employed to put him down. The presses were employed for that purpose. The Washington Republican was established in this city for that express purpose. Its papers were sent gratis throughout the Union. It denominated Mr. Crawford the Radical chief, and those who supported him radicals. This being a new term in the political vocabulary, its definition was not understood. It was defined to mean—

"An old federalist in a new form, holding the people to be too ignorant to choose a President, and that it is lawful to cheat and defraud them for their own good, upon the ground that they are their own worst enemies."*

To aid in this good cause, Mr. Adams, the Coalition Chief, was brought into the republican ranks, and obtained, at least, the second place in the republican family, and especially in the two Carolinas.

In North Carolina, where the electors are elected by general ticket, there were two tickets run—one called the Crawford ticket, the other the People's ticket. In some of the counties, it was agreed, the better to prevent Mr. Crawford's success, that those who voted the people's ticket should endorse upon the ticket "for General Jackson" or "for Mr. Adams," as the voter might choose; and when the election should close, and the tickets be counted, if the people's ticket succeeded, then the endorsements should be counted also, and whosoever had the greatest number—General Jackson or Mr. Adams—should be the people's candidate, and be supported by the people's electors. The people's electors were elected, and they unanimously voted for General Jackson. But I suppose if Mr. Adams had had the greatest number of endorsements, he would have gotten the vote, according to compact. This compact was not universal.

In South Carolina, Mr. Adams was equally beloved by many of the leading republicans. In September of 1824, in the district of Edgefield, a very large and respectable assemblage of the people convened, for the purpose of determining on the most suitable person as their Presidential candidate. They went into a formal election, and General Jackson was elected. But lest they should find that General Jackson would not be sustained in other States, they proceeded to a second choice, to be brought forward in case General Jackson was not likely to succeed; and Mr. Adams was elected, as their second choice, to be kept in reserve. Their proceedings were published in the newspapers, and sent abroad to the world—recognizing Mr. Adams as a republican, and second to none but General Jackson.

* This was the definition of a Radical, given by Mr. McDuffie, in a pamphlet which he published at Columbia, South Carolina, in November, 1824, immediately preceding the Presidential election. In that pamphlet, he ranks General Jackson and Mr. Adams together as the two most prominent republican candidates, in South Carolina, for the Presidency. Since that period, the people of South Carolina have obtained the true definition of the term Radical, and are now fighting under its banner.—Note by Mr. S.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE

In the city of Charleston, October, 1824, on the day of the election for Representatives to Congress and to the State Legislature, who were to elect the Presidential electors, a full ticket of candidates published their names, and for that purpose addressed the following note to the editor of the Southern Patriot, in this form:

"JACKSON AND ADAMS TICKET.

"To the Editor of the Southern Patriot.

"SIR: You are authorized to say, that the following gentlemen will in no event vote for electors favorable to William H. Crawford as President."

To this declaration they annexed their names, eighteen of them in number. Among those names I recognize gentlemen of the first respectability, of the old federal school; also republicans of the first respectability—all uniting in "confraternity," to support Mr. Adams as the republican candidate, in case any thing should render the success of General Jackson doubtful; but in no event to support Mr. Crawford.

In February, 1824, a committee of the republican members of Congress, consisting of twenty-four, three of them from South Carolina, were nominated to take the sense of Congress whether it were expedient to meet in caucus, to fix upon a suitable candidate for the Presidency.† The committee reported it was inexpedient to meet in caucus at that time. The reasons were, because all the candidates were republicans, and a caucus was only necessary in federal times. Mr. Adams was one of these republican candidates, and was elected.

Accompanying this report of the anti-caucus committee, was the following statement:

"1. That, of the two hundred and sixty-one members of Congress, somewhere about forty-five are federalists; so that the democratic members that might go into caucus are two hundred and sixteen."

I will give one instance more of the facility and dexterity with which some of our republicans can metamorphose a federalist, to suit any occasion that may occur. The instance alludes to myself; and I hope I may be pardoned for mentioning it, as I was not an actor, but merely the subject of the stratagem. In less than two years after the leading party in Charleston, South Carolina, in October, 1824, had exhibited to their constituents and to the world, their "Jackson and Adams ticket," exhibiting them as brother republicans of the same school, and equally worthy of being supported for the Presidency, I had the honor of presenting my humble pretensions for public favor; and, although less than two years after the display of that ticket, I was denounced in a public newspaper as the supporter and ally of John Q. Adams, who was himself a federalist, and a friend to the Hartford Convention; and that I was opposed to General Jackson.* And this was enlarged upon and reiterated in the same paper; and this, too, when it was known, as far as I was known, that the reverse of all this, as related to myself, was literally true.

I never was the advocate of Mr. Adams. I am opposed, and have always been opposed, to his political principles. I erred in one thing: I did not abuse him in the streets and highways. Had I done so, it might have saved me from this reproach.

When General Jackson was first a candidate, although I was not one of his supporters, I was nevertheless one of his admirers, but not one of his traducers. Before he became a candidate, I had made up my mind in favor of Mr. Crawford, who had high claims; and General Jackson has too much regard for good faith to suppose I ought to have abandoned him. But, in the second canvass, I supported General Jackson throughout; and I will support him again, if he should consent to serve his country a second time. But, when I make this avowal, I am not pledged to follow General Jackson, or any other President, implicitly. I was not sent here to enlist under party banners, but to serve my country upon the principles of the constitution, from which I hope General Jackson will never depart. Much has been said by the politicians, of their support of General Jackson for the Presidency. He was not placed in office by that portion of the community denominated politicians, who make Presidents for their own convenience, and to answer their own interest. They only followed in the train. They were forced into the ranks by public opinion. His party was his country, and his supporters were the sovereign people, who, not yet contaminated with the sickly and corrupt intrigues that will one day prostrate your country, bestowed the Presidency on him for his long, his meritorious, and his well-tried services.

The great mass of the people of the United States are republican, and seek after truth: and when correctly informed, will always decide justly. They love their country, and they love the constitution; and would always serve the one, and be guided by the other, were they freed from the polluted intrigues that daily surround them, generated in the party feuds of scheming politicians, who, without any fixed party principles, are everlastingly engaged in party intrigues, regardless of the constitution, and regardless of the public good. This is a deplorable picture, but it is, nevertheless, true. You have, at this moment, four distinct parties; not well poised parties, of different political principles, calculated to operate as a salutary check on all sides, but all claiming to be of the true republican school, and each party having a distinct candidate for the Presidency. The patriot may deplore, and the orator may denounce, the effects of rival political parties; but, sir, as well may you hope to stay the billows, or lull the tempest, by your single fiat, as to stay the existence of parties in this Government, whilst politicians have ambition to gratify and distinctions to hope for.

Sir, I have as ardent a love for the preservation of the Union of these States as can inspire the heart of any gentleman whose voice has been heard in the Senate. I

‡ The proceedings of this anti-caucus committee demonstrably prove what I have elsewhere said, that the destruction of the federal party, and its amalgamation with the republican, instead of a blessing to this Union, may yet prove its overthrow. The evidence of the abuse of power in the hands of the republicans, when the check of the federal party was destroyed, is to be drawn from the following dates and facts:

On the 14th of October, 1824, this anti-caucus committee of twenty-four made their report, that it was inexpedient to meet in caucus. They showed, at that date, that there were two hundred and sixteen republicans, and only forty-five federalists. This put it beyond all doubt that the republicans, two hundred and sixteen, to forty-five federalists, had the whole power and control of legislation in their own hands.

On the 30th of April, 1824, only two months and a half after the anti-caucus report, and during the same session, Congress enacted a law—

"To procure the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, upon the subject of roads and canals."—[See 7th vol. Laws U. S. page 333.]

This law is without limitation in its duration, and gives to the President unlimited powers over the whole subject; and the unlimited power to appoint as many officers of the engineer corps as he may think proper.† And these engineers have swarmed in every part of the Union ever since. Five republican members from South Carolina, all of whom were opposed to a caucus, voted for that law.

On the 22d May, 1824, a little better than three months after the anti-caucus report, and during the same session, Congress enacted a law to amend the several acts "imposing duties on imports."—[See 7th vol. Laws U. S. page 268.]

This law fixed upon us the most grievous burthen that any portion of the people of this Union ever endured. No member from South Carolina voted for this law. But what is the difference? Without the Tariff, Internal Improvement would expire; and vice versa.

Of the two hundred and sixteen republican members, the report of the anti-caucus committee says one hundred and eighty-one were opposed to a caucus. If one hundred and eighty-one republicans were associated to oppose the caucus, could not the same one hundred and eighty-one republicans have prevented the enactment of these ruinous laws? If they were republican for one purpose, they were certainly republican for every other purpose.—Note by Mr. S.

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[FEB. 27, MARCH 1, 1830]

am sensible of its worth; I know its price was the blood of our ancestors; I know it swells our importance abroad, as a member of the family of nations; and I know the lustre it will shed upon the character of republics. And, as a testimony of my fervent desire for its long duration, I will beg leave to borrow the brilliant apostrophe of the gentleman from Massachusetts, if he will permit me; and "when my eyes shall be turned to behold, for the last time, the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining on the broken and dishonored fragments of" the constitution of my country, once theegis of our rights and the palladium of our liberty; but let them rather behold that constitution regulating the enactments of Congress according to its delegated and limited powers, dispensing equal laws and equal rights, according to its well defined and well digested provisions, to every portion of the people of these States. I shall then die content, under a full belief that this Union may be as durable as time; and that the Union can only be broken up by the violation of the sacred principles of that constitution.

Mr. HAYNE rose, and said he should certainly not go into the examination of any of the questions which had been discussed by his colleague. I rise [said Mr. H.] merely for the purpose of correcting an entire misapprehension on his part, of my views in relation to the public lands. My colleague supposes me to have contended that the public lands ought, at once, to be given to the States, without any regard to the public debt, for which they stand pledged; or if sold, that they should be sold merely at a nominal price, which ought not to go into the treasury. Sir, my colleague is altogether mistaken throughout, as to the scope and character of my remarks on this subject. I have not contended that the lands are to be given away; I have not contended for a sale at a nominal price, much less that the proceeds of such sale should not go into the public treasury. My views, sir, were these: that before any final disposition could be made of the public lands, "the public debt, for which they have been solemnly pledged to the public creditors, must be first paid." "This done, sir, [I said] I would suggest for consideration, whether it would not be sound policy to adopt a system of measures, looking to the final relinquishment of the lands, to the States in which they lie; giving up the plan of using them forever, as a fund, either for revenue or distribution; ceasing to hug them as a great treasure; renouncing the idea of administering them with a view to regulate and control the industry and population of the States, or of keeping in subjection and dependence the States, or the people of any portion of the Union. The task will be comparatively easy of striking out a plan for the final adjustment of the land question, on just and equitable principles. Perhaps, sir, the lands ought not to be entirely relinquished to any State, until she shall have made considerable advancement in population and settlement. Ohio has probably already reached that condition. The relinquishment may be made by a sale to the State, at a fixed price, which I will not say should be nominal; but certainly I should not be disposed to fix the amount so high as to keep the States, for any length of time, in debt to the United States." "In short, that the lands ought not to be kept and retained forever as a great treasure, but that they should be administered chiefly with a view to the creation, within reasonable periods, of great and flourishing communities, to be formed into free and independent States."

[After a few words from Mr. SMITH, in rejoinder, the debate here closed for this day.]

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1830.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. FOOT.

Mr. GRUNDY addressed the Senate till the hour of adjournment.

MONDAY, MARCH 1, 1830.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. FOOT, in relation to future surveys and sales of the public lands.

Mr. GRUNDY concluded his speech; which is as follows:

So long, sir, as this debate was confined to the subject matter of the resolution upon your table, I felt but little inclination to embark in it, [said Mr. G.] and was still less inclined to do so, while Senators were engaged in defending themselves and their respective States against imputations supposed to have been cast upon them. The field of discussion, however, has been greatly enlarged, and now embraces within its limits many subjects of deep interest to the people of the United States. Upon some of these topics I have opinions to express, and replies to make to some of the arguments of those who have preceded me; and shall also find it necessary to present answers to allegations, unfounded allegations, which have been made by others. I have no unkind feelings to gratify or accusations to make; yet I must be permitted to declare my opinions frankly and fully, and to meet what has been advanced by others, fearlessly and unmoved.

I am gratified, greatly gratified, at the spectacle which this debate exhibits; a majority—an administration majority of an American Senate, contending against constructive Federal powers, and all those doctrines which are calculated to increase the authority of the men now in office, holding in their hands the reins of this Government. This augurs well: it has never occurred in the history of this Government but once before; and, of the men who acted in the civil revolution of 1801, only two remain in our national councils. It has been the good fortune of the senior Senators of Maryland and Louisiana [Messrs. SMITH and LIVINGSTON] alone to have acted a distinguished part at both periods; and it is fortunate for this Senate to have both these political Nestors to direct its deliberations in the great effort now making to bring back the Government to its true, original, republican principles.

According to the order of this debate, the first inquiry is, what is the true policy of this Government in relation to its public domain? Or, in other words, what disposition should be made of the unsold land in the Western States? I wholly differ in opinion with some Western politicians, who insist that those lands belong to the respective States in which they are situated, by virtue of their sovereignty. Of this I will speak hereafter. I confess myself alarmed at another opinion still more prevalent, and more likely to prevail, which is, that these lands belong to all the States, and should be divided amongst them in proportion to their representation in the other House. Sir, these lands belong to the Federal Government. In that character they were acquired, partly by gift, partly by purchase. The States, as such, have no interest in, or claim upon, them; and if my opinion would be effectual, the States should not receive them, were the General Government to act so improvidently and unwisely as to make the offer. I am unwilling to see twenty-four sovereign States fed upon the crumbs that fall from the Federal table. I never wish to see the States pensioners upon the bounty of the General Government. When gentlemen say they wish the States to be independent, I invite them to adopt principles, and pursue a course, calculated to preserve their independence. If the States are to remain independent, it can only be effected by their relying upon their own resources, and exerting their own energies; and in never looking to this Government for supplies which can be furnished or withheld at its pleasure. If, from the fullness of the treasury of the General Government, arising from its revenue, its lands, or otherwise, the States are to receive their respective dividends, how can it be expected that the encroachments and usurpations of this Government are to be resisted? As men of experience and observation,

MARCH 1, 1830.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

I ask Senators, most of whom have served in the State Legislatures, whether that firm and manly stand will be taken in the States, which may be proper and necessary, when thereby the risk is encountered of stopping the current of Federal munificence? The exercise of the taxing power is always reluctantly resorted to, and public men avoid it at all times when practicable; and it will require great firmness in a State Legislature, when it shall come in conflict with the General Government, to assert the rights of the State, and be thereby compelled to perform this odious and unpopular duty. It is with governments as it is with individuals. If one man is in the constant habit of receiving benefits from another, the former loses his independence, and the will of the benefactor becomes the will of him who receives the benefactions. Another objection is still stronger; the stability and permanency of our institutions depend on the people understanding the operations of them. The idea that the General Government shall collect the money and transfer it to the States, has a tendency to complicate the operations of the machinery of Government, and place it beyond the comprehension and understanding of the community. By this means the greatest security for a faithful administration of public affairs is lost; although the public burthens are precisely the same in the one case as in the other, and the people taxed in the same degree. All respect for the State Governments must be annihilated, when it shall be seen in practice that the means of carrying on the State Governments are furnished by the General Government. Whenever this state of things shall occur, the State Governments will be put down, as useless and expensive institutions; and a General Government, with unlimited powers, will be established. I am aware that the reception of the money by the States would be a pleasant operation; it would be sweet to the taste, but bitterness and death would follow.

The General Government owned these lands before the States existed in which they are situated, and they have neither bought nor paid for them. Their only plea is the right which sovereignty confers. Let it be remembered, that the very same act which creates their sovereignty secures the title of these lands to the General Government. What justice, then, could there be in these new States saying, we will enjoy all the benefits and advantages accruing to us from a solemn compact with the General Government, but will not comply with the stipulations on our part? I will not permit myself to believe that the new States would do such an act if they possessed the power, whatever some of their politicians may say to the contrary. They would thereby lose all claim to that character which is based on justice, and a punctual compliance with engagements, and justly incur the charge of Punic faith.

It seems to me that the Senate must be satisfied that neither the States in which the lands are situated, nor the States generally, have an ownership in these lands. The General Government is the only rightful proprietor.

The inquiry then presents itself, to what objects should these lands, or their proceeds, be applied? The General Assembly of Virginia, in their act of cession, declare that it is made for the purpose of paying the public debt, and for the public benefit; and Congress is required, and actually engaged, to encourage and promote the settlement of these lands, and form new States, whenever the population would justify it.

Forty-eight millions of the public debt remain unpaid. This is an incumbrance on the public domain, a lien which should be removed before the fund is applied to other purposes. Being thus applied, you comply with the express intention of Virginia when she made the donation, and the pledge given by the old Congress at the time of its reception. By doing this, the wish and intention of all the parties will be faithfully complied with.

It has been suggested by the gentleman from Massachusets [Mr. WEBSTER] that he would be willing to see the public debt discharged, merely because it was a debt, but he felt no particular concern about it. I differ from that honorable Senator on this subject. I feel great anxiety and solicitude to see the public debt extinguished, and will assign my reasons for it. In the first place, it will manifest not only an ability, but a willingness, on the part of the Government, to comply punctually with all its engagements. This will promote and establish public credit, which adds greatly to the strength and power of a nation. In the next place, it will lessen the public burthens, and relieve the labor and industry of the country from the payment of an annual tax of fourteen millions of dollars. Instead of a revenue of twenty-four millions, which is now paid, ten millions will be sufficient for all the purposes of carrying on this Government. Then a fixed and settled policy can be adopted. It can then be decided whether one portion of this community is to be taxed, and severely taxed, to enable another portion to keep competitors out of our markets. I did not intend to say any thing upon the tariff on this occasion, but my remarks having led me to that subject, I will say a few words in relation to it. Can its advocates believe that a tariff will continue long in this country, of a character which shall deprive the labor of one part of the country of its just profits, and confer them on another? Surely, the moral sense of this community will rise up in opposition to it.

When it shall be seen that the Government needs only ten millions of dollars annually, a tax of twenty-four millions will not be submitted to. My friend from New Jersey [Mr. DICKINSON] tells us he has a specific for this evil—an infallible cure for this disease, or malady; which is, an annual distribution of the surplus revenue among the States. I ask him to reflect again upon this subject, and see whether there is not great danger of violating the principles of both policy and justice by the course he recommends. If the money is to be collected by the Government, and then returned to the same people from whom it was received in the first instance, you have gone through an operation of collecting and returning to its rightful owners, money not needed by the Government; and you have lost, in commissions and failures of public officers, to a great amount; and you are at the point from which you set out, except that you have wasted much of the public treasure. But suppose you collect the money chiefly from one part or section of the country, (as is the fact at present) and divide it equally amongst all; are you not practising great injustice upon that portion from which the tax has been levied? Gentlemen need not flatter themselves that a majority of the American people will long permit injustice to be practised upon any portion of this community. Let me not be misunderstood. I would not tear off the tariff if I could, thereby placing the manufacturing institutions of this country at the mercy of foreign Governments or foreign manufacturers. My wish is to see it modified, so as to protect manufactories which have grown up under the faith of our laws, and at the same time remove oppression from others. This is practicable: it cannot be that the oppression of any portion of this happy land is necessary for the security and protection of another.

Farther, the speedy extinction of the public debt is calculated, more than any thing that can be done, at this period, to increase the respectability and moral influence of this Government, both at home and abroad. This done, we shall be the wonder of an admiring and astonished world. We cannot ourselves tell how it has happened, that, in little more than half a century, three millions of people, scattered along the Atlantic border, have grown to be so great and mighty a nation, extending from the sea-board near two thousand miles to the West, and from the Northern Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico; containing within its limits upwards of twelve millions of inhabitants. Louisiana, large enough for an empire, purchased; the Floridas acquired; a respectable navy; the extensive sea-board fortified; the Indian title to millions of acres of land extinguished; two wars with the most powerful nation on the earth successfully prosecuted and honorably terminated; and, after all this, not one cent of the expenditures incurred remains unpaid! Will not all mankind say, if this new people and this new Government have achieved all this in their infancy, what can they not do in the days of their maturity? Sir, foreign nations will entertain a higher respect for our country, and the causes of future wars will be diminished.

With regard to some modification of the existing land laws, I am perfectly willing to unite in any scheme of graduation of prices which shall make a distinction between lands of different qualities or values, and shall not, at the same time, retard the sales, and thereby procrastinate the payment of the public debt. Towards one class of individuals, the actual settlers, I am willing to go as far as any man, in or out of this Senate. I am anxious to place it in their power to become freeholders—to have an interest in the soil. It is good policy to convert Eastern tenants into Western freeholders. If the suggestions made were well founded, that some Eastern politicians desired to prevent their citizens from emigrating to the West, in order that they might be retained in their manufacturing establishments, all such efforts would be vain and ineffectual. You might as well attempt to stop the torrents rushing from a thousand hills, as to arrest the tide of emigration, which is rising higher and higher, and pouring and spreading itself over the vast valley of the Mississippi. It is the course of nature and of man, and no human legislation can stay it. It is the duty of man to pursue his own happiness. Competence and independence are main ingredients in human happiness, and no portion of our citizens will be restrained from going to a land of ease and plenty if within their reach. I regretted to hear remarks made by the Senator from New Hampshire, derogating from the merits of settlers on the public lands. He considered them as trespassers and intruders, and meriting punishment as infractors of the public law. Sir, they are acting on the original principle upon which titles to lands were first acquired; they are mixing their labor with the soil, and improving its condition; they are adding to its value, and increasing the wealth of the country; and I can tell that Senator, that, when the country shall be in adversity and peril, these men, now reviled, will prove as prompt to step forward and defend it, as any other portion of our citizens. I refer to the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. BELL] not to my friend near me, [Mr. WOODBURY] who speaks in different tones; his voice falls, at all times, pleasantly on my ear.

I have already voted to give a preference to occupants now in possession, and am at all times ready to do so. This, however, falls far short of my favorite system of disposing of the public lands. I would not confine the provisions of the law or preference to settlers now seated upon the land, but would act prospectively. I would by no means limit the right of preference to the few who are now in the occupation of the public lands, but say to all the citizens of the United States, that any of them who would settle on the surveyed public land, should be entitled to a quarter section, or one hundred and sixty acres, at a reduced price, say fifty cents per acre or less; provided they would remain on the land two years, and raise two crops upon it. You would, by this course, enable men, who cannot acquire lands in the old States, to secure for themselves a competence and independence; a wife, a home, and child to prattle on his knee, would be the lot of many who are now destined to drudge on through life in poverty and want. Rich communities would grow up in the distant wilderness, and the national wealth and strength be greatly increased. After all the land of value shall have been disposed of, and nothing left but the refuse, as my colleague, [Mr. CROCKETT] of the other House, calls it, let the Government relinquish the remainder to the States in which it is situated; not upon the principle of a gift, creating an obligation and state of dependence, but because it is of little or no value to the General Government, and is a matter of convenience to the States; thereby enabling them to devise some means of disposing of it, so as to subject it to the taxing power of the States. This, in my judgment, is the best mode of disposing of the public lands; and I invite gentlemen on all sides, who have professed so much devotion to the interest of the West, to unite in maturing and adopting the system I have suggested, and thereby promote the best interests of the Western country and of the nation at large.

I will now proceed [said Mr. G.] to an examination of another subject, upon which a great diversity of opinion seems to prevail—I mean the powers of the State and Federal Governments. As to the true division or distribution of their powers, no difficulty exists so long as we speak in general terms; differences of opinion arise when we come to act on particular cases: at present, we have no case before the Senate, and are only discussing the subject for the purpose of ascertaining the true rule by which to test cases as they arise; and in the event Congress should transcend the limits or boundaries of its constitutional powers, to ascertain where we are to look for the ultimate corrective tribunal.

The States existed prior to this Government. Each of them possessed all the rights and powers which appertain to sovereign and independent nations. For all the purposes of self-government, no want of power, or the means of using it, was felt by any of these communities. Life, liberty, reputation, and property, all found an ample protection in the State Governments. If any Internal Improvement were necessary, within its limits, the sovereign power of the State, having entire and uncontrolled jurisdiction, could cause it to be undertaken and effected. For none of these purposes or objects was there a defect of competency in the State Governments. There were objects, however, of high importance, to which the States, separately, were not equal or adequate to provide. These are specified in the recommendatory letter issued by the convention, and signed by General Washington, which accompanied the constitution, when presented to the old Congress for its consideration. The language is, "The friends of our country have long seen and desired, that the power of making war, peace, and treaties; that of levying money and regulating commerce, and the correspondent executive and judicial authorities, should be fully and effectually vested in the General Government of the Union." Here is an enumeration of the objects which made it necessary to establish this Government; and when we are called on to decide whether a subject be within our powers, we ought not to lose sight of the purposes for which the Government was created. When it is recollected that all the powers now possessed by the General and State Governments belonged originally to the latter, and that the former is constructed from grants of power yielded up by the State Governments, the fair and just conclusion would be, that no other power was conferred, except what was plainly and expressly given. But if doubt could exist, the 10th article in the amendments to the constitution settles this question. It declares that "The powers not delegated to the United States by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." The conclusion hence arises, that this Government is one of limited; delegated powers, and can only act on subjects expressly placed under its control by the constitution, and upon such other matters as may be necessarily and properly within the sphere of its action, to enable it to carry the enumerated and specified powers into execution, and without which, the powers granted would be inoperative. This I understand to be the good old republican doctrine, and by it I will endeavor to regulate my conduct.

In cases of disagreement between the Federal and State Governments, as to their respective powers, who is to decide? This is the question I propose briefly to examine. In cases of doubtful character, no question will probably arise, because no court, State or Federal, will declare a law unconstitutional, unless it is clearly and manifestly so. This is the rule of decision avowed by all the high Judicial tribunals of the country; nor will any State act differently. I admit that the Supreme Court is the final arbiter in all cases in law and equity, arising under the constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance of it. Still, the case put by Mr. Madison, in his report to the Virginia Assembly, in the year 1799, is not included. The alien and sedition laws, the subjects on which he was then acting, were believed and declared by him and the Virginia Assembly, to be a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of powers, not granted by the compact or constitution. In such a case as that, I ask the Senate, shall one party decide? It will be readily granted, that, in settling questions of right or power between different nations, one party ought not to be the exclusive judge; otherwise, so strong is the love of dominion and rule, it will include within its grasp all the power possessed by both. This is the very principle for which gentlemen contend, when the subject is stripped of a fallacy, which at first obstructs the mental vision of the inquirer after truth. Gentlemen seem to consider the Supreme Court of the United States as a separate, distinct tribunal, erected by all the parties concerned, and as dependent on one party as on the other. Not so; it is a portion or part of one of the parties, created by the legislative and executive branches of the General Government, and responsible alone to that Government. The Federal Judiciary, although the tenure of office be during good behavior, is greatly dependent on the other branches of the General Government. Burthens may be imposed upon them, and their labors so increased, as to expel them from the bench, from an inability to discharge all the duties required by law. I name this, because an effort is now making to compel the present judges to perform their official duties in six additional States—a thing wholly impracticable.

In every contest for power, there would exist in the Judiciary the same motives to lead it astray, as would exist in the other departments, with this difference—they would be stronger, because the judges hold their offices by a tenure of greater duration. If the position of Gentlemen be well founded, then the State Governments have been guilty of the folly and weakness of creating a Government which can adjudge away all their sovereign rights and powers; a creature competent to the destruction of its creators; and all this, by the easiest operations imaginable. A case is presented to the court by the Attorney General, an opinion is written on a few sheets of paper, and Mr. Peters (the reporter) is directed to put it in his book, and forthwith twenty-four sovereign and independent States are prostrated and destroyed. Sir, much as I love peace and quietness, before I witness this, I desire to hear more clamor about it than would arise from this silent, sapping, and undermining procedure. I am arguing upon the principle, without reference to the judges now sitting under this Senate chamber; towards each of them I entertain a high respect; and should any attempt be made affecting the independence of the Judiciary, I will go as far as he who goes farthest in its defence.

If those from whom I differ be right, the only security the States have, is the integrity of a majority of seven men; and as the constitution did not direct what number of judges should constitute the Supreme Court, one could have been placed there; and upon his will alone, according to the argument on the other side, would depend the fate of twenty-four sovereign States.

In all questions of meum and tuum, embraced within its constitutional jurisdiction, this court is the supreme tribunal, and incidentally, between individuals, it must decide upon all questions necessary to enable it to come to a result or final determination; and the decision will be binding upon the parties. This, however, by no means proves that the court can decide upon the sovereign rights of the States, so as to affect them. The gentlemen have been requested by my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. ROWAN] to produce an instance in which sovereignty has submitted itself to any judicial tribunal. The very act of doing so implies dependence and inferiority; and that government which admits its adversary to decide in such a case, acknowledges that it is not sovereign and independent. Mr. Madison, who understood the constitution and structure of the Government as well as any man that ever lived, was of opinion that the Federal Judiciary possessed no such power. Mr. Jefferson, the great teacher of republicanism, throughout his whole life contended against it; and, fortunately for the American people, their opinions are recorded in our national archives, and will be preserved for the benefit of those who are to succeed us. The necessary result is, that the power of deciding finally and conclusively does not exist in either Government, or any department of either. What, then, is to be done if Congress pass an act beyond the limits of its constitutional powers, and it is found to operate oppressively, say upon Virginia? I name this old, leading, champion State, for the purpose of illustrating my argument more clearly. Shall Virginia submit? No. She is oppressed—unconstitutionally oppressed. The General Government has declared in all its departments that the act is binding. The Legislature of Virginia is of a different opinion. Has she no right to say to the General Government we did not give up this power which you have exercised? May she not say it is an authority you have usurped? Such language has been held—it was done by Virginia and Kentucky, by their resolutions in 1798 and 1799; and it produced the desired effect. Those who had exercised unconstitutional powers were put down, and the administration of Mr. Jefferson succeeded. This was an appeal to the intelligence and patriotism of the nation, to correct the evil through the medium of the elective franchise. It prevailed, and will always prevail, unless an interest exist in the majority at variance with the rights and interest of the minority. When that is the case, it may happen that a sense of justice will be too weak to produce a repeal of the unconstitutional measure. What then? Shall Virginia throw herself out of the Union? No. One set of agents employed to act in the Federal Government have asserted their authority and jurisdiction over certain subjects, and they insist on their right to do so. Another, acting in the States, insist that the agents of the General Government have transcended their authority, engrafted on the constitution provisions not originally contained in it, and are exercising the reserved powers of the State. It becomes a mere dispute among agents; the employers, the masters, the real sovereigns, have not decided it. In this state of things, shall Virginia submit to be despoiled of her sovereignty? Sir, she will not, by tame submission, surrender her high political character and pre-eminence: rather than do this, her Madisons and Monroes would forget their years, and mingle again in the political strife; her Giles would lay aside the crutches of decrepitude; and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HOLMES] would again hear the keen, cutting voice of the Roanoke orator, dividing and separating, even unto the joints and marrow.

If I am to understand any Senator as saying that a State Legislature can nullify and make void an act of Congress, so far as to prevent its operation within its limits, I dissent from him. The Federal constitution was not received or adopted by the Legislatures of the States; the members are not elected for such high purposes. The ambition of a few aspiring men might mislead the Legislature, when called on to act suddenly and unexpectedly. Let the injured and oppressed State, then, assume its highest political attitude—a convention in the State, for the purpose of deciding whether the great fundamental law, which unites and binds the States together, has been violated, by Congress having exercised powers reserved to the States, and not delegated to the General Government. If a false clamor has been raised, this measure will put it down. In every State there is a division among politicians, and the minority are only waiting for an opportunity to put the majority in the wrong. The people being called on to act in this solemn manner, will put the whole intelligence of the community into action. The aged, the wise, the experienced, well tried friends of the country will be called into the public service. Such men will not lightly pronounce an act of Congress unconstitutional and void; but should they upon full consideration so declare, how will the question then stand? If the State possesses the power to act as I have shown, the necessary consequence is, that the act of Congress must cease to operate in the State; and Congress must acquiesce, by abandoning the power, or obtain an express grant from the great source from which all its powers are drawn. The General Government would have no right to use force. It would be a glaring absurdity to suppose that the State had the right to judge of the constitutionality of an act of the General Government, and at the same time to say that Congress had the right to enforce a submission to the act. This would involve a palpable contradiction. This may be illustrated by reference to the powers of the Supreme Court in analogous cases. All admit that this high tribunal has the right, in a case properly before it, and within its jurisdiction, to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional; the effect of which is, to render the act inoperative, not only in one State, but in all. In this case, Congress is obliged to acquiesce and abandon the power, or obtain an express grant from the original source, after the manner already stated. No force can be applied to give effect to the act thus declared void by the Supreme Court, or to compel it to change its decision. But gentlemen, instead of meeting our arguments fairly, exclaim that such a power on the part of the State is inconsistent with the existence of the General Government, and is placing twenty-three States at the mercy of one, and that the Union, by such an act, would be dissolved. I cannot but think that all such objections arise from an imperfect view of our admirable system of Government. They originate in a supposition that Congress possesses an independent and uncontrollable power, which is unknown to our system. If the gentlemen will but advert to the fifth article of the constitution, they will find a redeeming power—a power above all others; which can mould the constitution, and define, anew, the relations between the State and the General Governments: I mean the constitutional number of States. This is not a mere dormant power. The mode in which it is to be called into action is expressly laid down, and, when properly invoked, will at all times prove adequate to save this glorious system of ours from disorder and anarchy. Whenever a conflict, such as I have described, arises between one of the States, acting in its sovereign capacity, and the General Government, it is to this high arbiter, (a convention of the States) the parties must resort, and not to the Supreme Court, the creature of one of the parties. But who is to make the appeal? Surely the party claiming to exercise the power, and which alone possesses the means of making it. To require the oppressed State to do it, would be absurd. The constitution provides two modes of amendment: one, when two thirds of both Houses of Congress shall propose amendments; the second, when two thirds of the Legislatures of the State shall make application to Congress to call a convention for proposing amendments. In either case, three-fourths of the States are required to ratify; and the agency of Congress is necessary in both. On Congress, then, is the burthen of making the appeal, on the ground that it claims the exercise of the power, and because, alone, it is possessed of the means. It cannot be considered unreasonable that a State, which has declared, in the most solemn manner, its reserved rights to have been violated, should possess the power of compelling the General Government to make an appeal to the source from which all its powers are derived. It was called into existence by three-fourths of the States, and can exercise no power, without usurpation, which has not been granted. What can be more rational? What more consistent with the spirit of our system, than where there is a conflict between a sovereign State (a party to the compact) and the General Government, as to the powers which have been yielded to the latter, that it should be compelled to decide the question by an appeal to the source of all its powers? I do not hesitate to say that the power on the part of the States to compel such an appeal is indispensable to the existence of their sovereignty, and to the preservation of their reserved rights. Without it, the General Government, in its practical operation, would be an unlimited, consolidated Government, notwithstanding the limitations imposed by the provisions of the constitution. Its construction of the constitution would be the constitution. Those who know the force and influence of construction, how it can pervert the plainest import of words, when under the influence of self interest, well understand the fearful changes it is capable of producing. If there be no check, an interested majority, using the powers of the General Government, which were given for the protection and benefit of all, as the instrument of aggrandizing themselves at the expense of the minority, may, by construction, gradually undermine and render obsolete the sacred provisions of this instrument. We already see fearful symptoms of encroachment, which no patriot can look at without dismay, and which, if persevered in, can only be arrested by an exercise of the power for which I contend. The Supreme Court is wholly inadequate. If three-fourths of the States shall not concur in admitting the contested power, or shall not pronounce that it already exists, Congress will be constrained to abandon the exercise of it, inasmuch as no new power can be granted without such concurrence. The decision of a less number ought not to be obligatory, where a State has solemnly pronounced that such a grant of authority was never made. But suppose three-fourths of the States decide the question against the complaining State, then acquiescence becomes a duty, and it must submit; or a state of things arises not provided for by the constitution, on the consequences of which I will not dwell. The doctrine for which I contend is not of recent origin. I am merely an humble disciple of an old school, recalling it to public view. Mr. Jefferson long since advanced the opinion I now advocate, and in his letter to Judge Johnson, of June, 1823, he remarks, in reference to the following expression, used by another distinguished citizen, that "there must be an ultimate arbiter somewhere," "True," [said Mr. Jefferson] "there must; but does that prove it is in either party? The ultimate arbiter is the people of the Union, assembled by their deputies in convention, at the call of Congress, or of two-thirds of the States. Let them decide to which they mean to give an authority, claimed by two of their organs. And it has been the peculiar wisdom and felicity of our constitution to have provided this peaceable appeal, where that of other nations is at once to force."

Sir, [said Mr. G.] the subject of slavery has been introduced into this debate. This is charged upon the slaveholding States by some as a misfortune; by others as a crime. It may be the former, but cannot be the latter. Were the question submitted to me, whether slavery should be introduced, I should, unhesitatingly, decide against it: for such is my devotion to liberty and the rights of man, that I would have no agency in subjecting the person or will of one man to the dominion of another. Still, I am not prepared to condemn it as a crime, or charge those who own them, under existing circumstances, with doing wrong. All history speaks of its existence from the earliest ages. Homer, the father of poets, makes Hector tell Andromache, his wife, if Troy shall fall, she will draw water at the well of some victor chief. The Phœnicians, Egyptians, Carthaginians, Greeks, and Romans, all had slaves; with them the masters possessed the ius vitæ et necis—a state of slavery not tolerated in any of the United States: for, in all the States, laws are in force requiring the masters to treat their slaves with humanity and kindness. We all know there is nothing in the Old Testament condemning it, nor in the New. I admit that the commission of the Prince of Peace was to the hearts of men, and it was no part of his office to change governments or political institutions. Yet one thing ought to be admitted on the other side, that no vice or sinful practice escaped his notice and animadversion. He came to reprove the world of all sin. Seeing that slavery existed at the time of his appearance amongst men, and within his knowledge, he enjoined it on slaves to be obedient to their masters, and did not command masters to liberate their slaves. I think the inference is clear and conclusive, that it is not sinful to hold slaves; nor does it present any obstacle in the way that leads to everlasting happiness. The error, and the great error of this subject, is not attributable to the slave-holder, but to those who produced this state of things. While England's most inspired poet, of his day, was saying, in the language of enchantment,

"I would not have a slave to till my ground,
 "To carry me, fan me while I sleep,
 "And tremble when I wake, for all the wealth
 "That sinews bought and sold have ever earned:
 "Not dear as freedom is, and, in my heart's
 "Just estimation, prized above all price,
 "I had much rather be myself the slave,
 "And wear the bonds, than fasten them on him."

While her orators were pouring forth similar language in the Senate and the Forum: even at that very time, with the connivance, and by the authority and direction of the Government, her subjects were engaged on the shores of Africa, tearing asunder all the ligaments which bind the husband to the wife and the parent to the child! And why was this done? Not to transport them to Great Britain. No. "Slaves cannot breathe in England; they touch our country, and their shackles fall." This is the language of poetry and fancy. What is the language of truth and fact? Their labor was not needed in Great Britain; already the population was so great as to be fed with difficulty, therefore were they sent to the British West Indies and her American plantations, as if this mitigated the offence committed against high Heaven and the rights of man. It was not until the year 1806 that this traffic was put a stop to by the British Government. It was the last act of Mr. Fox's public life. But let us come nearer home. When the history of this unhappy race shall be fairly written, the name of no Marylander, no Virginian, no Carolinian, (North or South) no Georgian, no man of the West, (for West there was none at that day) will be found inscribed in that chapter which is written in tears and blood. It was the citizens of some of the Eastern States who carried on this traffic. My friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ROBBINS] can tell you more upon this subject than I know. I name not this by way of reproach on the great body of the population. I have no doubt the moral sense of the community was against it; but the avarice and cupidity of some of their citizens prevailed over considerations of justice and humanity. I am no advocate for slavery. I wish success to the exertions of the philanthropists of all the States, who are engaged in ameliorating the condition of, and laboring to restore, this unhappy race to the land of their fathers; and should another Moses rise up, and lead them peaceably to a distant land of liberty and plenty, I would not join in the pursuit to bring them back. What is our condition? We have the evil, and how can we get rid of it? That free people of color cannot live amongst us, is demonstrated by what is seen in Ohio and the other non slave-holding Western States. I have in my hand the memorial of two thousand free people of color, resident in Ohio, praying this Congress to provide them funds to enable them to remove to Canada, because they cannot remain in the State of Ohio, on account of the severity of the laws imposed on them. I do not censure the State of Ohio for the rigor of its statutes, because a community has a right to provide for its own safety. It proves, however, that these general notions about the liberation of slaves are idle and visionary, when attempts are made to reduce them to practice. The State of Indiana has forwarded its memorial, asking Congress for aid to remove the free people of color, now in that State, to Liberia. This shows that those who have tried the experiment of having free people of color amongst them, have become weary of it. I doubt whether this project of a settlement in Canada will succeed. I am not sure that the descendants of Africa can grow and thrive in a cold, frozen region. If they can, may not all the horrid scenes, so ably portrayed by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. SMITH] occur? May not their present advocates and their children have to meet them in a very different character than that of friends? This, I fear, will happen, whenever Great Britain shall order it to be so.

We have heard much upon the subject of removals from office. Some gentlemen have charged the administration with proscription; and one Senator, [Mr. HOLMES] still bolder than the rest, has charged it with "glutting its vengeance" upon its enemies. I like not this predatory warfare. I now challenge gentlemen to come out boldly, and discuss this subject with us freely and frankly, not calling to their aid passion or feeling. These are poor auxiliaries in inquiries after truth. In this way I will endeavor to examine this subject, and afterwards will make some remarks specially for the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HOLMES.] The question, as insisted on by the other side, is, that the Senate has the constitutional right to examine into and judge of the propriety of removals from office, and to control the Executive in the discharge of this branch of his duty. We say the Senate possesses no such authority, and that our power is confined to the question of fitness or unfitness of the persons nominated to succeed. I think I have stated the matter in difference fairly, and will proceed to its discussion. This is a subject of great delicacy. It not only relates to the powers of the President, but the powers of this House. If we decide that the President has not this power, we determine in favor of our own. We should approach this subject with great caution, lest we be misled by the idea which sometimes influences the human mind, that power is always dangerous in the hands of others, though entirely harmless in our own; and more especially should we act warily, when we recollect that, for forty years, ever since this Government went into operation, the practice we contend for has prevailed, bottomed upon a legislative construction of the constitution, made by the House of Representatives, the Senate, and President of the United States, in the year 1789. If those who insist on the power of the Senate are not warranted by the constitution, they are guilty of a greater error than that of which they complain. They are attempting to usurp a power not given to them by the constitution. In the first place, we will examine who possesses this power of removal under the constitution.

The great, distinguishing, and characteristic principle in our institutions, State and Federal, is the separate, distinct, and independent existence of the different departments, Legislative, Judicial, and Executive; and on every question of this kind, reference should be had to this leading feature in our Government. In the first section of the second article of the constitution, it is provided that "the Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America," &c. Had nothing more been said in the constitution, all seem to admit that the power of appointment and removal would exclusively belong to the President as a branch of Executive authority, and to appertain to him as the Chief Magistrate of the nation. In the second section of the same article, his powers are enumerated, and appointment to office is one of them; but in making the appointment, he must obtain the advice and consent of the Senate. This constitutes an exception to the general rule; that the departments are to be separate and distinct; and there is wisdom in this provision. The framers of the constitution foresaw that all experience had proved, under this Government, that a President, with the best intentions, and anxious only to promote the general good, might make a selection of an individual, through want of correct information, who would be deficient in moral or intellectual worth. This has happened under every administration. When this occurs, and the name of the individual is placed before the Senate, a strict scrutiny is instituted; and if, upon examination, he is found unworthy, he is withdrawn by the President, or rejected by the Senate. In making this investigation into the character and qualifications of the individual nominated, the Senate has the aid of the Senators of the State in which he resides, who are generally acquainted, and know whether the President has been misled by information received from others. Thus far the constitution expressly authorizes the Senate to act in aid of, and in conjunction with, the President of the United States, and no farther. If further joint action were deemed proper, it could easily have been expressed.

Expressio unius est exclusio alterius.

Was there any necessity or propriety in giving the power now contended for to the Senate? If it can be shown that it would do injury, and destroy the harmonious operations of the Government, it ought not to be considered as existing in this body, unless clearly given.

Thus far we have considered the mode by which an individual gets into office. The question arises, how is he to be gotten out, and by whom? So soon as an Executive officer is appointed, he is placed under the immediate inspection and control of the President, who becomes intimately acquainted with his qualifications. Are his talents equal to his station? Has he integrity, industry, and all those other qualities, which will enable him to discharge his duties beneficially to the country? If so, the probability is strong in favor of his being retained, unless his place can be as well or better supplied. On the other hand, the President discovers a deficiency. It is his duty to remove him; and then, according to the argument on the other side, the case comes before the Senate for trial, I suppose. The Senate will not take the will of the President as the rule of its decision: for, if it should, no valuable purpose could be obtained by the action of the Senate. We are then to inquire whether this man shall be retained. We must not make a mockery of it; he must have a fair trial, and as necessary incidents to it, witnesses and counsel must be heard; and you thus place the Chief Magistrate of the country in the odious attitude of a public prosecutor, who may fail to make out his case, as nothing is more true than that a fact may exist to the satisfaction of all men, and yet not be provable before a judicial tribunal. Suppose the Senate should decide that the officer shall not be removed—say the Secretary of State. He is sent back as the first confidential adviser of the President, who has already pronounced him unworthy of confidence, and not fit to be trusted. What kind of a cabinet will you have, made up and forced to remain together, of such materials? Should the Secretary of the Treasury, in the absence of the Senate, be about to secrete all the money of the Government, will it do to wait to take the advice of the Senate as to his removal? In time of danger and contest, the Secretary of War is in the act of betraying the armies of the United States into the hands of the enemy: shall the President wait, and ask the Senate what is to be done? The Secretary of the Navy is about to deliver up the whole navy to the enemy: shall the President possess no power to displace him, but sit quietly by, until his advisers shall convene? Gentlemen say, the President ought to suspend the officer, and wait till the meeting of the Senate before the removal can be effected. I answer, that the power of suspension is not given by the constitution, and it will require a greater power to suspend and appoint another, to perform the duties in the interim, than to remove and supply the vacancy. If the Senate possesses this power, the existing practice of the Government must be changed; the Senate must always be in session. Our legislative functions must be abandoned; the whole time will be consumed in these investigations.

In the year 1789, this subject was taken up in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, upon a bill to establish the Department of State. The bill, as introduced, contained a provision giving the power of removal to the President. Upon a full discussion, the clause giving the power to remove was stricken out, upon the ground that the Chief Magistrate possessed the power under the constitution; and the bill was so changed as to acknowledge the pre-existing constitutional right, or power, in the President of the United States. The bill, thus modified, passed the House of Representatives and Senate, and was approved by General Washington, then President of the United States.

Let it be remembered that Mr. Madison, who is one of the best constitutional lawyers our country has ever produced, was a member of that Congress, and advocated the opinion for which I contend. He was a member of the convention that framed the constitution; had met the best talents of the country in the Virginia convention; had there discussed it in all its bearings and tendencies; and was then, in 1789, engaged in putting the Government into practical operation. Fisher Ames, whose fame and talents were great enough not only to make New England, but all America, feel proud that he was her citizen, advocated the opinion which prevailed.

In order that it might be understood how every President and Senate have thought and acted, from the commencement of the Government, I have looked into the Executive Journal, and find that every Chief Magistrate has acted upon this power as exclusively appertaining to him. I hold in my hands a copy of General Washington's commission to Mr. Jefferson, as Secretary of State, probably the first issued under the Government. That commission reads, that the office is to be held during the pleasure of the President of the United States. Also, the commission of Mr. Morris, as minister to France. Under every President, all commissions to executive officers have issued in the same way.

On the 3d of May, 1792, Edward Cross was removed, and Edward Wigglesworth was appointed collector at the port of Newburyport. The surveyor of the port of Plymouth, in North Carolina, was removed on the 19th of November, 1792. Mr. Carmichael, a foreign minister, was recalled—1 Executive Journal, p. 157. The collector of Yorktown was removed, as appears by Executive Journal, 1 vol. p. 165; a collector in Maryland, p. 172; a collector in Jersey, p. 173; a collector in South Carolina, p. 194; an inspector of revenue in Jersey, p. 176; an inspector of revenue in South Carolina, p. 203. These removals were made by General Washington, without consulting the Senate.

Mr. John Adams, immediately upon coming into office, dismissed the collector of New York. I name not this with a view to show his love of power; my feelings towards his memory are of a different kind; but for the purpose of showing, that he considered the power as so clearly existing, that no difficulty presented itself in the exercise of it. He also removed the collector in Charleston; a consul at Bordeaux, in France; a supervisor of the revenue in New Hampshire; a surveyor and inspector of the revenue in Virginia; the collector and inspector of Perth Amboy, (Jersey.) On the 12th May, 1800, Mr. Adams removed Mr. Pickering, then Secretary of State.

On the 6th of January, 1802, Mr. Jefferson nominated twenty-three persons to the Senate, to fill vacancies occasioned by removals made by him.

Mr. Madison removed the marshal of Georgia in 1809. On the 7th of March, 1814, Mr. Meigs was nominated to the Senate as Postmaster General; and a motion was made in the Senate, the object of which was, to ascertain from the President whether the office was vacant; and, if so, how it had become so? This proposition was negatived, and the nomination of Mr. Meigs approved.

Mr. Monroe, on the 12th December, 1817, nominated a consul, a receiver of public moneys, and a naval officer, at Wilmington, North Carolina, to supply vacancies occasioned by removals.

On the 5th of March, 1825, Mr. John Quincy Adams nominated a person as consul to fill a vacancy occasioned by a removal.

I have selected the cases referred to, for the purpose of showing that every President has exercised the power, now contested for the first time, since 1789; and no question was ever raised in the Senate, except upon the nomination of Mr. Meigs as Postmaster General; and then a majority of the Senate decided that the President could not be questioned upon the subject. When gentlemen contend against this power, and its exercise by the President, they seem to forget that the President is elected by the people, and is responsible to them; and his tenure of office is even shorter than our own. Besides, he must for a long time have stood before the public, and his conduct have been well examined. In this I think there is great security. If gentlemen will only exercise a little patience, in about two years and a-half they can try this question between the present Chief Magistrate and themselves, before the great American tribunal—THE PEOPLE.

So long as the present practice continues, you secure responsibility. Now, the President is looked to as accountable for the manner in which the whole Executive Department is conducted; and so long as he can alone remove the subordinate officers, this accountability is just; but the moment you force men, and continue them upon him, you furnish him with arguments which will exonerate him before the nation. May he not justly say, that he has no control over the inferior officers in the Executive Department; that his wishes are disregarded; and that he has no power to coerce those engaged in performing different duties, to execute his will? The state of insubordination which must follow, in practice, from the opinion contended for on the other side, will destroy all harmony and responsibility. If this power of controlling the Executive be assumed by the Senate, all the great powers of the Government will be concentrated in this body. Already we can prevent the Representative will from having effect, by negativing the bills of the other House; by the power of the Senate now contended for, we can bring the Executive to our feet.

Why is it that we hear so much complaint on the subject of removals from office? It is owing to a congeniality of feeling among office holders, State and Federal, throughout the whole country. They have a common interest in giving public opinion a direction in their own favor. Hence, whenever a removal takes place, all, or most of them, unite in condemning it, and they have succeeded in giving currency to the idea, that there is an actual ownership of office in the possessor; and they speak of their offices as they do of lands and other property, which they have bought and paid for; when, in truth, (I speak of Executive offices) the offices are created for the public benefit; and officers are employed as mere agents to perform the duties, so long as their services will be more advantageous to the public than others who can be employed; and so soon as others can be engaged who will, in the opinion of the appointing power, better promote the public interests, they ought to be displaced. Much has been said about turning men out who are unable to make a livelihood in any other way. When I hear this, I know that right has been done. In this wide extended country, furnishing such a variety of means for mental and manual employments, if an individual cannot live without office, I pronounce him unfit for that. If this idea, which is so earnestly pressed, is to prevail, your Government will become a parish for the support of prodigals and spendthrifts, who, having destroyed their own substance, will claim employment and support from the public treasury. It is also urged, that some are removed who have been many years in office. I think the error lies in furnishing this argument to them, by having retained them so long. The offices held by these individuals have either been advantageous and profitable, or otherwise. If the first, they ought not to monopolize the benefits for too great a period; they should give place to others, and not exclude all their contemporaries during their whole lives. If the office has been disadvantageous, they ought to be relieved from the burthen.

Gentlemen say it is an imputation on the character of an officer, to be deprived of his office. It is not so, except so far as officers have made it so, by pressing it as an argument for retaining their places. It only proves that there is another man as well qualified as he is to perform the duties; and that the Government can be administered without his aid.

After all, I consider this subject of removal, as a matter wholly between the Chief Magistrate and the people, with which the Senate has nothing to do, except to see that unworthy men are not appointed. How this power ought to be exercised is left to the Executive discretion, not to ours.

When Mr. Jefferson came into power, he found most of the officers filled by his political adversaries. He made a liberal use of this power, deeming its exercise healthful to the body politic. In answer to the New Haven remonstrance, which was against removals, he insists that, in order to secure a fair participation in the offices of the Government, he must use this power, as "few die (speaking of the officers) and none resign."

Were I to give my own opinion, as a citizen, I should say, that all who had prostituted their official influence and power for electioneering purposes, should be removed; likewise, all who loved their party more than their country, and had manifested such feelings and dispositions as made it apparent that they would rejoice at a failure of the administration, rather than its success. For a free, full, independent exercise of the right of suffrage, no man should be removed. These are my opinions, nor am I aware that the present administration has gone beyond them.

I now say to gentlemen, that all their charges of proscription and of glutting vengeance are but the nibbling of minnows at a mountain; they cannot remove one pebble from its base; and although I am aware that I can add nothing to the strength or beauty of that vast pillar of renown, which the great and patriotic actions of the present Chief Magistrate have reared up for him, I will say one thing to the gentleman from Maine, [MR. HOLMES.] When minor men shall die, and rot, and be forgotten, the name of Andrew Jackson will be held in reverence by all posterity, and his great actions will be a shining light, pointing out to benighted nations the way that leads to liberty and happiness.

Sir, gentlemen might as well attempt to raise a commotion in the ocean, by throwing pebbles on its surface, as to agitate the people of this nation on account of the removal of a few subordinate officers, who have held their offices already for too long a period, and whose places are well supplied. The same clamor was attempted to be raised against Mr. Jefferson; the groans and lamentations were as loud and long, and still no effect was produced to his disadvantage.

This debate [said Mr. G.] reminds me of the days of other years. My name has been introduced by my friends as the author of a sentiment or doctrine called moral treason. In 1813, when this country was in its greatest peril and danger; when the richest blood of the West had enriched the soil of Tippecanoe and the banks of the Raisin; when Daviess and Allen, and other patriots had fallen; when Winchester, Madison, Lewis, and Winder, were in captivity; when I saw the blood of my country issuing from every pore; I likewise saw a portion of our citizens discouraging enlistments, and dissuading capitalists from loaning their money to the Government. I did pronounce men, thus engaged, moral traitors. I argued thus: If an individual shall arm himself, and go over to the enemy, and stand in his ranks, he is guilty of treason under the constitution, because he has added the overt act to his treasonable intent. If the same individual shall not go over to the enemy, but remain with us, and employ his influence so as to prevent ten men from joining the standard of their country, he thereby does a greater injury to his Government; and his intention is as criminal as though he had been found in the ranks of the enemy. So I spoke of those who used their influence to prevent the loans of money which were necessary and indispensable to a successful prosecution of the war. I spoke as I then and still think. I re-affirm it. But I need not urge arguments to enforce a doctrine now admitted by all as canonical. Although, like other truths, it was disputed and questioned when first advanced, now none seem to controvert it. I must here express my regret that the gentleman from Maine, [MR. HOLMES] who then stood up in the Legislature of Massachusetts, and manfully, ably, and eloquently, contended for his country, and myself, should now be found on adverse sides. I then censured, but in far less degree, the opinion entertained and practised upon, that the militia of the United States could not, under the constitution, be compelled to cross the lines of their States, or of the United States, in times of war. They read the constitution to the letter, regardless of its spirit. Congress had decided the question differently; and my opinion was, that all should submit to that decision, until the common enemy was expelled from our borders. My then and now constituents concurred with me in opinion. When called on by their country, they hastened to obey; they never stopped to inquire or study geographical divisions or lines; their only inquiry was, where are the enemies of the country? They went in search of them, and the only charge ever made against them was, that they went too far, and overdid their duty. This charge, and those who made it, their aiders and abettors, are hastening to oblivion. Shall I, on account of this difference of opinion, reproach and censure Massachusetts, or call in question the patriotism of her citizens? No, sir; Boston was the cradle of American liberty. There is the ground over which Samuel Adams and John Hancock moved, when they called the sons of liberty to arms. To me, it is holy ground. I will not profane it. The atmosphere which such men breathed, must be favorable to independence, and the rights of man; and, although noxious vapors may arise, and settle and abide there, as elsewhere, for a season, the rays of the sun of liberty will penetrate and dissipate them.

I thank the Senator from Missouri for all the kind feelings he has manifested towards the ancient sufferings of the West. Sir, they were great. I know it. I need turn to no documents to tell me what they were; they are written upon my memory, a part of them upon my heart. The honored men you see here are but the remnants, the savings, the wreck, of large families lost in effecting the early settlement of the West. If I look to the right or to the left, and all around, I see mementoes of ancient suffering and woe. Ask my colleague, [General DESHA] who sits near me, what he remembers. He will tell you that, while his father was in pursuit of one party of Indians, another party came in and murdered two of his brothers. Inquire of yonder Governor of Arkansas, [MR. POPE] what became of his brother-in-law, Oldham? He will tell you that he went out to battle and never returned. Ask that honorable Representative, [MR. WICKLIFFE] where is your uncle, the gallant Hardin? He was intrepid enough to carry a flag of truce (under the direction of the Government) to the hostile savages. They did not know the sanctity and protection which the flag of peace threw around him, and they slew him. If I turn to my old classmate and friend, [MR. ROWAN] one of the ancient sons of the wilderness, now a grave, and wise, and potent Senator, I am reminded of a mother's courage and intrepidity; and who she rescued from savage hands, when in the grasp of death.

I was too young to participate in the dangers and difficulties of my country; but I can remember when death was in almost every bush, and every thicket concealed an ambuscade. If I am asked to trace my memory back, and name the first indelible impression imprinted on it, it would be the sight of my eldest brother, bleeding and dying under the wounds inflicted by the tomahawk and scalping knife: another and another went in the same way. I have seen a widowed mother plundered of her whole property, in a single night; from affluence and ease reduced to poverty in a moment, and thereby compelled to labor with her own hands, to educate her last and favorite son, who now addresses you. Sir, I remember the two companies (spoken of by the Senator from Missouri) sent by Virginia to our relief. They were called rangers. They were stout, rough-looking men, not fit for courts or palaces, but each man was a man: to us they were angels of deliverance. They guarded us, and fed us upon the game of the wilderness. Sir, in my just estimation, one company of them (seventy-five men) were of more real value than as many office hunters of the present day as could stand in the Pennsylvania avenue, between this capitol and the President's house.

These scenes are past: and now, shall I throw censure upon the old States for want of a proper regard to the interest of the West? I cannot do it so far as Kentucky is concerned. The greatest sufferings there were from the first of the year 1780, until the fall of 1782. During all that period, the old States were contending for their own safety; and although Cornwallis surrendered in October, 1781, it was not until after the battle of the Blue Licks, which took place in August, 1782, that such assurances of peace between Great Britain and the United States were entertained, as would justify sending a force to the Western country. It was not until the 30th of November, 1782, that the preliminaries for a peace were signed; and from that period such was the rapid increase of the Kentucky population that the war was soon transferred to the enemy's country. The citizens of Tennessee suffered to a much later period. There the insufficiency of the protection afforded by Congress was felt, after the war with Great Britain had ended: and it was not until Whitley (the same brave man who fell at the battle of the Thames) took his Kentucky volunteers, and united them with men of the same description raised in Tennessee, and marched them, without any authority from the Government, against the Cherokees at the Nickajack towns, and conquered them, that any security was afforded to the citizens of Tennessee.

The present Chief Magistrate has been charged with inconsistency in this, that he has appointed members of Congress to offices after he had written a letter to the Tennessee Legislature, recommending a change in the constitution, so as to exclude them. Surely gentlemen ought to permit him to administer the Government upon the constitution as it is, not as he might wish it to be. His recommendation has not been acceded to; a majority of the people have differed from him in opinion, and it has become his duty to acquiesce in their decision.

A few words with the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HOLMES] and I have done. He tells us he is always in a minority, and prefers to be so. This is matter of taste altogether. It is certainly the duty of a majority to carry on the Government, and do all the good for the country it can; and the understanding of that gentleman seems to be that the minority may and will annoy, vex, and harass the majority, by the use of all the means in their power. Now, if the disposition of any individual inclines him to mischief and evil, rather than good, I shall not quarrel with him for indulging his taste. The same gentleman has told us, that a gallant gentleman of the South, and a gay deceiver from the banks of the Hudson, are wooing and courting the West; and in time, a gentleman from New England may pay his addresses likewise.

I have often felt, painfully felt, my inferiority to those with whom I was contending. I seldom say any thing about it. The public will always discover it soon enough for my benefit. In a case, however, so striking as the present, I will at once openly and frankly admit my inferiority. It has been a long time since I have practised, or even thought of courtships. I never did excel. I never had at command those bewitching smiles; graceful attitudes, and enchanting words, which so much characterize and distinguish some gentlemen of my acquaintance; and how fortunate should I be, could I now borrow from that gentleman such aid as he could easily furnish, and have a great abundance left, while I discourse with him upon the subject which he has presented to our view. I will, however, without his assistance, endeavor to state how this matter has been, now is, and is to be hereafter. Some five or six years since, a gentleman of New England did pay his addresses to the West, and such were his importunities; and those of his friends, that they did extort from her a hesitating, dubious, and reluctant assent. She was not satisfied herself; and when the old people talked to her, and she had reflected fully upon the subject, she determined against the proposed union of the East and West; and in pursuance of the advice of her best friends, she married an individual, of whom I will give some account to the gentleman from Maine. He was born in South Carolina, in what is called the Waxhaw Settlement, a place remarkable for the production of great men, both of body and mind; there is an instance of it [pointing to Mr. BLAIR*] in the Representative of that district. He studied law in North Carolina, and at an early period removed to the West, and there learned the rudiments of war, under General James Robertson, the founder of Nashville, and father of West Tennessee. He distinguished himself at the bar as an advocate, and at an early period was called to the supreme bench of the State, where he held the scales of justice between contending parties, with an even and steady hand. He was remarkable for his detestation of all fraud, and treated villainy of every sort with severity. True, he is a little old, but he is as tough and sound—ay, as good old seasoned hickory! With him the West is contented and happy; and let it bring joy or grief to whom it may, no doubt need be entertained that next November two years, as an evidence of her attachment, she will, in presence of the good people of this country, again pass through the ceremony usual in such cases; nor should I be disappointed, if the State of Maine were found aiding and assisting at the celebration; and the gentleman himself would unite, I am sure, were it not for his unconquerable attachment to political consistency.

The Senate will excuse me for saying a few words in relation to the partnership made up by the Boston parson, during the last war, and now added to by the gentleman from Maine, which makes it to consist of James Madison, Felix Grundy, His Satannic Majesty, and John Holmes.

[Here Mr. HOLMES rose, and remarked that he had only said that, had the parson thought of him, he would have added his name at the end of the firm.]

Mr. GRUNDY proceeded. We will supply the ellipsis of the parson, and make him say what the gentleman supposes he would have said. I never speak irreverently of parsons, unless my duty compels me to do so; and, therefore, as to him, I will only remark, that I think his zeal was misdirected; but to the gentleman from Maine I have something more to say. I was honored too much when my name was inserted in the title of the firm. I never had, nor have I now, capital or capacity for business sufficient to entitle me to such distinction; and, therefore, in the new arrangement about to be made, my name will not be inserted, either in the title of the firm or upon the sign board. Mr. Madison has become old and rich, for an honest and well earned fame is a politician's wealth; he has retired from business, and Andrew Jackson has taken his place; and business will, hereafter, be conducted under the name and style of Andrew Jackson and company. Of this firm I will be an humble and unnamed partner. The gentleman from Maine will not assist in conducting the business of this firm, and the third person named has a violent antipathy to it. Therefore, the best thing that can be done is, to dissolve the partnership, and let the two characters last named establish a new firm, under the name and style of ——. [Meaning the Devil and John Holmes.] In making this division, great reliance is placed in the many excellent qualities and superlative virtues of the gentleman from Maine, which will enable him to keep the senior member of his firm in order, should he prove refractory. To this dissolution of the old firm, and the establishment of the two new ones, I call these Senators to bear testimony.

I wish to address the Senate seriously, upon another subject introduced into this discussion. I pretend not to prescribe rules to others: each Senator must judge of his own course for himself. I speak not in censure of the absent—of the late President of the United States and of his Secretary of State. I have spoken no evil, nor will I do so. If that is to be done, let those do it who have contended with, and conquered them. Theirs be the honors of the triumph, and all the spoils. I claim no share of either. I only ask my political friends to be permitted to aid them in diffusing and circulating, throughout the country, the beneficial effects of their achievement. This being the course I intend to pursue, gentlemen will excuse me for not feeling the influence of the remarks they have made concerning the present Secretary of State. Although I am willing to hear others, and indulge myself in much freedom of remark, when the conduct of a public officer is fairly before the Senate, I am unwilling to hear their names introduced and harshly treated, when there is no connexion between them and the subject under discussion. When I recollect that this individual has been a Senator in the Legislature of his own State; the Attorney General of the great State of New York; twice elected a Senator of the United States; the Chief Magistrate of his State—the duties of all which he ably and faithfully discharged; and now the first constitutional adviser of the President of the United States; I must be excused for thinking him entitled to public confidence, until something be shown to his prejudice.

Another high officer has been alluded to in this debate, in a manner which may be calculated to do injustice to his sentiments. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WENSTEN] read extracts from the speech of the presiding officer of this body, delivered on the tariff of 1816, and from his report made to the House of Representatives on Internal Improvements, under a call from that body, with a view to justify the system which has since been adopted in reference to these important subjects. I do not stand here to apologize for any one; but justice compels me to say, that I consider such proofs as entirely fallacious. No proof of sentiment can be more unfair, usually, than partial extracts, without reference to subject or circumstances. And such, I have no doubt, is the case in this instance. The tariff of 1816 was in its nature different from those since adopted. It was for revenue, and not protection. It was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, and not from that on Manufactures; and the rates of duties, as fixed by it, were not higher than the wants of the treasury required. It was, in fact, a reduction, not an increase of the then existing duties. It is true that many of its provisions were so modified as to afford protection, so far as was practicable in a system of revenue, to the manufactures which had sprung up during the restrictive measures and the war; and which, as they had been forced into existence by the policy of the Government, had a just right to its protection, as far as was consistent with its constitutional powers, and a just regard to other great interests. No one, the most rigid in the construction of the constitution, ever doubted but that protection might be afforded in that incidental mode; and it would be as little doubted, that, where a measure which proposed thus to protect them was before the House, the general benefit of home manufactures would constitute a legitimate topic of debate, in order to ensure the passage of the bill. But it would be doing great injustice to infer from general remarks, made under circumstances going to show that manufactures at home would render us more independent and secure in time of war, that he who delivered them was in favor of the protective system. The most that can be fairly inferred is, that he was in favor of protection as incidental to revenue. The character of the measure under consideration, to which the remarks referred throughout the discussion, shows that it was regarded in that light only.

Surely the Senator from Massachusetts, when he reflects on his own case, will not insist on a different view. He opposed the tariff of 1824, and supported the still stronger tariff of 1828, on a ground of change of circumstances in the short interval between them, and yet repelled the charge of inconsistency when applied to himself. With such a defence in his own case, he cannot but see how unjust it would be to rely on sentiments delivered on a tariff for revenue only, as a justification of a system based on the principle of protecting one branch of industry at the expense of others, without regard to revenue or any other of the constitutional powers of Congress. But the glaring injustice which may be produced by quoting partial extracts is still more strikingly exemplified in the case of that which the Senator from Massachusetts quoted from the report on Internal Improvements. He read, from the introduction of the report, some introductory observations on Internal Improvements, no doubt with a view to prove that the author was in favor of the constitutionality of the system in its broadest sense. Taking what the gentleman read separately, the inference which he wished to draw might seem to follow; but if the gentleman had taken the trouble to turn to the paragraph next to the concluding one of the same document, he would have found it repelled. What he omitted to do, I will undertake to perform. The report was made under a call of the House, and of course did not involve the constitutional question; but, lest there should be a doubt on that question, it goes on to state: "In the view which has been taken, I have thought it improper, under the resolution of the House, to discuss the constitutional question, or how far the system of Internal Improvement, which has been presented, may be carried into effect on the principles of our Government; and, therefore, the whole of the arguments which are used, and the measures proposed, must be considered as depending on the decision of that question." Nothing can be more guarded; it requires no comment.

When I heard the gentleman from Massachusetts introduce the name of the presiding officer of this House, it struck me that there was something of indecency in it, as he is the only individual on this floor who cannot be heard in his own defence. I know that, were he permitted to be heard, none could defend his conduct and political course with more ability and effect. This I know, because I have seen his strength tested on many great and trying occasions.

Before I conclude, permit me to return my thanks to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. JOHNSON] for his politeness and respectful treatment, in yielding me the floor, when he understood I had a wish to address the Senate; and although we cannot agree in all things, in one we will unite—in remembering with pride and pleasure, that it was on the banks of the mighty river of the West, and near his own great city, that the brave Louisianians, the gallant Mississippians, (commanded by their present representative, [Gen. HIXON] who took them up to the very lines of the enemy, and there sported and played with danger as a harmless thing) the Kentuckians, always striving to be foremost where danger is to be met, the over-duty-doing Tennesseans, led on by the greatest captain of the age, met, fought, and conquered, the conquerors of the conqueror of the world. It was then, yes, it was then and there the American eagle took his loftiest flight, and uttered notes of highest exultation: thence winged his way to the South, to proclaim to Spanish Americans, then struggling for liberty and independence, what deeds of mighty daring and of valor freemen could perform, when fighting in defence of the beauty and booty of their country against an invading foe.*

MARINE SERVICE.

The following resolutions, submitted on the 27th February, by Mr. BARNARD, were taken up for consideration: "Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish to this House information on the following subjects:

"1st. Whether it is necessary to the armed equipment of a vessel of war that marines should compose a part of its military force; or whether marines may not usefully be dispensed with, and a portion of the seamen be instructed in the use of small arms, and perform all duties which can be required of marines, either in battle or in ordinary service.

"2d. Whether seamen are not now instructed and practised in the use of small arms; and, generally, any information which may elucidate the inquiry, whether marines can or cannot be beneficially dispensed with on board of our public vessels of war.

"3d. Whether the petty officers and seamen, who have been in service, but from age or slight disabilities are rendered unfit for the active duties of their calling, on ship-board, can be usefully and safely employed as guards at the navy stations, in lieu of the marines now assigned to that duty.

"And further, that the Secretary of the Navy obtain from the officers composing the Navy Board, and other naval officers of rank now at the seat of government, their opinions, in writing, on the foregoing subject, to be transmitted with his report to the Senate."

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he was opposed to this mode of obtaining information. He recollected that the policy and propriety of obtaining opinions from Heads of Department was discussed when Congress sat in Philadelphia. Some gentlemen were in the habit of, at that time, calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for his opinion on any favorite subject, relating to his Department, in order that they might be aided in accomplishing their object by the weight that gentleman's opinion bore in the legislative hall. It was then decided, that opinions of Heads of Department were unnecessary, as members themselves were as capable of forming as correct an opinion as they; and that they were improper, as tending to influence the discussion of the Legislature. Mr. S. said it was sufficient to require facts from the Departments and leave members to form their own opinions on those facts. For these reasons, he was opposed to the resolutions.

Mr. BARNARD said, the remarks made by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH] in opposition to the resolution now under consideration, made it necessary for him briefly to state some of the views and reasons which influenced him in presenting it. It will be recollected [said Mr. B.] that, at the commencement of the present session, the President of the United States, in his message to Congress, recommended that the marine corps should be transferred to, and merged in, the army; and whatever marines might be required for naval service should be obtained by draughts from the army, as it was stated that no previous training was necessary for this service. The Military Committee of the Senate, upon the reference of the several parts of the President's message, considered this subject as coming in some measure before them: although of a mixed character, relating both to the army and navy, yet they conceived it entitled to their consideration. But it occurred to me, sir, that it was proper to settle a preliminary question before we could come to any satisfactory conclusion on the recommended transfer of the marine corps, and that was, whether either marines or soldiers were necessary as a part of the armed force on board of a vessel of war. If marines are indispensable on ship-board, then I am willing to admit that it will be better to retain the corps as it is, and cure any defect in its organization, if such should exist, by a re-organization, if necessary: for I can readily foresee difficulties that will arise in taking soldiers from the army to perform marine duty. I wish merely to mention one or two that have occurred to me. By the existing laws of Congress, punishment by stripes is expressly prohibited in the army of the United States. When a soldier, therefore, enlists in the service, it is under an implied agreement, if not express understanding, that this punishment shall not be inflicted on him for ordinary offences. If he is called on to perform marine duty, on board one of your vessels of war, is he to be subjected to the punishment usually inflicted on seamen, or is there to be two kinds of punishment, one for the marine, and the other for the sailor, on board of the same vessel? Every naval officer will tell you at once, that this distinction in punishments cannot exist. That, for the same offence, there must be the same kind of punishment, whether for marines or seamen.

There is another inconvenience [said Mr. B.] that has struck me will arise in taking soldiers. A company of soldiers consists of about fifty or sixty men, commanded by a captain and two lieutenants. If a draught is required for one of your smaller vessels, say a sloop of war, about half a company only will be required: for I believe the number of marines usually employed on board one of that class of vessels is between twenty and thirty only. If you then take this number, you divide the company, leaving the captain on shore with one of his subalterns, while the other is sent in command of the detachment to serve at sea. It must be apparent, I think, that such a state of things would operate injuriously to the army. But my design is not now to go into an examination of the inconveniences that would result, by making detachments from the army for marine duty at sea. It is not necessary to the consideration of the resolution before us. I have merely stated one or two as they struck me. My object is to obtain from those competent to give it, the information asked for in the resolution: that is, whether marines cannot be entirely dispensed with on ship-board, and a portion of seamen trained to the use of small arms, to perform any duty that can be required of soldiers.

The Senator from Maryland objects to the resolution, because, he says, it is asking the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, when we ought to ask for facts, and alleges that the Senate are just as competent to form opinions on this subject, as the Secretary himself. But the resolution asks for information, and from whom? Why, sir, not from the Secretary only, but from naval officers, whose long service and experience will enable them to give it. The resolution was purposely framed with a view to accomplish this object. But who can the Senate call upon for this purpose? Upon the officers themselves? No; but upon the Head of the Department, and, through him, upon the officers who are subject to his control. This is the only means that I am aware of by which we can officially obtain the information sought for.

I will acknowledge [said Mr. B.] that my impression has been, that marines are not indispensable for the sea service in our public vessels. I may be in error. I do not pretend to any practical knowledge myself on the subject, and therefore it is that I want to be informed by those who alone can give satisfactory information. If, when it is obtained, in the report of the Secretary, and the officers called on, it shall be found that marines cannot be dispensed with, it will show that I have been mistaken in my impression. I will, however, state a few of the reasons on which that impression has been founded: for I do not mean to go into an argument on the subject. It is well known that, in the British service, their seamen ever have been forcibly impressed, and compelled to serve on board their ships of war against their consent; and this, too, not for a few years only, but for life, or, at least, as long as they are fit for duty. It became necessary, therefore, to repress that spirit of mutiny which would unquestionably be found to exist in a crew thus violently torn from their friends and family, and forced into the service against their will. For this purpose marines, it is believed, were originally introduced on board of British ships, as much, if not more, to overawe and keep the seamen in subjection, than to assist in navigating or fighting the vessel. This duty, on the part of the marines, has produced a feeling on the part of the sailors towards them, if not of actual hate, certainly any thing but cordiality and good will. The dislike of the sailor for the marine is proverbial.

In our service [continued Mr. B.] marines cannot, it is presumed, be necessary to guard the seamen, and prevent mutiny. Seamen are voluntarily enlisted, and for a shorter period than marines themselves: they are not forced into the service, as in the British navy, but go into it of choice—it is their free act. Can it be possible, then, that they must be watched and guarded by soldiers to keep them to their duty? Such a belief is derogatory, it appears to me, to the character of our gallant tars. On one subject my mind is decided, that there should not be on board of the same vessel two jarring and distinct classes of men, who are in constant collision with each other, unless imperious necessity demands it. Those who are to act with effect, can best do so by a union of feelings, and a similarity of habits. Experience has taught this lesson. Sailors and marines cannot, or, at least, have not, heretofore, assimilated, either in feeling or habit.

As the materials are then so discordant, can the service of the marines be dispensed with without injury to the service? Cannot seamen be trained to the use of small arms? I see no difficulty. Instead of marines, take the like number of young landmen from the country, any where, and they can load and fire with as much effect as the best drilled marine. The Americans, generally, are accustomed from infancy to the use of fire arms; very little training will therefore be required to make them expert gun-men. Besides, sir, I am informed that, by the present structure of our vessels of war, marines can render but little service on deck, and that musketry is used with most effect from the tops. If this is the case, is it not better to have seamen than marines? They will be ready to throw down the musket and spring to the yards and rigging at any moment, when required by the exigencies of the ship. This may sometimes be of great importance. Nor do I conceive the objection urged by the Senator from Maryland as sufficient, that seamen will not keep their arms in order. It is well known that, besides muskets, there are pistols, pikes, cutlasses, and other arms, on board of every armed ship: how are these kept in order? Not by marines. Muskets can be kept in good condition the same way, by the armorer, or whatever name is given to the person in charge of the arms. The objection raised, too, that the pay of sailors is greater than marines, loses part of its weight, when it is recollected that the marines are not only paid, but clothed by the Government, while the sailor purchases his own clothing from his pay.

There is another consideration which I think ought to have influence in determining upon this subject, and therefore it is that I am desirous of the information. It cannot be unknown to the Senate, that there is often a scarcity of seamen, and difficulty is experienced in promptly manning our vessels of war for sea: any measure calculated to remove or lessen this inconvenience, without injury to the service, ought therefore to receive the favorable regard of this body. One of our larger vessels of war, destined for a three years' cruise in the Mediterranean, Pacific, or elsewhere, will carry with her about a hundred marines; they will continue to serve as marines; and as marines, and nothing but marines, they will return to this country. Let, however, the same number of landmen be sent instead of marines; let them be taught and exercised in the use of the musket, if necessary; but let them at the same time perform all the ordinary duties of sailors, and at the end of a three years' voyage they will return, not mere musket-men, but expert and able seamen: you will thus obtain an annual increase of seamen for your naval service, and that of the very best materials too—a matter of some consequence, I conceive, not only to the interests of the navy, but of the country. I have been led to these observations, sir, because of the opposition to the inquiry proposed by me, and in justification of my views; whether wrong or right, I must leave for others to judge.

While I am up, I will say a few words with regard to the last branch of the inquiry: whether seamen cannot be employed in lieu of marines at our naval stations. The marine corps, as at present established, is both a naval and military body. When at sea, it is subject to the regulations made for the navy; when on land, it is subject to the rules and articles of war for the government of the army; so that its character depends on whether it performs duty on land or water. Now, sir, when on shore, at a naval depot, it is governed by army discipline; when on ship-board, by naval discipline. We know that our navy yards are entrusted to the charge of a naval officer of rank, generally, I believe, if not always, a post captain; marines are detailed to perform garrison duty, in guarding and protecting the public works and property. But, sir, in consequence of marines being soldiers on land, they are not, as I understand, subject to the orders of the commandant of the station, and details for duty are therefore made by request, not by command of this officer. Two separate and independent commands, then, exist at the same place, with no common superior. This is inconsistent with my ideas of military subordination and regulation. But why may not seamen, whose age or infirmities, from long and faithful service, have rendered them unqualified for active duty on ship-board, serve as guards at these naval depots, instead of marines? They have been accustomed to strict discipline, and it is conceived would be equally vigilant in the discharge of any duty imposed on them; their tried fidelity at sea would furnish a guarantee for their faithful conduct on shore. I wish to know from naval officers if they can be trusted with this duty? If they can, sir, it will furnish an asylum for these hardy veterans of the ocean, much better suited to their tastes and wishes than any naval asylum. They will be rendering service to the Government for their support, and will find a resting place in their more advanced years, after the dangers and vicissitudes of an active sea life.

It is known that there are now at the seat of Government many distinguished and experienced officers of the navy. I have availed myself of the circumstance to make the call at this time. The information, when received, will be valuable; no possible injury can grow out of obtaining it; we shall be possessed of light which we do not now possess, to guide us in any measures that may be deemed necessary, with respect to the marine corps. I trust, therefore, the Senate will adopt the resolution.

Mr. B. concluded by saying he wished it to be understood that he had no unkind or unfriendly feeling to the corps in making this inquiry; very far from it. He was actuated by different motives. I have the pleasure, said he, to be acquainted with several of its officers, who have heretofore signalized themselves in the service of their country, and will do so again, whenever their country needs their services. But if they are necessary to the navy, let them be subject to naval control, whether at sea or on shore.

Mr. JOHNSTON suggested that the resolution was unnecessary, as the Committee on Naval Affairs had the same power to call on the Secretary of the Navy for this information, through their chairman, that the Senate had. If every committee were to pursue this course, and come to the Senate with resolutions to obtain information which could be as well obtained without any reference to the Senate, it would be constantly engaged in long debates, and the necessary business of the Senate would be obstructed; and a discussion is got up, which shows that gentlemen possess the very information required. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BARNARD] had convinced the Senate that he is already in possession of all the information required in his resolution.

After a few observations from Messrs. WOODBURY, and SMITH, of Maryland,

Mr. BARNARD observed that, when he offered this resolution, he did not apprehend that any circumstances would arise which could possibly lead to a discussion; and, therefore, the remarks of the gentleman from Louisiana were not applicable to him. Farther, as the President of the United States had recommended the reorganization of the marine corps, it being of a mixed character, we may naturally presume that all the facts on which this paragraph was predicated were in his possession, and may now be obtained from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HAYNE suggested that, as the subject had relation to two Committees—those on military and naval affairs, he thought it proper that the gentleman would designate the one to which he would refer the answer, when received. If left between two committees, it might fall through.

Mr. BARNARD said he had no hesitation in naming the committee to which he would refer the answer to his resolution. He was willing to refer it to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The resolution was then agreed to.

TUESDAY, MARCH 2, 1830.

MR. FOOT'S RESOLUTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. FOOT'S resolution.

Mr. KNIGHT said it was not his intention to make a speech, but merely to reply to a remark made by the Senator from South Carolina, and also by the Senator from Tennessee who last addressed the Senate, on the subject now pending. It is not my purpose [said Mr. K.] to say any thing of the resolution under consideration, but to endeavor to sustain my State, and to save her from being sacrificed here by the gentlemen, the one on my right, and the other on my left. I had hoped, sir, that, in this unprofitable business of bringing other's sins before the world, the little State from whence I come would have been overlooked, or rather not seen on the map of this controversy, and would have remained unscathed and untouched by the noiseless tenor of her way in the arts of peace, industry, and mechanism. But in this I have been disappointed—"men's virtues we write in water, but their vices are engraven on brass." However unnecessary or uncalled for, such is the fact, that the aberrations of some of the citizens of my State are held up here, and emblazoned to the world, not for the purpose of admonishing others of the fatal rock on which they had been wrécked, but it seemed to me with exultation, and as much as to say, stand off, avunt, for I am holier than thou. To me, sir, it seemed unkind, and the more so from the quarter it came. I had thought that friendly intercourse and common feeling, as well as other considerations, would have forbid the remark of the gentleman from South Carolina. Had he considered that it was by the aid of one of the sons of Rhode Island he is entitled to a seat on this floor, I am sure it would have been spared. There was a time when South Carolina was prostrated by internal enemies and a foreign foe: her situation was seen and felt throughout this land. This son of Rhode Island [General Green] went forth—he stretched forth his sinewy arm—he met the foe—they fought—he conquered, and Carolina thenceforth was free. On that occasion she was just to her benefactor. She amply paid him with her generous love. I had hoped that the kind feelings of those days were still cherished in the bosoms of her sons; that they would not upbraid the place of his nativity, his friends, his connexions, nor aid to tarnish their fair fame. If they could not cast the mantle of charity over them, they would leave their vices and their virtues to repose in the bosom of their Father and their God.

Let us look at the accusation. Sir, it was stated that at a certain time, South Carolina opened her ports, and invited all the world to a city of refuge; that a number of ships, purporting to be from Rhode Island, entered the port of Charleston with aliens on board; they were discharged, and the freighters received their passage money, as they had a legal right to do by the laws of South Carolina. It was also legalized by the nations of Europe, and sanctioned by custom. Now, sir, can it be believed that these unlearned mariners intended injury in taking these persons from a state of barbarism to a land of liberty and of law? To a land where all are born equal, where all have inalienable rights, such as liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness, proclaimed by the sages and patriots of '76? They had seen it in the newspapers, read it in their spelling books, and believed it true. I say, sir, were it possible for such persons, under such circumstances to have imagined that, by their act they were perpetuating misery and bondage on the human family for ever? I say, sir, could they have understood this, they would have considered their latter end, and turned from wrath to come. But, sir, if there were any among them, who knew and believed they were entailing slavery on their fellow men, I do not stand here to palliate their offence—let justice fall on them. I will not protect nor shield them from the condemnation of the good and virtuous—they will need more powerful aid than mine, to absolve them from the iniquity of such transgressions—"there is a worm that never dies." I would that all such should turn to Him who alone is able to pardon and to save.

But, sir, Rhode Island is not the only sister of our Union that has been seduced from the path of rectitude and of virtue, and then had to endure the taunts and jeers of her seducer. Others have experienced similar fate, and (like the daughters of Jephthah) have wailed on the mountains, pitied by the humane and charitable, but scorned and condemned by those who betrayed, seduced, and participated in their crimes. Such, sir, is the situation of Rhode Island. And now she is accused here of entailing perpetual bondage on the poor untutored and unlearned African. That she has done it as a State, I deny. She absolved the bonds of master and slave with her independence. She acted out what she professed. Whoever breathes in her atmosphere, breathes the air of liberty. It was there civil and religious freedom was first given and secured to man, and there it has been maintained and enjoyed to the letter, full, free, and complete, to the present day. To her sons she can give but little patrimonial estate, for she has it not—but she gives them freedom; they are found in every clime, and in every sea; whether on the lakes or on the ocean—wherever their country and their duty call, they obey; there you will find them.

Sir, whatever may have been our mutual transgressions, I will henceforth cast them into oblivion; and whether slavery is wise, necessary, and just, in South Carolina, is not my province to inquire—it is her business alone, not mine; she has full power over the subject, and to her I leave it. I do not arraign her before the Christian world; she will manage her own concerns in her own way. My friends, my countrymen, are domiciled in South Carolina; they are received with kindness and hospitality; our commercial intercourse is extensive; we are great consumers of her productions; we manufacture her raw material and send it to a market. We esteem her citizens for their chivalry, hospitality, and intelligence, and we are disposed, through good report and evil report, in weal or woe, to extend to them the hand of fellowship and of brotherly kindness, and hope it may be brightened and cherished for the benefit of all, now and forever.

To the gentleman from Tennessee, I will say as was said of a Roman Governor, near two thousand years ago, Felix by name: "Had he obtained more exact knowledge of us, he would not have made this accusation, and would not thus have condemned us without a hearing." Although he passed sentence on us, and handed us over, (not to Festus nor Agrippa) but to the people of this nation, to be punished, yet I will speak to him the words of truth and soberness—nothing in malice, but all with temperance, justice, and forbearance.

Sir, why the gentleman, with his gigantic power, should have thrown himself over the Alleghanies, and thrust his war knife into the heart of the smallest, weakest sister of this Union, is to me inexplicable. It could not be to display his power and bravery in combat, or in unprofitable war: for the brave are always generous, and would not attack the weak and unoffending; to vanquish so inferior an opponent would entwine no laurels around his brow. Was it to display his gallantry? Surely it could not be for this: for, to push his weapon into the bosom of the innocent, the unsuspecting, and the unprotected, would be no confirmation of his well earned fame. Rhode

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[MARCH 3, 4, 1830.]

Island had taken no lot nor part in the debate; she had accused no man nor combination of men, nor had given cause of offence; why should she be accused? Why this attack upon her?

Sir, my object only is to repel the imputations cast on that State, which has so long and so often honored me with its confidence, and on the yeomanry of that State, whose immediate Representative I am: for their occupation is my occupation; we are tillers of the ground from our youth up; with them I meet upon the level; republicans in fact and in deed; not only in profession, but practice; no landlord and tenant, no master nor slave, but all of us independent freemen and freeholders, cultivating our own soil with our own hands. We care but little who administers this Government, if it is done with wisdom, discretion, and on the principles of the constitution. We preferred Mr. Adams, but we do not oppose General Jackson; we are his friends, but not his partisans; we will give him our support when he is right, but will not when wrong; and if deserved, will hail him with the plaudits of "well done, thou good and faithful servant," as readily and as willingly as any others. It does not follow that, if we are friendly to one, we must therefore oppose another without reason. These, sir, are the men in common with all others of my State that I mean to defend from all unjust imputations; and these are the persons accused here of severing husband and wife, mother and child, and rending asunder all the ties that bind man to man. Perhaps the gentleman did not intend his accusation as censure, but as praise: for he asserted that slavery was justified by the principles of Christianity. If so, I have misapprehended the allegation: for I hold whatever is commanded and supported by Christianity is for the happiness and well being of man here and hereafter. If the forcible separation of husband and wife, mother and child, and keeping them in ignorance and bondage, is justified by the divine law, then I confess my error; but until he shows this, I shall cherish my own opinion, and call it slavery still.

Sir, the gentleman exclaimed, "go to the East, go to Rhode Island: she can tell you how slaves came here." Sir, if slaves are found in the West, I know not how they came there, nor does Rhode Island know; they must have been carried there by force, and held by force, otherwise they would not be slaves. The native Indian roamed the wilderness as he pleased; he was as free as the mountain air he breathed; he acknowledged no master; he had no master. If slavery exists there, it was not found there.

Sir, when we are told to go to a State for information, we understand it to mean the State in its sovereign capacity; or at least a majority of that State.

[Mr. GRUNDY desired to explain. Sir, [said Mr. G.] I did not say that Rhode Island had done it; but that certain individuals of that State, tempted by their cupidity, had brought slaves here. The moral sense of that community is against it.]

Sir, [said Mr. K.] had I so understood the gentleman before, I should not have made the remarks I now have; and will not now say what I intended to have done; and only add, that if the gentleman knows any individuals in Rhode Island who have aided him in making slaves in the West, he may arraign them, try them, and, if found guilty, punish three of the ringleaders under the "second section," so much alluded to here and elsewhere; not forgetting those who tempted, those who held forth the provoking gold, not in a bag, but in the open palm, and set them on. But, sir, it is hoped the gentleman will extend his mercy so far as to let them have the benefit of the statute of limitation.

I repeat, it was the State I intended to defend; and if the gentlemen does not accuse, I have no defence to make.

Mr. CLAYTON then rose, and addressed the Senate until after three o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 3, 1830.

The Senate was principally occupied this day in the consideration of Executive business.

THURSDAY, MARCH 4, 1830.

MR. FOOT'S RESOLUTION.

Mr. CLAYTON concluded the observations on this subject which he commenced on Tuesday. They were as follow:

If I need an apology [Mr. C. remarked] for discussing topics not strictly relevant to the subject of the resolution before us, I shall find it in the example of honorable gentlemen, who, in going before me, have availed themselves, by general consent, of an opportunity to debate, on this motion, the full merits of other questions of momentous interest to our country. While the argument was of a sectional character, and chiefly calculated to excite personal and local feeling, I desired no participation in it. But, although generally averse to any deviation from the ordinary rules of parliamentary proceeding, and unwilling to originate any new subject of controversy even in the boundless latitude given to this discussion, I cannot be silent while principles are boldly advanced and pressed upon us, (no matter how inapplicable or inappropriate they may appear) which, in my judgment, are subversive of the interests of this nation, or hostile to the spirit of the Federal constitution.

The resolution of the honorable Senator from Connecticut has nothing imperative in its character. It lays down no new principle, and proposes no new course of legislation; but simply asks an inquiry into the expediency of either hastening the sales of the public domain, or of stopping the surveys for a limited period. The committee to whom the inquiry is proposed to be entrusted is composed of five members,* all of whom are Representatives of States within whose limits are contained large portions of the public lands. Seeing in this fact a sufficient refutation of the objection that this inquiry may create unnecessary alarm in the West; entertaining the same confidence in the honorable members of that committee which others have professed; believing that the subject proposed to be referred to them is important to the country, and that, by the adoption of the resolution, we may be furnished with an interesting document in their report, my own vote will be given against the motion for indefinite postponement. I agree with my honorable friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. WEBSTER] that the committee may investigate the whole subject without any express instructions. By the rules of the Senate, they already have full jurisdiction over the matter. But, after all the discussion which has been elicited by the mere proposition to instruct them to inquire, it is not probable that the committee will do so without some further intimation from the Senate that a report on this subject would be acceptable. I cannot agree with the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. WOODBURY] that the motion to postpone is calculated or intended to prevent a distinct expression of opinion on the subject; on the contrary, the postponement of the resolution, after discussion, would announce to the committee our indisposition to have the inquiry made during the present session. The Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FOOT] who desires this information, and whose deportment here is distinguished for courtesy to others, may be indulged, without any apprehension of exciting unnecessary alarm in the West, while our refusal to adopt any measure to throw light on the subject may, possibly, create suspicion in other parts of our country, that we are wasting this portion of the nation's treasure, and are afraid that our profligacy may be exposed by this investigation.

MARCH 4, 1830.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

I proceed, now, sir, to a brief examination of what I conceive to have been the origin of this protracted and discursive debate. We have a bill on our files, entitled a bill "to graduate the prices of the public lands, to make provision for actual settlers, and to cede the refuse, upon equitable terms, and for meritorious objects, to the States in which they lie;" the same, sir, which has been alluded to by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BEXTON] under the designation of "my graduation bill." When the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HAYNE] first addressed the Senate on the resolution before us, I understood him to have pressed it as a measure of expediency, that the public lands should be sold to the States within whose limits they are situated, for a nominal consideration. The gentleman afterwards corrected this impression, when his colleague [Mr. SMITH of S. C.] declared that he also so understood him. Sir, the gentleman has the right to claim of us all that his statements should be properly represented. I afterwards understood him to say that his proposition was not to cede away these lands for a nominal consideration, but to sell them on such liberal terms that revenue shall not be even a secondary object in the sale. He urged, with his usual ability, the impolicy of even considering them as a source of revenue. Sir, if I now comprehend all this doctrine, it has for its object to make impressions which shall secure a favorable vote on this same graduation bill; and if so, I dissent from the doctrine toto callo. Whether this were or were not the great object of the debate, with the gentleman from South Carolina, it was plainly avowed to have been a motive for it by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BEXTON] in the view which he took of the subject. The bill referred to proposes to limit the prices of these lands at once, to one dollar per acre, and then gradually to reduce those prices at the rate of twenty-five per cent. per annum, until the lands shall be offered, after the expiration of the third year, at twenty-five cents per acre.

It farther proposes to sell lands to actual settlers, whether trespassers or not, at gradually reduced prices, until, after the expiration of the third year, they are to receive them at five cents per acre. If that miserable pittance be not then paid, it proposes to cede eighty acres to every such settler, "without the payment of any consideration, and as a donation;" and finally, by the terms of it all the lands which shall remain not disposed of by these means, at the end of five years, are to be given to the States in which they lie, upon these conditions merely—that they shall apply them to the promotion of education and Internal Improvement at home, and refund to the Government the expenses of the surveys of the lands so ceded, at the rate of two hundred and sixteen dollars for each township of twenty-three thousand acres. In consequence of the enactment of such a law, probably very little would be bought until the expiration of the third year, when, if the interference of these States, with a view to secure the whole to themselves for nothing, should not prevent the sales altogether, the lands would be purchased at a nominal price. Such a measure, sir, would not only be unjust to the citizens of the old States, but highly injurious to the Western settlers who have heretofore bought lands at a full and fair consideration. The value of property is merely relative, and is either enhanced or diminished by the estimate placed upon other property of the same kind. If a hundred millions of acres be thrown into market at twenty-five cents per acre, and a large quantity of land be offered to actual settlers at the same time at five cents per acre, the value of that which has been bought by fair purchasers at two dollars, or at one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, is at once, other circumstances being equal, sunk to a level with the selling price of all the lands around it. We well know the operation upon our real property, in all parts of the Union, of the exposure at public sale of any very considerable portion of real property adjoining it. We know that if a great landed proprietor sells me a tract in the midst of his possessions at fifty dollars per acre, and then, from pecuniary embarrassment or from any other cause, exposes the residue to sale, by which he realizes only five dollars per acre for lands of equal fertility and advantages, my land, as an effect of this, is reduced to his last selling price. When he puts a million of acres around mine into market at a nominal sum, he equally diminishes the selling value of mine by the act, whether his motive for doing so be to augment population, and improve the country, or wantonly to effect my ruin. And should this bill become a law, the former purchasers who have paid full value would, in consequence of the depreciation of their property occasioned by the enactment, have a better equitable right to remuneration for losses by the Government, than many claimants whose demands are annually liquidated here without our hearing a note of remonstrance against them. This bill has been pending here for the last four years; and the disposition evinced to entertain it as a subject for future decision has cherished expectations which are sedulously encouraged by rumors in the West, that its provisions will eventually be adopted. If my information be correct, and Western gentlemen near me can bear witness that it is so, anticipations have been too generally indulged that these lands will, before long, be offered for nothing. This must tend to impede our sales, and perhaps to some extent to suspend the settlement of our Western frontier—a result I suppose to be deprecated by none more deeply than by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BEXTON] himself. In the mean time, without the final action of Congress on the subject, the illusion is every year increasing; and, to add to the evil, we have now a new doctrine, which has been already adverted to in this debate—that these lands of right belong to the new States within which they are situated. The gentleman from Missouri, in reference to the charge of hostility to the West, to prove or disprove which I would not myself now offer a single remark, has chosen to inform us that he has never obtained here more than a single vote for his graduation bill from the Representatives of all the States northeast of the Potomac—and he adds, that vote was given in 1828, by a former Senator from the State which I have the honor in part to represent. For this good deed, the gentleman from Missouri proceeded to pronounce a panegyric on that Senator, which was merited on stronger grounds. Though readily according in the justice which imputes the most correct motives to that gentleman, who is my neighbor, and with whom I live on terms of friendly intercourse, exclaiming as he doubtless did his conscientious judgment on the case, yet, with my views, thus briefly explained, I am constrained to say that I cannot vote for this bill. According to my mode of considering it, it is a proposition to give away the birthright of our people for a nominal sum; and I am yet to learn that the citizens of the Middle States have indicated any feeling in regard to it differing from that expressed in the vote referred to, when, with a single exception, all the Senators representing States North of Mason's and Dixon's line opposed the measure. They do not look to these lands, as has been unjustly stated, with the eye of an unfeeling landholder who parts with his acres as a miser parts with his gold. They view the new States as younger sisters in the same family, upon an equal footing with themselves, and entitled to an equal share of their patrimony; but having children to educate, and numerous wants to be supplied, they will think it ungenerous, unjust, and oppressive, should these younger sisters take away the whole. Sir, it is the inheritance which descended from our forefathers, who wrested a part of it from the British Crown, at the expense of their blood and treasure, and paid for the rest of it by the earnings of their labor. It is not for me to say what are the feelings of the people of the Middle States on this subject. But it is their privilege to speak for themselves, and they will doubtless, when they think it necessary, exercise that privilege. Yet I will say that, if they entertain the sentiments of their fathers, they will never consent to cede away hundreds of millions of acres of land for a nominal consideration, or gratuitously relinquish them to any new State, however loudly she may insist on the measure as due to her rights and her sovereignty, or however boldly she may threaten to defy the Federal Judiciary, and decide the controversy by her own tribunals, in her own favor. Those who are conversant with our revolutionary history, will remember that the exclusive claims of Virginia and other members of our political family to the public lands, were warmly resisted by the States of New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland, as soon as those claims were avowed, after the rupture with the mother country. The articles of confederation were not signed on the part of New Jersey until the 25th of November, 1778, although she had bled freely in the cause of American liberty from the commencement of the struggle. One of the principal objections which caused this delay in the ratification of those articles, will be found in the able representation of her Legislature, presented by her delegates to Congress, before she acceded to the Union. "The ninth article," said they, "provides that 'no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States.' Whether we are to understand that by territory is intended any land, the property of which was heretofore vested in the Crown of Great Britain, or that no mention of such land is made in the confederation, we are constrained to observe that the present war, as we always apprehended, was undertaken for the general defence and interest of the confederating colonies, now the United States. It was ever the confident expectation of this State, that the benefits derived from a successful contest were to be general and proportionate; and that the property of the common enemy, falling in consequence of a prosperous issue of the war, would belong to the United States, and be appropriated to their use. We are therefore greatly disappointed in finding no provision made in the confederation for empowering the Congress to dispose of such property, but especially the vacant and unpatented lands, commonly called the Crown lands, for defraying the expenses of the war, and for such other public and general purposes. The jurisdiction ought, in every instance, to belong to the respective States within the charter or determined limits of which such lands may be seated; but reason and justice must decide, that the property which existed in the Crown of Great Britain, previous to the present revolution, ought now to belong to the Congress in trust for the use and benefit of the United States. They have fought and bled for it in proportion to their respective abilities; and therefore the reward ought not to be predilectionally distributed." And when, in November, 1778, the Legislature of New Jersey determined to attach her to the Union, they did it, as they then expressed, "in firm reliance that the candor and justice of the several States would, in due time, remove the subsisting inequality," yet still insisting on the justice of their objections then "lately stated and sent to the General Congress." So too, Delaware and Maryland, for the same reasons, refused to join the confederation until a still later period—the former ratifying the articles on the 22d of February, 1779, and the latter on the 1st of March, 1781. The State which I have the honor in part to represent here had, on the 1st of February, 1779, adopted the following resolutions to authorize her accession to the Union.

"Resolved, That this State considers it necessary for the peace and safety of the State, to be included in the Union; that a moderate extent of limits should be assigned for such of those States as claim to the Mississippi or South Sea; and that the United States, in Congress assembled, should and ought to have power of fixing their Western limits.

"Resolved also, That this State considers herself justly entitled to a right, in common with the members of the Union, to that extensive tract of country which lies to the westward of the frontiers of the United States, the property of which was not vested in or granted to individuals, at the commencement of the present war; that the same hath been or may be gained from the King of Great Britain or the native Indians, by the blood and treasure of all, and ought, therefore, to be a common estate, to be granted out on terms beneficial to the United States."

But, after the accession of Delaware with this protest, Maryland still persevered in her refusal to join in the confederation, solely on the ground "that she might thereby be stripped of the common interest and the common benefits derivable from the Western lands." She still insisted that some security for these lands was necessary for the happiness and tranquillity of the Union; denied the whole claim of Virginia to the territory Northwest of the Ohio; and still pressed upon Congress "that policy and justice required that a country, unsettled at the commencement of the war, claimed by the British crown, and ceded to it by the treaty of Paris, if wrested from the common enemy by the blood and treasure of the thirteen States, should be considered as common property." In February, 1780, New York made her cession to accelerate the Federal alliance, and declared the territory ceded should be for the use and benefit of such of the United States as should become members of that alliance, and for no other use or purpose whatever." And although Virginia attempted for a while to vindicate her claim, yet, other States, feeling a strong attachment to Maryland, and conscious of the justice of her representations, disliked a partial Union, which would throw out of the pale a people standing, as Marylanders have always stood, among the bravest and most patriotic of our countrymen. The ordinance of Congress then followed, in October, 1780, declaring that the territory to be ceded by the States should be disposed of for the common benefit of the Union; and, on the second of January, 1781, Virginia, in that spirit of magnanimity which has generally prevailed in her councils, yielded up her claim, for the benefit of the whole Union. It is a remarkable circumstance that Maryland did not actually join the Union until after these cessions had been made by New York and Virginia, declaring, at the very moment, and by the very terms of her accession, that she "did not release, nor intend to relinquish, any part of her right and interest, with the other confederating States, to the Western territory." These facts, which have now become a part of the familiar history of the country, furnish curious reminiscences in these latter days, when a new light has broken in upon us to show that the new States have title to all the lands within their chartered limits, and when we are told it would be most magnanimous and becoming in us, who claim to have imbibed the spirit and sentiments of our forefathers, to cede away our patrimony for a nominal consideration. Let it be remembered that the feeling on this subject manifested by the two States of Delaware and Maryland, preventing their accession to the confederation until so late a period, was with difficulty repressed, even by that ardent attachment to the cause of liberty for which they were then so much distinguished, and in which they have never been surpassed. Their troops went through the whole contest together, flanking and supporting each other in battle, commonly led on by the same commander; generally the first to advance and the last to retreat; their bayonets, like the pikes of the Macedonian phalanx, glittering in front of one and the same compact mass; and when they fell, they slept in death together, on the same part of the blood-stained field. It was that same spirit which prompted the combined exertions of these people in the American cause, throughout the whole struggle, which also united them in resistance against every attempt on the part of any single section of the country to appropriate for its exclusive benefit the territory which they were striving to conquer from the British crown. Sir, I think they will now combine again; I think they will, when considering this subject, bestow some reflection upon the millions which have been expended in the subsequent purchase of the Southwestern portion of our public domain; on the sums which have been profusely lavished in making and carrying into effect our treaties for the extinguishment of the Indian title; in making the surveys of these lands, and in the payment of officers and agents for the maintenance of our land system. From the feeling which formerly actuated them, I judge that their co-operation on this subject will be such as to resist every effort to bribe them with promises, or to sway them, by means of political excitement, to give up that which could not be wrested from them by appeals to their strongest attachments in the darkest days of their adversity. They will claim, I think, sir, an equal portion of this territory, under the plain letter of the grants referred to. They may claim a large portion of it by the paramount title of the right of conquest, which has never been by them relinquished; and by that title they can successfully defend it. Whatever foundation there may be for the imputation of motives, in other sections of the Union, to flatter and to woo the West, by the offer to her of this splendid dowry, if she will transfer her influence to a candidate in a Presidential election, we, I believe, shall not take part in any such bargain. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GUNN] says the West has been already wooed and won. It may be so; but we are not, and, I think, shall never be, sub potestate viri; and if we could be bought for any consideration to sign this release of our birthright, we should never agree, like Esau, to sell it for a mess of pottage.

I come now, sir, to consider a subject which has been discussed in connexion with this—the right of a State to regulate her conduct by the judgment of her own self-constituted tribunals, upon the validity of an act of Congress in opposition to the solemn decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States: and my remarks upon it will be chiefly in reply to gentlemen who have gone before me. I confess I do not discover why the power of deciding any, and every question, growing out of any circumstances, in which a State may conceive her sovereignty impugned, is not translated to her own tribunals by the same train of argument which induces the conclusion that she may nullify an act of the Federal Legislature without the aid of the Federal Judiciary. We know—we are so taught by memorials on our files—that the doctrine is very current in some States of the West, that the public territory within their limits is their own; and we have been threatened that, when the population flowing Westward has transferred the balance of power beyond the Alleghany, or when, as one in this debate has phrased it, “the sceptre has departed from the old thirteen forever,” we shall find the rights of the new States asserted and maintained, if not by the force of numbers here, at least by the force of arms at home. In that case, too, it is said, that to us distance will be defeat. State sovereignty and State rights constitute the very war cry of a new party in this country. I would myself be among the last to infringe upon the constitutional powers of the States. But how far will the new doctrines on the subject carry us? Some who have engaged in this discussion have avowed the opinion that our claim to the public lands is inconsistent with the paramount rights of the Western States, and that, upon the fundamental principles of Government, the domain within their chartered limits is the property of these new grantees. Others, who stand among the boldest champions of the principle that a sovereign State may constitutionally and lawfully enforce her declarations against the validity of an act of Congress, and nullify it whenever by her judgment it is “deliberately, plainly, and palpably unconstitutional,” repudiate the whole doctrine of State supremacy, and State title, when we touch these claims to the public lands. The rule works badly then. The two positions assumed by the same reasoner are repugnant to each other. You cannot claim by virtue of your State sovereignty to nullify an act of Congress, and yet deny to another State the right, by a similar operation, to tear out of your statute book the leaf containing the Virginia grant, as well as that which bears upon it the act of Congress declaring the uses of that grant. By the grant and the act, the estate ceded is “for the common benefit.” The new sovereigns, within whose dominions the estate is situated, asserting their power to decide all questions which, in their judgment, touch their sovereignty, may nullify both, and make the land theirs; or, if they cannot, how can any other of these sovereigns nullify a tariff law, or an act for Internal Improvement, which the Federal Judiciary adjudges to be valid? The gentleman from Tennessee says that he will admit that the Supreme Court is the final arbiter in all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance of it. But I am not satisfied with this limitation. The words of the constitution are, “the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish.” Then this general transfer of power is explained by the second section of the same article: “The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States, between a State and citizens of another State, between citizens of different States, between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens or subjects.” All these words of the deed are in full force, except so far as it has been altered by the single amendatory article to prevent suits against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State. The instrument then contains no qualification of the judicial power restricting its exercise to cases arising out of laws made in pursuance of the constitution. The reservation is an inadvertent interpolation in the instrument, and the power granted extends to laws of the United States, whether constitutionally or unconstitutionally enacted. It will be seen, too, that the United States must “be a party to controversies” concerning a tariff law, as well as to those which affect the right to the public domain, or any other question touching State sovereignty; and that, if there be no authority in the instrument by which the judicial power can be extended to the former class of controversies, there is none to extend it to the latter class, or any case in which a single State may consider as presenting an infraction of her own powers. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ROWAN] and other Senators, have contended that a State cannot surrender any portion of her sovereignty, and we have been asked to produce an instance in which sovereignty has submitted itself to any judicial tribunal. Those who formed the constitution, in their recommendatory letter, signed by Washington, on the 17th of September, 1787, inform us that “it is obviously impracticable in the Federal Government of these States to secure all rights of independent sovereignty to each, and yet provide for the interest and safety of all.” The gentleman from Tennessee, in order to explain and construe the constitution, referred to the brief enumeration contained in this letter, of the specific objects which made it necessary to establish this Government. I refer to the same authority to overthrow the doctrine which regards all the rights of independent sovereignty in each of the States and to prove that some of those rights were, in the view of the convention, ceded to provide for the general welfare. States are not self-existent; they are created by the people for their benefit. Those who have conferred State power can take it away; and for their own good they have transferred a portion of this mysterious principle of sovereignty, which troubles gentlemen so much, to another place. They have transferred a portion of the judicial power to the Supreme Court, which acts as an impartial umpire, and not as an adversary party deciding his own cause, as is erroneously supposed by some reasoners here. The gentleman from Tennessee says the Federal Judiciary is, when a question of State rights is before it, a portion or part of one of the parties, created by the Legislative and Executive branches of the General Government, responsible to that Government alone, and liable to the imposition of destructive burthens by that party. Even if all this were correct, it would be a sufficient answer to it, when discussing this question, to reply that the States had agreed that the arbiter should be thus created and thus responsible, having signed the arbitration bond deliberately, and with a full knowledge of the consequences. But when we look into the instrument, we find that the States, by their Representatives in the Senate, must first consent to the appointment of the arbiter, or he is not lawfully chosen. They can challenge for cause, and they can challenge peremptorily. By refusing to consent to appointments, they might in time vacate every seat on the whole tribunal. By the Legislative power of their immediate Representatives in the Senate, responsible to the States as their only masters, they can always prevent the imposition of oppressive burthens on their common arbiters. They alone can try these arbiters on impeachment for misbehavior, and without impeachment those arbiters cannot be removed from office. The Senator from Kentucky objects to the Federal Judiciary, that a majority in Congress may by law increase the number of judges, and thus oppress the minority when they please. It has been said, too, that large States, with a great representation in Congress, such as New York and Pennsylvania, combining with others, may, by their superior vote, so far increase the number on the bench as to oppress and destroy the sovereignty of the lesser States. If the objection has any weight, it is one which could be made to our whole system of republican government. We are ruled by majorities; and if the majority of this nation should become radically corrupt, I admit that the Government will soon fall. But I have sufficient reliance on the virtue and good sense of the people, whether living in large or small States, to believe that no attempt will ever be deliberately made by a majority in either, to destroy the independence and legitimate powers of the other. And I feel no apprehensions on this subject, for other reasons. Let us inquire into the mode of operating. Supposing now, (to make out the gentleman's case) that the large States wickedly conspire to ruin the small ones. New York, Kentucky, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and North Carolina, being (as would be so probable!) united for this end, carry a bill through the other House to double the number of judges. Suppose, too, that they had by their votes elected a President who would second their views. When the bill comes before the Senate, if the small States understand your object, they, having an equal representation here, secured by the only provision in the constitution which numbers can never change, vote you down at once; and your combination (as other combinations may be) is consigned to —“that same ancient vault,

“Where all the kindred of the Capulets lie.”

But suppose the Senators representing the small States here, not suspecting mischief, but relying on your integrity, suffer the bill to pass. Your President being in the plot, as we will, for the sake of argument, suppose, it becomes a law. What then? The bench is not yet filled.

The modus operandi requires that he should nominate, and we should consent, to the appointment of the men who are to adjudge away our independence. We might be slow to suspect our old friends of dishonest purposes, but we can learn some things if you give us time. When you bring out your nominations, we cannot fail to understand your plan. You are caught at once, flagrante delicto, and we check you in the Senate, by rejecting all nominations which do not please us. We have two chances to put an effectual veto on your plot, and our veto is a very different affair from your State veto on an act of Congress. However thankful, therefore, we may be for the kindly apprehensions expressed for our welfare, we say that we are not yet alarmed. We cannot see, with the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, that the States have been guilty of either folly or weakness in creating such a tribunal as we conceive the Supreme Court of the United States to be—nor do we think with him, that, by the easiest operations imaginable, this creature is so competent to the destruction of its creators.

But whatever may have been the opinion of honorable gentlemen, the folly of the people of these States in creating such a tribunal, or however incompetent it may appear to decide these matters, the question still recurs, Is there any other forum established with co-extensive or with appellate powers? If so, what is it? There ought not to be a wrong without a remedy; and the interest and safety of all require the existence of some arbiter to decide controversies. We are warned, however, that if, by the constitution, there be not some express grant of power for this purpose, the States and the people still reserve it. On the other hand, if the grant to the Federal Judiciary be express, the States have not reserved it, and can create no other without forming a new constitution or violating this. Sir, I listened with deep interest to the development of what I thought was announced as a new discovery on this subject. I will consider that adverted to, and recommended, by the gentleman from Tennessee, [MR. GRANGER.] After conceding to the Federal Judiciary the powers of a common umpire, to decide on the constitutionality of all congressional enactments made in pursuance of the constitution, he informed us that there was another tribunal to which a State might resort, when oppressed by what she considered to be a plain, palpable, and dangerous violation of the constitution, without throwing herself out of the Union. He admitted that the Legislature of the State was not this tribunal. That might be mislaid. He beats the ground, then, which was occupied by the gentleman from South Carolina, [MR. HAYNE] but himself takes a new position, not less dangerous. For he informed us that a State convention might be called, and that might nullify the oppressive law; after which, he thought Congress must acquiesce by abandoning the power. The amount of this is, that one State is to govern all the rest, whenever she may choose to declare, by convention, that a law is unconstitutional. The end of this, we say, is war—civil war. We admit that a State convention may pronounce any law to be unconstitutional, as the Legislature of Virginia did in '98. But the mere declaration comes to nothing, unless it can be enforced. You may declare a law unconstitutional, and so can I. But what of that? It amounts only to this: we have full freedom of speech in this country, may advocate what opinions we please, and peaceably endeavor to impress them upon others. But the gentleman says this doctrine does not lead to war. If Congress will not submit to the State, he thinks there is still a complete political salvo in another tribunal, and that is a convention of the States, to be called under the provisions of the constitution. The State, then, must exert herself until Congress, two-thirds deeming it necessary, under the fifth article, shall propose amendments to the constitution; or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

call a convention for proposing amendments, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths of them, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the constitution. So far this does not contravene the doctrine which we advocate, and which the Senator from New Hampshire, if I rightly understood him, after much preface, and with some "slips of prolixity," finally settled down upon as a part of the true orthodox creed. The right to amend the constitution has never been denied. This was a part of the political platform upon which my honorable friend from Missouri [Mr. BARTON] invited you to come and stand with us. If the convention of the States should assemble and decide by a majority of three-fourths against the State, the gentleman from Tennessee says the State must submit. But if they decide otherwise, or do not decide at all, Congress must submit to the State. Without assenting to this last conclusion, which appears to be arbitrarily assumed, I will only inquire, if this be so, how is this tribunal to save us from civil war? The answer is, only by so amending the constitution as to warp it to suit the declarations of the State convention. This is an excellent remedy for the complaint of the State, but rather difficult to procure. If this is the sovereign panacea which the honorable Senator from Tennessee has discovered for healing the diseases of the South, sir, I fancy she will agree with me in commending her physician for his ingenuity in finding out the ingredients of the bolus, but she will still think they are too hard to be obtained to render the prescription valuable to her. With less experience, I would recommend to a State groaning under the operation of a law which she deems unconstitutional, to apply first to the Federal Judiciary, where she will generally obtain relief, if her complaint be not hypochondria or imaginary ill. If she fail there, let her pour her complaints into the ears of her sisters, and use all constitutional means to procure a repeal of the obnoxious law. A bare majority of Congress will be sufficient to give her relief in this way. Do you object that Congress will probably persevere in their course, and refuse to repeal the law they have enacted? It may be so; and if so, their constituents, being a majority of the people, must concur with them, that the law is not only constitutional, but salutary, or they would, by the exercise of the elective franchise, remove such unworthy agents of their sovereign will. If they do concur with their Representatives, and uphold them in their refusal to repeal the law, no matter how often by any other power than the Federal Judiciary declared to be unconstitutional, in my humble judgment you will hardly persuade three-fourths of them to assemble for the purpose of altering their constitution, and depriving their own agents of the power of acting on the subject.

It comes at last, then, to this—that we have no other direct resource, in the cases we have been considering, to save us from the horrors of anarchy, than the Supreme Court of the United States. That tribunal has decided a hundred such cases, and many under the most menacing circumstances. Several States have occasionally made great opposition to it. Indeed it would seem that in their turn most of the sisters of this great family have fretted for a time, sometimes threatening to break the connexion and form others; but in the end, nearly all have been restored, by the dignified and impartial conduct of our common umpire, to perfect good humor. Should that umpire ever lose its high character for justice and impartiality, we have a corrective in the form of our Government; but if it is to be had only by a calm and temperate appeal to the judgment and feelings of the whole American people, it can never be obtained by such addresses and resolutions as those of Colleton or Abbeville. Reason receives not in place of argument violent denunciations or furious appeals to party and passion. During a period of four or five years past, the complaints of the South have, for this reason, met with a cold reception in almost every other section of the Union. They have been loud and deep; but they have been evidently regarded as the transient effusions of party feeling, coming, as they too often did, couched in language of bitter vituperation, with the now stale and despicable charges of "coalition, bargain, and corruption"—that vile and putrescent stuff which has at length, as the Senator from Massachusetts truly stated, sloughed off and gone down into the kennel forever. The course pursued was exactly that which was best calculated to make the whole alleged grievances, if real, irremediable. Those who loved and admired the character of the Statesman of the West, indignant at the calumnies with which he, as they saw, was so unjustly assailed, often regarded the complaints which came with them as mere secondary considerations, brought in to aid a personal attack. On the other hand, many of those who affected to accredit these calumnies for political effect, in their hearts never sincerely believed any part of the story of Southern sufferings, thinking perhaps that they knew best what weight was to be attached to the political falsehoods which commonly accompanied them. However different their objects, they were really on the same chase; but to the Southern huntsman the game taken has been of no benefit. From a recent demonstration, we perceive that the Southern complaint is now not even deemed worthy of a hearing. Sir, when I witnessed the manly and candid manner in which the honorable Senator from South Carolina on my right [Mr. SUMNER] spoke of the grievances of his constituents, when I saw him evidently soaring above mere party feeling, menancing none, denouncing none, and touching with all the delicacy which characterizes him, the subjects in difference between us, the reflection forced itself irresistibly on my mind, how different might have been the reception of these complaints, had they always come thus recommended. South Carolina, though crring in a controversy with her sisters, would by all have been believed to have been honestly wrong; and if, under such circumstances, she should ever throw herself out of the pale of the Union in consequence of such a misconception of the constitution as we have endeavored to prevent, I would rather see my own constituents stripped of the property acquired under the protection furnished by the Government to their honest industry, than compelled by any vote of mine here to drive the steel with which we should arm our citizens into the bosoms of that gallant people. And I will now say, without meaning to express any further opinion on this delicate subject, that, for myself, whenever pounds, shillings, and pence, alone, shall be arrayed against the infinite blessings of the Union, I shall unhesitatingly prefer the latter, for the simple reason that I can never learn how to "calculate its value."

The honorable member from New Hampshire, in the progress of his very ingenious remarks, discussed, in connexion with the constitutional power of the Judiciary, the whole doctrine of Internal Improvement, as well as the Tariff. He denounced both as aggressions of the Federal Government on the rights of the States, as measures evincive of and flowing from a disposition, on the part of some, to claim for that Government unlimited powers; and endeavored to make it appear that these acts for internal improvement were, and ever had been, federal heresies, while the opposite and restrictive tenets, limiting us to the strict exercise of certain enumerated and specific powers, had always distinguished your genuine democrat and only true republican. The honorable member informed us that, by the prevalence of this strict construction of the constitution over the latitudinarian doctrines, the great political revolution of 1800 was effected, and that his mode of construction had ever since remained "the watch word of democracy" and the strongest "test of political orthodoxy." He showed us by these means how "the matchless spirit of the West," the great advocate of the principles so denounced, had always been a federalist, while on the other hand he barely intimated that a matchless spirit in the South had perhaps been misrepresented on the same subject. The intimation that the views of one statesman had been misunderstood, was accompanied by the admission that there might be differences, and possibly honest differences, on the same subject, in the same party. This was all well, and my only reason for adverting to it is to express my regret that so charitable a salvo was not extended beyond the party line. But we were afterwards told by the honorable member, that the resemblance between the political character of the opposition and administration parties, in 1798, 1812, and 1828, confers upon him, and his political friends, "a title to old fashioned democracy, as the same democratic States, with one or two exceptions only, are found, [he says] at each era, side by side, in favor of Jefferson, Madison, and the hero of Orleans. On one side, Virginia and Pennsylvania, Carolina and Georgia, Tennessee and Kentucky. On the other, Delaware and Massachusetts, Connecticut and divided Maryland." I shall hereafter take leave to present to the view of the honorable member some coincidences much more striking than that which here appear to have caught his fancy. Keeping in view now the position assumed by him in regard to the federalism of the Western Statesman, and other advocates of Internal Improvement, I would inquire into the title to "old fashioned democracy" of Georgia, Carolina, and other Southern States, here designated by him, on the 14th of March, 1818, when twenty-one of their Representatives in the other House carried the resolution which fully established this "federal" heresy—declaring "that Congress has power, under the constitution, to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, military, and other roads, and for the improvement of water courses."

Four of the seven Representatives from South Carolina; Mr. Lowndes, Mr. Simkins, Mr. Middleton, and Mr. Erwin, voted for this resolution, the two first named gentlemen advocating, in the debate to which it gave rise, the power of Congress to construct roads and canals. When the resolution was adopted, Mr. Lowndes declared that the decision then made had settled the whole question. Two thirds of the Georgia delegation, Mr. Abbott, Mr. J. Crawford, Mr. Terrill, and Mr. Forsyth, now an honorable Senator from that State, supported the same resolution. Did Carolina and Georgia then forfeit their "title to old fashioned democracy?" Shall we not try them, too, as well as Delaware and Massachusetts, by the "strongest test of political orthodoxy?" If Delaware is here to be put on trial, she will stand his test admirably. Though generally federal until 1826, when the new parties were formed, she was almost uniformly represented in this Senate, up to that period, by federal gentlemen, holding on this subject the very tenets of the honorable member himself, always confining the powers of the Government to the specific and enumerated objects; and opposed alike to these acts for internal improvement and tariff laws. In 1827 and 1828, she was represented here by two able statesmen of the opposite and latitudinarian creed, both of whom had been federalists; but at that time, sir, they were dyed in the wool by the Jackson process, and, of course, were genuine republicans, as the honorable member will admit. They neither changed nor concealed their opinions. Were they not "orthodox?" One of them standing conspicuous for his talents in the ranks of the orthodox party, now, by their appointment, represents us at the proudest court in Europe. It cannot be necessary to follow out the inquiry further, to try the truth of his test by a reference to musty records and by-gone events. If the honorable member will pursue it, he will soon find himself, by the aid of such a test, involved in the mazes of a labyrinth, from which he could not escape in safety, even with the thread of an Ariadne to guide him. Sir, the whole of this part of the gentleman's ingenious argument is admirably calculated ad captandum, as it makes all our canals, rail roads, and turnpikes, which have required the assistance of Congress, the works of that anathematized "peace party in war," which, as we have been told here, has been thus struggling, since the earliest period of our history, to confer upon our rulers absolute power; and I will now dismiss it, that it may perform the duties of its mission, with this single remark, that you may perceive, peeping through its foregone conclusions, how the bent of the gentleman's mind, in condemning Southern votes, is evidently at this time inclining with a breeze to the north northeast—though I still suppose that, "when the wind is southerly, he will know a hawk from a hand-saw."

So far as the State which I have the honor in part to represent here, can furnish evidence to illustrate the title of the honorable member, and his political associates, to "old fashioned democracy," by the fact that a party odious to them has always prevailed there, he is welcome to the evidence for his own uses. It will never redound to her discredit. It can never be a cause of exultation to any man who knows the history of his own country, and values his own reputation, to find her always arrayed against him. And as the honorable member has called my attention to the subject, I will remind him what kind of a "peace party in war" we have always had in Delaware. We have ever had such a party there as "beware of entrance to a quarrel," but, being once engaged in it, puts forth all its energies of body and soul in the controversy, and for the love of peace fairly fights out of it. We had a party of this kind at the bloody era of the American Revolution, contending against the usurpations of the British Crown—a party which supplied more warriors in the cause of American liberty, in proportion to our limited means and population, than were furnished by any other State in the whole confederation. The bones of many of that old party were buried on Long Island, and at White Plains, at Princeton, at Brandywine, at Germantown, at Camden, at Guilford, at Eutaw, and at Yorktown; and your pension rolls now show but fourteen of them alive and dependent on your bounty. Many of that party were at Fort Mifflin too; and the gentleman from Maryland, [General SMITH] the father of the American Senate, [himself one of the most distinguished patriots of the Revolution] who commanded there, when referring in debate a few days since to the conduct of one of them, Captain Hazzard, bore testimony to that kind of peace-loving disposition in war which we cherish, when, almost overpowered by the emotion caused by a recurrence to the sad history of the sufferings of his gallant comrades, he described our old peace party troops as soldiers than whom better or braver had never existed. I am told that we had federalists who opposed the declaration of the last war, but those very federalists, like their brethren of the opposite party, supported the cause of their country through the whole war, with unbending firmness and devoted patriotism. We have national republicans, I am now told; but as they are made up of the same kind of materials which compose the peace parties I have been describing, I shall be pardoned if I defer to other judgment than that of the gentleman from New Hampshire, and say that I am proud to represent them here, even though, by so doing, I am placed in opposition to an administration which claims to be exclusively democratic, and yet appoints more federalists to office than all its predecessors have done since the revolution of 1801—always, nevertheless, keeping steadily in view this indispensable qualification, that every federalist so appointed must be of the Jackson stamp. I shall ever feel attachment for that party which seeks in peace to prepare for war, by extending the beneficent action of this Government to increase the means of our defence, makes roads and canals to transport our munitions in time of need, fortifies our coast, improves our harbors, protects our commerce, and has already built up a navy which is the glory of our country and the admiration of the world.

Sir, I must be pardoned for dwelling at length in reply to other remarks of the honorable member from New Hampshire, whose opinions and reasoning are regarded by some of his political friends here as laying down the law, and fixing the standard of political orthodoxy. When he had closed his remarks, the Senator from Missouri near him, [Mr. BENTON] arose in his place, and pronounced the honorable gentleman to be his Peter, the rock on which he would build the great democratic church.

[Mr. BENTON having risen to explain, Mr. CLAYTON gave way for the purpose.

Mr. BENTON—I did not say, “this is my Peter.” I said, “yes, this is Peter, and this Peter is the rock on which the church of New England democracy shall be built.” This is what I said aloud, and what the Senate heard. What I said in a lower tone, and not intended for the Senate, was this: “and the gates of hell shall not prevail against him.”]

Mr. CLAYTON resumed: Sir, I accept this modification, and wish to present fairly, not only all the words, whether spoken on a high or a low key, but the action which was so admirably adapted to them. The gentleman from Missouri, then, in the face of the Senate, extended his right arm over the head of the gentleman from New Hampshire, with all the majesty of a Cardinal, or a full robed Bishop about to pronounce a benediction on a new monarch, or to install a new incumbent of the Papal See, and, as he now says, did not merely declare him to be his Peter, but announced him to the world as the great Pontiff of New England democracy; and, of course, I suppose, (as that, by his former admissions, is as good as any) of all other democracy under the whole heavens. Sir, I had the right to suppose that he who thus inducted him to office had full powers, or he would not have performed the ceremony. Give me leave to say, that, when I heard the new Pontiff lay down his law in conformity with my old fashioned notions of the powers of the Judiciary, abjuring, as a political heresy, all the new “Carolina doctrine,” though seemingly endorsed by the Senator from Missouri himself, I thought that I should stand at least one of the new “tests of political orthodoxy,” and I sincerely hoped that, on this subject, nothing might prevail against him. When he issued this, his first bull, I felt disposed to register all his rescripts, and I certainly have preached the very doctrine which it inculcated. But when I heard the American System denounced as a mere federal measure; when I heard, too, from the same source, that a good officer ought to be removed before the regular expiration of his term, for party motives, or personal aggrandizement, and the whole proscriptive system of the new administration thus justified and extolled, then, sir, I confess (meaning nothing irreverent by my allusions) that I became a Dissenter and a Protestant, and, although I expect indulgence for such transgressions, I strongly suspect that I shall carry my abominable heresies to the grave.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. BARRON] having, in the range of this debate, invited the concurrence of others in certain fundamental principles and important objects, enumerated among the number the preservation of the freedom and purity of elections, unawed by official punishments, and uncorrupted by official rewards, in opposition to removals from office for the exercise of the great elective franchise, or to make room for the reward of partisans in our Presidential elections, by the bestowal of public employments. He submitted that the power of removals from office by the President was a high legal trust to be exercised for the public benefit, in sound discretion, for cause relating to the official conduct or fitness of the incumbent; that the Senate of the United States had restraining powers in the matter of displacing, as well as of appointing Federal officers: and that, by the constitution, the Executive power could never be arbitrarily exercised. He advocated “the freedom of inquiry into the exercise of Executive discretion and official trust in opposition to Executive irresponsibility and unsearchableness, and to the suppression of free inquiry into our political affairs.” The Senator from Maine [Mr. HOLMES] merely adverted to the general proscription in New England. In reply to these gentlemen, the Senator from New Hampshire says he will not accept the invitation of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON] to stand on his new political platform, composed, as he considers it, of articles of opposition to the present administration; defends the whole course of that administration, as “democratic and constitutional,” and informs us that, in the principle of removal from office, for even political motives, their policy only follows up the doctrines of the great revolution in 1800. He speaks of these removals as mere rotation in office, first made by the people themselves, in the highest office in the land, the Chief Executive of the Union, for political cause; then inquires, triumphantly, if the same cause should not affect the active deputies and subordinates, as well as the principal. “Whatever disappointments and sufferings by removal [says he] some individuals may sustain, yet they knew the legal tenure of their offices.” He, therefore, thinks the agents of the people cannot fear the cry of cruelty or persecution, because the power of removal, as now exercised, only “changes one good man” (that is, for political opinions) “for another good man,” and, therefore, does no injury to the public. He then proceeds to say these agents need not dread the discussion of the constitutionality of their exercise of this power, thus plainly avowed by him to have been levelled at the right of opinion. Sir, the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GRUNDY] if I rightly understood him, avowed the same opinions: for he denied the right of the Senate to inquire into the causes of removal, and insisted that the present administration had not gone beyond his principles on this subject. He contended that the Senate would transcend their constitutional power, and thus violate the instrument which it is their interest to preserve, by examining into and judging of the propriety of removals from office, or by controlling the Executive in the discharge of this branch of his authority. He entered into a full discussion of the rights of the President with great ingenuity, and manfully challenges us “to come out boldly, and discuss this subject with his friends freely and frankly.” The honorable gentleman is a formidable antagonist. He wields a long knife, with a strong arm, in defence of his friends; but when he throws down his gauntlet to what is here called the Opposition, and defies us to a contest with these principles of this administration, he will be met freely, frankly, and boldly too.

Another year has rolled away. Our Ides of March are come. This day, which is the anniversary of the Chief Magistrate's inauguration, brings with it some strange reminiscences of the past, and some still stranger anticipations of the future. On the last 4th of March, and about this very hour of the day, the American Senate followed the American President in the progress of his stately triumph to that scene where, in the presence of assembled thousands of his countrymen, he proclaimed to the world the principles upon which he intended to administer the government. Independently of the fact, that the whole subject has been thrust into this debate, as I have stated, there seems to be some propriety in devoting a portion of the passing hour to the consideration of the extent and influence of Executive authority. These, on this day, would be proper subjects of reflection for the Chief Magistrate himself; and as we are his constitutional advisers, exercising, in one sense, a portion of the Executive power, we may learn our own duty better by the temperate examination of his. I concur with the gentleman that, in discussing this, or any other subject, involving a question of constitutional law, passion and feeling are to be regarded as poor auxiliaries. We should go for nobler game than mere party interests. Principles are to be first settled here; but then the application of them must be fearlessly made. The first inquiry ought to be, what are the true principles, not what is the interest, of any party? It will be found that my view of these principles differs as much, in some respects, from those of some to whose judgment I usually defer, as it does, in others, from those of some who profess to be politically arrayed against me.

The power of removal is nowhere expressly conferred by the constitution, except in the section which provides that all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, or on conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. A judge, the tenure of whose office is dum bene se gesserit, is removable only by this means. But where good behavior is not the tenure of office, the power of removal is properly and generally incident to, and a consequence of, the power of appointment. The power to destroy is ordinarily implied from the power to create. It is a common axiom of our jurisprudence, that the authority to dissolve a thing must be as high as that which formed it. The Legislature which has the express power to pass a law for raising revenue, for example, has the necessary power to repeal it. The Governors of many of the States enjoy, by express provisions in their respective constitutions, the power of appointment to office, and yet exercise, by construction and by implication only, the power of removal from it, their State constitutions being silent on that subject. The Postmaster General, who, harmonizing with this administration, has removed, within the last year, his thousand deputies, agents, and clerks, though vested by law with the express right of appointing them, can point you to no statute conferring upon him the right to remove one of them. The numerous clerks and agents appointed under express legal provisions, by other Heads of Departments here, are removable only by the same construction. The law has conferred upon the Supreme Court the power of appointing its clerk, and, although considered removable by it, yet no law has thus limited the tenure of his office in express terms. But then this authority, thus derived from implication and construction, if kept within the spirit of the constitution and the laws, instead of being used arbitrarily or tyrannically, can be exercised only for the public welfare.

In two classes of cases, the power of appointment is exercised by the President alone: first, where Congress have, by law, vested in him the appointment of such inferior officers as they thought proper: and, secondly, where he is empowered to make appointments by virtue of the last clause in the second section of the second article. There are some peculiar considerations growing out of the manner in which the power of removal, in the first of these classes, has been exercised, which it is unnecessary to enter into now, as they are not immediately connected with the executive rights of the Senate. Appointments of the second class are temporary only by the express provisions of the clause which authorizes them. "The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session." With these exceptions, the second section referred to expressly confers the power of appointment upon the President and Senate, by the words "he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint."

Although the constitution has thus recognized the Senate as an essential component part of the appointing authority, yet the power of removal has been uniformly exercised by the President alone, since the constitution was established. This, then, has been a deviation from the general principle that the right to remove can be exercised only where the right to appoint exists. But I do not concur with the honorable gentlemen who have viewed this power as unlimited by the spirit of the constitution, and, having arrived at the conclusion that sic volo is the legal tenure of office, would leave it to become the sport of a spirit not less arbitrary and tyrannical than that of absolute despotism. Every administration, preceding this, has professed to exercise this power within certain established constitutional limitations, regarding removals as expedients to be resorted to by the President only for the purpose of securing a faithful execution of the laws, or when really necessary for the general welfare. And if a single instance can be shown in which any President before this has ever prostituted this authority to party uses, or for personal aggrandizement, it will be found that he has, at least in terms, assumed the virtue of administering the Government on different principles, and denied that he intended to invade the right of opinion, or pervert his power from its legitimate object. The history, as well of the precedent on which the Senator from Tennessee so much relies, as of others to which he has not adverted, shows that this constructive power would have never been acknowledged, if it had not been supposed to have been strictly limited and distinctly defined.

When the bill "for establishing an Executive Department, to be called the Department of Foreign Affairs," was under the consideration of the House of Representatives, during the first session of Congress after the adoption of the constitution, the debate to which the gentleman from Tennessee has referred arose upon one of its provisions, granting to the President the right of removing the Secretary to whom our foreign relations were to be principally entrusted. That provision was then so modified as not to carry with it the appearance of a grant of something not before given, but to recognize a constitutional power of removal already subsisting in the President. The power was strongly denied by Mr. Gerry and Mr. Roger Sherman, and maintained by Mr. Madison and Mr. Baldwin. These gentlemen had all been members of the convention that made the constitution, and yet were thus equally divided in opinion on the construction of the very instrument which they had, so recently before that, assisted in forming. The point, then, was regarded as extremely doubtful. There were others, who had not been members of the convention, who engaged on different sides, with equal zeal in the contest, until at length, a construction implying the existence of the power was established, so far as a tribunal which had no jurisdiction over the subject could do it, by a vote of thirty-four to twenty. It has often been observed, and I apprehend it is unquestionably true, that the character of Washington, then President of the United States, had great influence in producing this decision. Add to this, too, that the question arose in the very strongest case which could have been presented for the advocates of the Executive—the case of a Secretary, between whom and the President it was absolutely necessary that the most confidential relations should subsist. These supporters of Executive authority were then, as men will ever be, influenced, in some degree, by the circumstances immediately around them. The statesmen of the day literally vied with each other in expressions of their high confidence in the man who then filled the Chair of State, beloved by all, and distrusted by none; and it is but too evident, from the arguments advanced on this occasion, that they were beguiled by the imagination that none but beings of such exalted virtue and spotless purity would ever be elected to succeed him. They reasoned from an illusion to which human nature is at all times liable. Under such circumstances, a principle was decided, which forms a distinct exception to an established general rule; and, it cannot escape observation, that, under other auspices, a very different result would probably have been produced by the deliberations of 1789. The discussion to sustain this power mainly rested on these brief positions: that the constitution had conferred upon the President the Executive power; that the general concession of Executive authority embraced removals as well as appointments; that the power granted to the Senate, being an exception to this general provision, ought, therefore, to be construed strictly, and could not be extended beyond the express right (with its necessary incidents) of negating appointments; and, above all, that the President, being bound to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," must therefore remove, whenever the public interest imperiously requires it. The last position, aided by all the extraneous considerations referred to, was successful. Every reasoner dwelt upon it as the key-stone of the argument. It was not then contended, by the fathers of the republic, that the general grant of Executive power was to be construed alone by the strict specifications of it, subsequently entered in the same instrument. True, our modern reasoners revolt at the thought of extending the powers of Congress beyond the specific enumeration of them, by a general grant of "all legislative power;" and although the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire has informed us that the friends of this administration, claiming the authority to remove, in its utmost latitude, need not dread the discussion of their right to do so, yet he has, in this very debate, stoutly denied a construction to the general delegation of power to Congress in the constitution "to provide for the general welfare," similar to the one placed, in 1789, upon the general delegation of Executive power, "to take care that the laws shall be faithfully executed." Without this latitudinarian interpretation, the power of removal would have remained forever, on the general principle, in the President and Senate. But it was not urged, in 1789, by any man, that this constructive power was unlimited and absolute; on the contrary, gauging it by the strict standard of the rule which defined while it conferred it, they declared that it was given to the President only for the purpose of "securing a faithful execution of the laws," as an incident to his great prerogative to preside over his country for his country's good. They pointed out the very cases for its proper exercise: they said it was necessary to remove a traitor from office, "to secure a faithful execution of the laws;" they urged that an officer who should become insane, corrupt, disabled, or in any manner, or by any means, unfaithful or disqualified to serve the public to the public advantage, ought to be, and was, of right, removable, in order "to secure a faithful execution of the laws;" and, having thus measured and marked down the length, breadth, and the depth, of the whole principle recognized by them, they doubtless little expected that any opinion given, or precedent set by them, would ever be adduced to sanction the exercise of uncontrolled and despotic power. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee, who has filled the office of a judge with great credit to himself, says, that he loves precedents, and, having informed us that "Mr. Madison understood the constitution and structure of our Government as well as any man that ever lived," holds up the Congressional Register of that day, points to the opinion of that able statesman there given, and triumphantly announces that there we may see his doctrines, and there his constitutional lawyer. Sir, we may venture here, I think, to meet the gentleman on his own grounds. I say, too, that, like others from the schools of forensic disputation, I love precedents; and that Mr. Madison, on this subject, is also my constitutional lawyer. But then, when I like the opinion of a constitutional lawyer so well, I take the whole, and not merely a part of it. I do not gratuitously reject one-half of it, while I rely so much upon the other. I read from the same volume, Mr. Madison's words, uttered on that same occasion, that "the dismissal of a meritorious officer was an abuse of power above his conception, and would merit impeachment." Again, he qualifies the power he advocates, and explains it thus: "The danger then consists in this: for the President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it. What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power, and the restraints to operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeachable by this House, before the Senate, for such an act of mal-administration; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust." Our constitutional lawyer, then, thinks your President ought to be removed from office, if he has acted on the principle avowed by his friends here, and says, the kind of power you contend for is above his conception. This does not seem to work well; and perhaps you may now think our constitutional lawyer, "who understood the constitution and structure of the Government as well as any man that ever lived," in an error. Then let us look into the opinions of others, expressed on the same occasion, who were aiding in the establishment of this precedent, admired so much. Mr. Laurence, though an advocate of the same power, denied that, according to his understanding of it, it was ever to be exercised "in a wanton manner, or from capricious motives;" and, with a view to silence the apprehensions of those who were alarmed lest it might be exercised without restraint, he put to them the question which had been answered by Mr. Madison: "Would he (the President) not be liable to impeachment for displacing a worthy and able man, who enjoyed the confidence of the people?" Mr. Vinson, on the same side, remarked "that, if the President should remove a valuable officer, it would be an act of tyranny which the good sense of the nation would never forget." Such were the views of all the prominent advocates of this right, at that time. Do I go an inch, then, beyond your own authority, when I infer, from the opinions of the very men upon whose judgment you now build, that the system of removing meritorious officers, before the regular expiration of their terms of service, for either personal or party motives, is hostile to the spirit of the constitution, an "impeachable mal-administration" of the Government, and a "tyrannical" encroachment on the liberties of the people?

But when we trace the history of the same bill in its progress through the Senate, it seems not to admit of a doubt that, but for the extraordinary concurrence of extraneous circumstances then co-operating to produce this construction, the right of removal would never have been recognized. While that bill was under consideration in this House, on the 18th July, 1789, a motion was made to strike out of the clause, implying the existence of the right, the words "by the President of the United States;" the object of which was to deny that right altogether. The Senate then sat with closed doors, and we have no account of the discussion. But we see from the records how the vote stood. Mr. Madison's constitutional opinions were then unpopular in Virginia, as being too latitudinarian; in consequence of which he had lost his election to the Senate, that State being, at the period referred to, represented here by William Grayson and Richard Henry Lee. Both those gentlemen voted against the power, and in favor of the motion to strike out; and I suppose that the doctrine of strict constructions of Executive power was at that time, as it often since has been, the prevailing sentiment of the State. Georgia, South Carolina, and New Hampshire, were all united against the power, and they were supported by Johnson, of Connecticut, and Maclay, of Pennsylvania. Among the friends of the motion we find Johnson, Few, of Georgia; Butler, of South Carolina, and Langdon, of New Hampshire, who had all been members of the Federal Convention. Nine voted for the striking out, and nine against it; and Mr. Adams, the Vice President, having given a casting vote in favor of the power, the words were retained. So the honorable gentleman from Tennessee will perceive that he owes the whole of his favorite precedent at last to that same "elder Adams," the "tendencies of whose opinions" were, if we are to rely on his friend from New Hampshire, "to consolidation and monarchy." I do not call his attention to this fact, however; because I concur in any of these sweeping denunciations of that great patriot. The same question arose again in the Senate on the 4th of August, 1789, on a motion to strike out of the bill "to establish an Executive Department, to be denominated the Department of War," the words, "and who, whenever the said principal officer shall be removed from office by the President of the United States;" and again, on the same day, pending the bill "to provide for the government of a territory Northwest of the Ohio," which contained a clause recognizing the right to remove the Governor of the territory. Similar decisions followed in each of these cases; so that the question was, within three weeks, thrice decided here; and these decisions form the grounds upon which the power, under its proper constitutional restraints, has ever since been claimed for the Executive. These facts, I submit, leave not a shadow of a doubt that, without the influence which the character of the Father of his Country was calculated to produce upon the minds of the Senators, many of whom were his old compatriots and most intimate friends, and without the powerful co-operation of Mr. Adams, the decisions would have been different. Under such circumstances, I would pause to inquire whether it is reasonable to suppose that the understanding of those Senators, who so established this power, was, that the President, upon whom it was conferred, was to exercise it without limitation? Is it probable that uncontrolled and absolute authority would have been acknowledged then, and that, too, by a body of men whose patriotism and devotion to the cause of liberty have never been surpassed?

The opinions of Mr. Adams, on this subject, are probably in a great measure attributable to a belief which he had indulged, in opposition to the Federal Convention, that the power of the Senate, in regard to appointments, ought to have been entrusted to "a council selected by the President himself at his pleasure"—in fact, a mere privy council, without the authority to check him. He thought that the people would be jealous that the influence of the Senate, if it were entrusted with appointments, would "be employed to conceal, connive at, and defend, guilt in Executive officers, instead of being a guard and watch upon them, and a terror to them." These opinions are disclosed in a correspondence which took place between him and Roger Sherman, in the summer of 1789. With these opinions, thus known to have been entertained by him at the very time when he decided by his casting vote, he went far, we now find, to destroy the rights of the Senate, and to reduce it to a mere privy council, without any effective power. In that correspondence Mr. Sherman, who had been a member of the convention, urged against such opinions the views of that convention, which ought to have been decisive in favor of the rights of the Senate. "But," said he, "if the President was left to select a council for himself, though he may be supposed to be actuated by the best motives, yet he would be surrounded by flatterers, who would assume the character of friends and patriots, though they had no attachment to the public good, no regard to the laws of their country, but, influenced wholly by self-interest, would wish to extend the power of the Executive in order to increase their own; they would often advise him to dispense with laws that should thwart their schemes, and in excuse plead that it was done from necessity to promote the public good: they will use their own influence, induce the President to use his to get laws repealed, or the constitution altered to extend his powers and prerogatives, under pretext of advancing the public good, and gradually render the Government a despotism. This seems to be according to the course of human affairs, and what may be expected from the nature of things." The views of Mr. Adams on this subject appear to have been different from those of any other man who participated in the decisions of 1789, of which we have any information now, as well as from those of the Federal Convention itself.

It is true that Washington exercised this power during his administration. The gentleman from Tennessee produced nine cases as the result of his industrious researches, which had occurred during the whole eight years in which Washington presided, to justify the hundreds which have been made in the first year of this administration. But in every instance, Washington's removals were made (and it will not be denied) only when necessary for the public good, exactly complying with the rule which had been established. In announcing the exercise of this right to the Senate, he used the word "superseded" instead of "removed," or "dismissed," which were subsequently adopted by his successors. But whether he did or did not consider the removals as provisional, and dependent on the future action of the Senate, we have no distinct information. On all occasions he manifested the highest respect for its concurrent powers in the business of Executive appointment, and prescribed a duty for a President, which has certainly not been regarded as such by one of his successors, when, in his message of the 9th of February, 1790, containing a few nominations to supply vacancies which had been temporarily filled in the recess, he says, "these appointments will expire with your present session, and, indeed, ought not to endure longer than until others can be regularly made."

The gentleman from Tennessee informed us of twenty-three cases in which Mr. Jefferson had removed; and then read, to justify the immense proscription now made, his answer of the 12th July, 1801, to a remonstrance of the committee of the merchants of New Haven, on the appointment of Samuel Bishop to the office of collector at New Haven, then lately vacated by the death of David Austin. That letter was doubtless written under some excitement, caused by the memorial itself; and the fame of Mr. Jefferson is rescued from the imputation now attempted to be cast upon it by better evidence. Yet even in this answer, he places his removal upon the ground that it was for the public good, and to secure the necessary co-operation with the Government; expressly stating, too, that his general object was to remedy the very evil now complained of. "During the late administration," says he, "the whole offices of the United States were monopolized by a sect." He considered that the former incumbents had been appointed merely for party and personal aggrandizement, and not for the public welfare. Try the present abuses of power by the standard of that letter, and you find yourselves standing on the very doctrine which he repudiated, and the deleterious effects of which he says he endeavored to correct. "I shall correct the procedure; but, that done, return with joy to that state of things when the only question concerning a candidate shall be, Is he honest?—is he capable?—is he faithful to the constitution?" The last administration removed no man for party motives, before the regular expiration of his term, and even went beyond the line prescribed by Mr. Jefferson, by regularly re-appointing political opponents when their offices had expired. You now rest, therefore, on the principles which Mr. Jefferson attributed to the elder Adams, and your policy, as avowed here by the Senator from New Hampshire, does not "follow up the doctrines of the great revolution of 1800." This construction of the answer to the New Haven remonstrance makes Mr. Jefferson consistent with himself. In his letter to Mr. Gerry, of the 29th March, 1801, he says: "Officers who have been guilty of gross abuses of office, such as marshals packing juries, &c. I shall now remove, as my predecessors ought in justice to have done. The instances will be few, and guided by strict rule, and not party passion. The right of opinion shall suffer no invasion from me. Those who have acted well have nothing to fear, however they may have differed from me in opinion." In other parts of his correspondence we see the same view taken of his constitutional power. On the 6th of July, 1802, in a letter to David Hall, then Governor of Delaware, he acknowledges the receipt of communications covering two addresses, the one from a democratic republican meeting at Dover, and the other from the grand and general juries of the circuit court of the United States, both of them praying a removal of Allen McLane, the father of our present minister to England, from the office of collector of the customs at Wilmington. It appears that Mr. McLane was objected to by them, on the ground of personal dislike, and for the alleged warmth of his federal opinions. Mr. Jefferson, in this letter, replying to those addresses, refuses to remove the incumbent for such reasons, "lest he should bring a just censure on his administration." He says, "we are not acting for ourselves alone, but for the whole human race. We must not, by any departure from principle, dishearten the mass of our fellow-citizens." He then lays down the very principle on which this power can be constitutionally and properly exercised. "If Colonel McLane has done any act inconsistent with his duty as an officer, or as an agent of this administration, this would be legitimate ground for inquiry, into which I should consider myself free to enter." He takes a distinction between refusing to appoint a political opponent, and removing him during his term, the last of which he refuses to do: thus leaving your thousand removals from the Post Office and other Departments of the Government under the full reprobation of the "doctrines of 1801," upon which you have attempted to justify them.

The next President, whose removals were referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee, was Mr. Madison, our "constitutional lawyer," under whose opinions we have already seen there is no shelter to be found for this administration. Then came Mr. Monroe, who not only disavowed such policy as is now pursued, but practised political tolerance in its widest signification. He had a great constitutional lawyer to advise him—one whose precepts ought to be now adhered to, even as strongly as the gentleman from Tennessee grasped those of Mr. Madison. That constitutional lawyer, sir, was Andrew Jackson, whose advice on any question should not be slightly passed over by the gentleman from Tennessee, and especially when we are considering the special force and efficacy of the second section of this article in the constitution. On the 12th of November, 1816, before Mr. Monroe's election had been officially announced, he gives this unanimous view of the duties of a Chief Magistrate: "In every selection, party and party feelings should be avoided. Now is the time to exterminate that monster, called party spirit. By selecting characters most conspicuous for their probity, virtue, capacity, and firmness, without any regard to party, you will go far to, if not entirely, eradicate, those feelings which on former occasions threw so many obstacles in the way of Government, and perhaps have the pleasure and honor of uniting a people heretofore politically divided. The Chief Magistrate of a great and powerful nation should never indulge in party feeling. His conduct should be liberal and disinterested, always bearing in mind that he acts for the whole, and not a part of the community. By this course, you will exalt the national character, and acquire for yourself a name as imperishable as monumental marble. Consult no party in your choice: pursue the dictates of that unerring judgment which has so long and so often benefited our country, and rendered conspicuous its rulers. These are the sentiments of a friend; they are the feelings, if I know my own heart, of an undissembled patriot." It may be said, sir, that this constitutional lawyer has since abandoned these views as unsound. But I ask, when? Why, as late as May, 1824, he maintained the same moral and mental elevation, confirming the same opinions, and imprinting them more deeply by the increased authoritative sanction of his own great name. In a letter to the Honorable George Kremer, of that date, so far from retracting them, he says, "my advice to the President was, that he should act upon principles like these: consider himself the head of the nation, not of a party; that he should have around him the best talents the country could afford, without regard to sectional divisions; and should, in his selection, seek after men of probity, virtue, capacity, and firmness; and, in this way, he would go far to eradicate those feelings which, on former occasions, threw so many obstacles in the way of Government, and be enabled perhaps to unite a people heretofore politically divided." Those who delight to view the result of the last Presidential election as a verdict rendered by the people on an issue joined, can best inform us how far these sentiments and constitutional opinions should be viewed as having formed a part of that issue, and how far they were sanctioned by the then expression of popular approbation.

These opinions and precedents of great constitutional lawyers lead us to other reflections upon the general expediency of the two doctrines, and the probable reasoning of those who made our constitution. By the old articles of confederation, the power of appointment was vested in Congress. Under the present constitution, the same power was transferred to the President and Senate. The House of Representatives, chosen biennially, was not entrusted with any portion of this important power. Why not? Honorable gentlemen have strongly pressed the importance of what they call the principle of rotation or change in office, to comply with the popular will. The House of Representatives being entirely subject to the mutability of popular opinion, would be most apt to change with every popular breeze, and give effect to that opinion. Did this escape the intellects of the fathers of the republic? Sir, if we are to accredit their contemporaneous expositions of the constitution, and the very writings which procured its ratification, their reason for not investing the Representatives with this power, was to prevent the removal of valuable officers with every popular change, and to give stability to the administration of the Government. Moreover, when the gentleman from New Hampshire states here, that the same political causes which induce the people to change their Chief Magistrate, should operate upon all the subordinates, agents, and deputies, he forgets that the popular attention never is, and never can be, while absorbed by the consideration of the merits and demerits of contending candidates for the first office in their gift, sufficiently diverted to decide upon all the officers in the country. In a State or a small Territory, where the people know all their officers, they may act with a view to them. But hundreds of thousands voted, during the last great political contest, for men politically opposed to officers whom they had never seen, and of whom they knew nothing—nay, to their dearest friends, whom they neither wished nor expected should be removed. You cannot justify your course, then, by saying it is the popular will, and especially when your President, with his election in full view, and with a knowledge of the effect of the sentiment on the public, told us that "the Chief Magistrate of a great and powerful nation should never indulge in party feeling." Under such circumstances, is it not fair to conclude that, if his election must be regarded as any expression of popular will, in regard to subordinate officers, that will was in favor of his sentiment, and against the indulgence of party feeling to remove them. Still I admit that, although the great mass of the nation know little, and care less, in the election of a President, about the qualifications of inferior officers, yet they have in recent practice been too much guided in their choice by the hopes of Executive patronage, and the love of office. And it is time to lay before them the true principles of their constitution, which teach that, for the gratification of personal ambition, or the mere elevation of a party, for private pique or for personal vengeance, for the free exercise of the right of opinion, for hatred or for favoritism, or for any other cause than to secure a faithful discharge of public service for the public good, Executive power cannot be legitimately exercised; and shall now and forever after be effectually and fearlessly restrained. The expectants for "dead men's shoes" will then disappear. The elective franchise will be restored to its pristine purity. Executive patronage will no longer teach us at the polls that "power over a man's support is power over his will," and the action of our Government will, by thus cleansing the very spring from which it flows, become, henceforth, refined, healthful, and vigorous. But if these principles be now disregarded, despised, and prostrated, our people will be converted into office hunters, the contest for power will be everywhere conducted without reference to principle, the elective franchise will sink under the influence of personal hopes and personal fears, universal corruption will be substituted for that virtue without which a republic cannot exist; and at the expiration of every four years the tumult will swell, and the venality will fester, until, the depravity of the whole system of government being no longer tolerable, disgusted and dispirited by the complete failure of our attempt at self-government, we shall sink into the arms of the first Cæsar who shall be willing to strike a mortal blow at the liberties of his country. Let me not be told, then, that the most sacred of our constitutional privileges is to become the victim of any slovenly draughtsman of a commission or a statute, confounding Executive power with Executive pleasure. By the paramount law of the land, a President can officially know no pleasure but the people's interest; and when you suffer him to sink the officer in the man, you violate its simplest and most salutary restrictions.

With this view of the duties of a Chief Magistrate, and of his constitutional power, it must occur that, as his authority to remove can be exercised only for cause, there must be some tribunal to inquire into and ascertain that cause. I regard this right, though denied by the gentleman from Tennessee, as a necessary incident of the advisory power of the Senate. We know well that there is a great dividing line between us in this body. One party here denies our constitutional right to put such troublesome questions or to test any part of the groundwork of our "great and glorious reform." We want to learn a little of the rationale of this operation. We have been all along, as you tell us, benighted and in the dark. Give us light, then, we say. We consider ourselves bound to advise the Chief Magistrate in his appointments. We are not restricted to a mere expression of consent to, or dissent from, his nomination. We may, ay, must, go farther. If you ask me whether I will consent to a choice which you alone can make, I may answer, yes. But if you ask me whether I will advise you so to choose, I might point you to a better. The words advice and consent are not synonymous—their meaning is essentially different. Consent is the mere agreement of the mind to what is proposed by another. Advice ordinarily implies the recommendation of some opinion, or the offering of some information worthy to be weighed and acted upon by another. The gentleman from Tennessee, expressing an opinion current, as we all know, among his political friends here, denies the constitutional right of the Senate to examine into and judge of the propriety of removals from office, and declares that our power is confined to the question of the fitness or unfitness of the person nominated to succeed. Now, if A be removed from office, and B nominated to supply the vacancy, were only our consent asked on the appointment of B, we might possibly, adopting his construction, vote, ay; when, if we are asked whether we would advise as well as consent to the appointment, we might answer, "no, we know a thousand better men, though we do not think the nominee absolutely unfit. We think the man removed is a better man." It is said, however, that we must restrict our advice to the nomination before us, and that, if we go beyond that, it is advice unasked. I answer that even if I am, as his adviser, to consult the interests of the President alone; I cannot always know whether B will really suit his purposes, until I learn why A has been removed, and thus ascertain what his purposes are. He may be deceived either in the character or qualifications of his nominee; and we knowing, perhaps, more about them than the President, if bound to look to his interests alone, ought to advise him of his error. Is it our object to advise him to appoint such persons as will aggrandize himself, or sustain his party? He may have recommended one of the opposite party to supply the vacancy created by the removal of his own party man. With a view to his interest, then, as his adviser, we ought, I suppose, to tell him so. Well, I inform him of it, and he tells me, in reply, that he knew that, but has dismissed his old friend because he has lost his influence. Then, if I know it to be a fact that his nominee has lost his influence too, I should tell him so; should I not? How, then, even according to the views of those who think the President is to consult his own pleasure, can we be faithful advisers; without asking, in our confidential way, here, what that pleasure is, or ferreting out the causes of his removals? On the other hand, if I am to advise with an eye single to the public good, which I take to be my true standard, I ought not to advise him to appoint B when I know that A, whom he has removed, and can re-appoint, is a better man for the office. Is it not then expedient for us, nay, is it not sometimes absolutely necessary to the proper discharge of our advisory duties, to learn why our servants have been dismissed? And if so, where is the clause in the constitution which limits us in the exercise of these duties? If we have, as gentlemen say, no constitutional right to inquire into the causes of these removals, we have no power to investigate the propriety of the appointments to fill vacancies; for the first of these principles being conceded, the other will flow as a consequence from the concession. This makes the President independent of the Senate in his appointing power, and of course of any other tribunal established by the constitution. And the Senator from New Hampshire has reminded us, in discussing another topic of this debate, that Mr. Jefferson's "axiom of eternal truth in politics" was, "that whatever power in any Government is independent, is absolute also." I apprehend, too, that this new restrictive construction of our constitutional duties differs entirely from that adopted by all our predecessors. True, their Executive records show that the subject has not been moved on every nomination; yet the right to exercise the power appears not to have been denied before: and those records show us that the Senate has often inquired into the propriety of nominations, and of removals also. When Robert Purdy memorialized this body on the 15th of January, 1822, representing, as he did, that his removal from the army had been improperly made, and even charging, expressly, that favoritism, with the President, "had superseded the claims of merit," the Senate, instead of deciding against their own power, or branding it as inquisitorial, appointed a committee to investigate the whole subject; and on the 13th of April afterwards, they, by resolution, called for the report of the board of general officers, upon which the reduction and new arrangement of the army had been predicated. When Mr. Monroe nominated Gadsden as adjutant-general, and Towson and Fenwick as colonels, the Senate looked behind the nominations, and took cognizance of the fact, that other officers were superseded and disbanded as supernumeraries; and although, as appears by the able reports of the committee which investigated the causes and the legality of the arrangement, they did ample justice to the merits of these gallant officers, and admitted them to be fully competent for the stations to supply which the President had named them to the Senate, yet the nominations were not confirmed. Gadsden and Towson were rejected here, on the 16th of March, 1822, and the nomination of Fenwick was then withdrawn. The President afterwards re-nominated them to the Senate, when the same investigation was again made; the committee called on the War Department for more full information; the President assigned all his reasons in an elaborate message to the Senate; the committee reported against those reasons, with a full argument to refute them, and the Senate a second time rejected all these appointments, on the ground that other persons were entitled to them. Here was no cry of inquisitorial power; nor did the Senate consider, as the gentleman from Tennessee now does, that their power was confined to the question of fitness or unfitness of the nominees. On the 10th of April, 1822, the Senate, by resolution, instructed the Secretary of the Navy, among other things, to communicate to them, in Executive session, "in what situations, and for what reasons, acting appointments for officers were made in the Navy Department." It will not be pretended that the mere fact that the call was not directly on the Chief Magistrate, impairs the force of the precedent, as a demand of the causes of Executive action. Cases in which the Senate has inquired into the causes of appointments have often occurred. On the 4th of January, 1826, the Senate, by resolution, called "for any information tending to show the propriety of sending ministers to Panama;" and it does not appear by the Journal that the majority, so much reproached for their defence of the then administration, made any objection to the resolution; but it does appear that the resolution was on that day offered by Mr. Macon, and was immediately adopted. In the case of William B. Irish, who was nominated by Mr. Monroe as marshal of the Western district of Pennsylvania, the Senate called, by resolution, on "the President of the United States, to cause to be laid before them all such letters and petitions, or other papers, as were presented to him, relative to the appointment, as well those which opposed his appointment, as those which requested it," and the President complied with the call, without complaining against the Senate for having exercised power unconstitutionally or improperly. The first President of the United States, who was also the President of the convention that made the constitution, considered the Senate as entitled to the utmost latitude of inquiry. When they rejected his nomination of Benjamin Fishbourne, for the place of naval officer of the port of Savannah, Washington, in his message nominating Lachlan McIntosh for the place, says, "Permit me to submit to your consideration, whether, on occasions where the propriety of nominations may appear questionable to you, it would not be expedient to communicate that circumstance to me, and thereby avail yourselves of the information which led me to make them, and which I would with pleasure lay before you." A committee was then appointed to wait on the President, and confer with him on the mode of communication proper to be observed between him and the Senate, in the formation of treaties and making appointments to offices. This committee, by their chairman, Mr. Izard, on the 21st of August after, reported the very rule of the Senate now to be found in our Manual as No. 36; which, with a view to give time for these inquiries, provides that, when nominations shall be made, a future day shall be assigned, unless the Senate unanimously direct otherwise, for taking them into consideration; prescribes the form of arrangement, when the President shall meet the Senate to give or to receive information, and even directs their own attendance at any other place where he may convene them for such purposes. With this history of that rule, which has been carefully preserved by all our predecessors, but appears now to be forgotten, who can doubt that, in their opinion, the utmost latitude of inquiry was to be allowed to the Senate on all Presidential nominations? We have high authority in favor of our constitutional right to inquire, in the report of the Committee on Executive Patronage, made in this body on the 4th of May, 1826—a committee which then thought, as they informed the world, that they were "acting in the spirit of the constitution, in laboring to multiply the guards, and to strengthen the barriers, against the possible abuse of power." The second section of the second bill reported by that committee provides, "That, in all nominations made by the President to the Senate, to fill vacancies occasioned by an exercise of the President's power to remove from office, the fact of the removal shall be stated to the Senate, at the same time that the nomination is made, with a statement of the reasons for which such officer may have been removed." Now, sir, would that committee* have reported an unconstitutional provision for the adoption of the Senate? The proposition in it was to exercise the right of inquiry in every case, and thus by one sweeping clause to supersede the necessity of any future resolutions for that purpose in particular cases. Why now consider the doctrine unconstitutional which was thus supported? So highly were the principles of this report then approved, that six thousand copies were ordered to be printed, and the arguments contained in it were then declared to be unanswerable.† These inquiries were all right, then, and the thought that it was wrong "to establish a court of inquiry" did not occur to the committee. So, too, the House of Representatives, in the exercise of its legislative powers, has scrutinized the motives of the heads of Executive Departments. That House demanded, by resolution, on the 8th of May, 1822, from the Secretary of the Treasury, "a particular and minute account of each transfer of the public money from one bank to another, which had been made after the 1st of January, 1817, and the reasons and motives for making the same;" and in March, 1822, they obtained the information demanded, in a report. By us the right to look into the causes of Executive action is not claimed as an incident of the mere legislative power of the Senate, but of its Executive authority, and therefore stands on much stronger grounds.

In 1821, the Senate, thinking a chargé des affaires not a proper representative of this Government at Rio Janeiro, interfered to recommend the appointment of a minister. Their opinion on that subject had not been requested, when, by their resolution of the 3d of March of that year, they advised the President to appoint such a minister. The act was voluntary and gratuitous. They did not then regard it as an objection that their advice was unasked, nor consider themselves confined to the fitness or unfitness of the chargé des affaires. They did not feel bound to remain silent, like the slaves around the throne of a despot, and answer only when spoken to. And it appears to me, that on subjects connected with either treaties or appointments, before the election of the present Chief Magistrate, they have considered themselves, in the spirit of the constitution, and under the solemn obligation to advise the President which it imposed upon them, equally bound to warn him of approaching danger to the country, and to consult with him on the means of averting it; equally bound to give him information which could tend to increase the welfare and prosperity of that country, and to discuss with him the means of securing and promoting it, whether he had or had not first asked their advice. Would you, sir, regard him as a faithful adviser, and a true friend, who should never warn you of danger, or give you information until you asked him to do so? And if not, are we acting in the spirit of the constitution, when we restrict our advice to the President to the mere fitness or unfitness of his nominee?

The treaty making, as well as the appointing power, is vested in the President and Senate. The advice and consent of this body is an indispensable prerequisite to the ratification of all treaties, and is an essential component part of the power to make them. It necessarily looks as well to the annulled as to the annulling stipulations with other nations; has always rejected new treaties, when preferring old ones; and though indulging the utmost latitude of inquiry into all the reasons, and all the facts connected with both, it has never yet met with objections to the most ample exercise of these powers.

It is well understood, sir, that, within the year of which this day completes the circle, a great revolution has been effected in the public offices, by the discharge of the former incumbents, and that the Representatives of many of the States are anxious to spread upon the records here, for the benefit of posterity, as well as of the present age, the latent cause of this great Executive reform. We have another motive to make the effort to effect this. We desire that the simple facts should appear, in justice to all those who have been dismissed from the public service without charge or accusation against them. We consider this necessary as an act of justice, not only to the sufferers, but to their families, their friends, and their posterity. We seek to distinguish the innocent from the guilty; to exhibit to public view, among the searching operations of this Government, how many have been removed on the representations of secret foes, or vindictive political opponents; how many have been dismissed on suspicion, and how many without suspicion; and how many have been condemned without having been suffered to learn the nature of the accusations against them. If rumors, founded in many cases on the statements of the victims of the proscriptive system, be true, many have been hurled from stations which they have filled with honor to themselves, and with advantage to the public, without the assignment of any reason for the act; and in many instances, it is said, the files of departments here have been filled with foul calumnies, by aspirants to office, and their secret agents, without giving the accused even the formality of a trial. If this be so, here is a real inquisition, to rack and torture, not the bodies indeed, but the characters of men. Is it more than an act of justice to the victims, that the truth should appear? The accusations against them, though strictly ex parte, are yet the avowed foundation of official acts of departments here, and are matters of record on file, in those departments, which may be resorted to, by all future generations, to blacken the memory of these men, and to disgrace their families when they shall be laid in their graves. In a government of laws properly administered, the discharge of a public servant, without any assigned reason for the act, must ordinarily cast some imputation upon his character. No matter how innocent he may be, no matter whether any charge has or has not been preferred against him, yet the existence of such charges will be presumed. Under such circumstances, the breath of calumny is sure to stain his reputation, even though acquired by a long life of faithful public service, and exemplary private conduct. The hireling libeller, the prostituted wretch, who may have gained the very office from which he has been removed, will sound the tocsin of slander, and if the press has been generally subsidized by the Government, surmises of official delinquency will be carefully propagated, as "proved on file," until the victim loses character as well as office, by the action of Executive vengeance. To what tribunal then should he appeal for justice? I answer, to the Senate of his country—a party to the contract by which he was employed; and which, by fairly showing the causes of his dismissal, may repel the imputations resting on his reputation, and "set history right," thus forming a barrier against the influence of the spirit of malevolence, which, in these latter days, as we have seen, can pursue a man to his grave for vengeance on his posterity. No good or honorable man will dismiss a faithful servant from his private employment, without furnishing him at his request with a certificate of his fidelity. The same justice, which we dispense in private life, should be yielded to a faithful public servant, when dismissed from public employment; and unless as public men we intend to abandon those principles which govern us in our social and domestic relations, we are, in my humble judgment, bound to entertain these inquiries. They can do no injustice to the Executive. If its power has not been wantonly abused, the conduct of the Government will be presented to the people in an unexceptionable point of view. But, on the other hand, if the President's authority has been perverted entirely to party and personal purposes, are we not bound to correct the evil? And, should we refuse to present him to this nation in his proper character, at the expense of the reputation of all our fellow-citizens, who have been trampled under foot by the arbitrary and despotic exercise of power, will it not be said, that, by shrinking from the investigation, we have distrusted his integrity, and have shown a belief that his security was in concealment? If all has been rightly done, do we not treat him ungenerously by refusing him an opportunity of presenting the evidence for his acquittal at the bar of public opinion?—ay, sir, at the bar of public opinion: for at that bar he must stand and await his sentence; and his direst foe could not wish him a more certain condemnation than inevitably awaits him, unless he is heard in his defence.

If I am right in my views of the constitutional powers of the President and Senate, thus far presented, the former can never properly remove an officer before the expiration of his term, but for cause connected only with the public interest; while the latter can investigate that cause, and ascertain by the facts how far the constitution has been complied with; and, if this authority has been abused, or extended beyond its constitutional limits, the House may impeach the author of such abuses before the Senate, and the Senate may remove him and all his minions. An impeachment, however, requiring a majority of the House to prefer it, and two-thirds of the Senate to sustain it, can rarely, perhaps never, prevail against the exercise of Executive patronage directly on Congress and the influence of party spirit. Then suppose that a President, regardless of his duty, and of the consequences either of exposure or impeachment, should remove all our public servants who would not consent to his usurpation of the sovereignty of the people, and fill their places with favorites and parasites who should seek to robe him with the imperial purple? We have been told that such a case may occur; that Aaron Burr was once on the verge of this high office, and it has been said that he would have filled every office in this way. I do not say so myself, nor do I pretend to decide upon that. But the question now arises, what checks have the people upon an usurper, who should do these things for his own advancement, immediately after his accession to the Presidency? It is certain that, until the expiration of his four years' term, a period long enough for the achievement of a revolution, the people have no check upon him except through the instrumentality of the Senate; and in such a case the question,

MARCH 4, 1830.]

Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

What control has the Senate upon this power? becomes one of intense interest to the American people:

We have seen that, by the terms of the constitution, the President is authorized to fill up all vacancies happening in the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session. When a vacancy is created by a removal, the question arises, Can the officer removed be reinstated by the direct action of the Senate?

There are many who maintain the affirmative of this question. Some for whose judgments I feel great deference, and with whom I usually act here, have so expressed themselves; and there are certainly strong opinions to support them. That of Alexander Hamilton, expressed in the 77th number of the Federalist, is urged with much force as being in accordance with this construction. After enumerating there, as one of the advantages to be expected from the co-operation of the Senate in the business of appointments, that it would contribute to the stability of the administration, he adds, "the consent of that body will be necessary to displace, as well as to appoint." It is insisted that the displacing, here referred to, is indicated by the context to be, not a temporary removal by a temporary appointment, amounting only to an "attempt to change," but that the power denied by him to exist in the President alone, was such a displacing power as could defy the "discountenance of the Senate," and that, therefore, this great statesman pressed it upon his countrymen as one of the highest recommendations of the constitution, that "a change of the Chief Magistrate would not occasion so violent or so general a revolution in the officers of Government as might be expected, if he were the sole disposer of offices. Where a man in any station has given satisfactory evidence of his fitness for it, a new President would be restrained from attempting a change in favor of a person more agreeable to him, by the apprehension that the discountenance of the Senate might frustrate the attempt. Those who can best estimate the value of a steady administration, will be the most disposed to prize a provision which connects the official existence of public men with the approbation or disapprobation of that body, which, from the greater permanency of its own composition, will, in all probability, be less subject to inconstancy than any other member of the Government." The weight of Hamilton's opinion is here set in full array against the advocates of constructive power; and it is true that his exposition of the constitution was cotemporaneous with its ratification; that it was then given to, and pressed upon, our countrymen, for the purpose of effecting that ratification; that it was viewed at the time as obviating all objections to the extent of Executive influence; and that, perhaps, the only censure which has ever been cast upon his political writings, charges that he was too much disposed not to curtail, but to extend and increase the powers of the Federal Government. Yet, his doctrine, at least to the extent contended for, was not recognized by the House of Representatives in 1789; and, if the decisions of that day, which have been referred to, are to be regarded as obligatory upon us, the Senate has no direct action upon the removals of the President. The question recurs, then, by what constitutional mode can it maintain any check upon these abuses of Executive power?

I take the true difference, between the present advocates of that power and myself, to consist in this—they consider the Senate as standing in the relation of a quasi privy council to the President, who may or may not abide by their advice, as to him shall seem most expedient. They deny the doctrine of Hamilton, that "the constitution connects the official existence of public men with the approbation or disapprobation of the Senate." They deny the whole and every part of it. They deny it in every view which can be taken of it. I consider the Senate as possessing certain Executive powers, to be exercised in co-operation with the President, when they approve of the administration of his co-ordinate powers, or in opposition to; and as a salutary check upon him, when he has abused such powers; and that, as officers of a certain grade cannot be appointed without their advice and consent, so, if those officers be removed to reward partisans, or for any other unjustifiable purpose, the Senate can reject nominations to supply the vacancies thus occasioned, and thus either compel the President to reinstate those removed, or leave vacancies which he cannot supply after the expiration of their session. If this view be sound, the Senate, by its legitimate, though indirect action upon every removal, has a check upon the abuse of power, which, if exercised when the public interest really demands it, will destroy the motives for that abuse; and may hereafter save the republic in her hour of greatest peril. The objects to be attained by an ambitious and designing President, through the instrumentality of these removals, will be to displace the real friends of the people, and to fill up the vacancies with his own creatures, subservient to his will, and independent of all other control; and if the Senate have the virtue to reject his propositions to effect these ends, he may be compelled to retract his removals, or to leave the places vacant. This right of rejecting appointments, with the express design of acting upon the removals, should be exercised whenever the removing power has been abused—because every such abuse is an act of tyranny, and the first approaches of usurpation, or oppressive and arbitrary power, should be repulsed by those who ought to stand as the most vigilant and intrepid among the sentinels of liberty. Ordinarily, he who accepts an appointment to fill a vacancy occasioned by such an abuse of power, is cognizant of the facts, and consenting to the abuse. Moreover, this check should be interposed whenever the public interest demands the restoration of a meritorious officer, whether removed through inadvertent error or intentional injustice. The Senate thought it important to exercise this right in the cases of the military nominations in 1822; but the privilege becomes inestimably valuable whenever the removing power of a President is exerted for the purposes of personal ambition, and in utter contempt of the public interest. It is infinitely better to go without an officer than to submit to "an act of tyranny" in any shape. We have no right to originate bills for raising revenue—we cannot nominate or propose in the first instance the sums to be levied on the people; but when the other House sends here such bills, we can amend or reject them. Now, whenever we believe that the sum to be raised is destined for any purpose which is tyrannical or oppressive, or not really necessary for the public interest, we are bound to negative the whole bill, if we are not allowed to amend it to suit that interest. We should, doubtless, refuse any appropriation of public money if we believed it destined to advance the interests of an usurper, although satisfied at the same time that a real evil might grow out of the want of funds to disburse the ordinary expenses of Government. In these and all similar cases, the question must be weighed and decided, whether the object to be achieved is worthy of the sacrifice it may occasion; and so long as the spirit of our ancestors dwells within these walls, we shall rarely think any sacrifice too great, if made in a successful resistance to the oppressive exercise of arbitrary power.

But there are some here who maintain that we have no such check on the Executive, and that the President is authorized to fill all vacancies existing in the recess of the Senate; so that, when we have rejected such appointments as have been proposed to us, and, having been informed by the President that our services are no longer necessary here, shall have adjourned without day, he may fill the vacancies then existing. If this be true, he can fill such vacancies as well with one person as another, and of course can, and will generally, re-appoint the very man whom we have rejected; or, he may entirely dispense with future nominations to the Senate, granting, on the day after each session, commissions, which shall expire with the next, and thus take away from this co-ordinate branch of power even the miserable subordinate privilege of the old French Parliament, whose only glory was to register the mandates of the sovereign.

The commentator on Justinian, who has been alluded to, as a jurist, in terms of high commendation, in the range of this debate, [Mr. Cooper] after animadverting upon the removing power as formerly exercised by the Governor of Pennsylvania, says, the analogy between the rights of the Governor and those of the President, in this respect, will not hold, "considering that, under the constitution of the United States, the exercise of the right of removal is subject to the formidable check of the Senate's concurrence in the successor of the President—a difference so important as to destroy the force of all reasoning from the one to the other. A power, in every instance controlled in its exercise by the Senate, cannot be compared with a power in every instance uncontrolled, and exercised as the caprice of the Governor for the time being, heated by recent opposition, and goaded by revenge, may dictate." The distinction lies here: every vacancy existing in the recess is not a vacancy happening within the true construction of the second article. The appointments to supply such vacancies must be made "by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of the next session," not after the expiration of that session. The commissions granted during the last recess expire, eo instanti, with the termination of the present session; and if the offices are not filled by the concurrence of the Senate, vacancies will exist at the moment we adjourn, not in the recess—for that moment can with no more propriety be said to be recess than session; and those vacancies will not exist by reason of any casualty or happening not provided for, but by the expressed will of a co-ordinate branch of the appointing power. It has never been pretended that the President alone could fill, by one of these temporary appointments, a vacancy happening during the session. In the celebrated report of the Committee on Military Affairs, made here on the 25th of April, 1822, which, as I have already stated, met with the sanction of the Senate in the rejection of the military appointments, it is urged that "the word 'happen' relates to some casualty not provided for by law. If the Senate be in session when offices are created by law which were not before filled, and nominations be not made to them by the President, he cannot appoint after the adjournment of the Senate, unless specially authorized by law, such vacancy not happening during the recess." The same construction was evidently adopted by Congress, and by the President himself, when, in the act of the 22d of July, 1813, they thought it necessary to insert an express provision in the second section, to confer upon the President the power to appoint collectors of direct taxes and internal duties during the recess, if not before made by and with the consent of the Senate. Every vacancy existing in the recess is not therefore a vacancy "happening in the recess." In the third section of the first article of the constitution, touching the appointment of Senators, it is provided that, "if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary appointments, until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies."

These temporary appointments by the State Executive are analogous to temporary appointments by the National Executive. How, then, has this clause in the constitution been construed? The first case which occurred, to test its construction, was decided on the 28th of March, 1794, on an appointment by the Executive of Delaware, which appears to have undergone a full investigation. The report of the committee appointed to examine it, sets forth, that a Senator from that State resigned his seat upon the 18th day of September, 1793, and during the recess of the Legislature, that the Legislature met in January, and adjourned in February, 1794; that, upon the 19th day of March, and subsequently to the adjournment of the Legislature, another was appointed by the Governor to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation. With these facts, a resolution was reported by the committee, and adopted by a vote of twenty to seven, that the appointee was not entitled to a seat here, "because a session of the Legislature of the said State had intervened between the resignation and the appointment;" and among those who sustained this resolution, we find the names of Langdon, King, Ellsworth, Martin, and Butler, who had been members of the convention. Such was the determination on this question, going the whole length of the principle we seek to establish.

In the case of Mr. Lanman, a Senator from Connecticut, the Senate, on the 7th of March, 1825, went still farther. His term expired on the 3d of March, 1825; after which, he produced here a certificate of appointment by Oliver Wolcott, then Governor of the State, dated the 8th of February, 1825; and although the Legislature of the State was not in session at the time, and did not sit until May, yet the Senate decided that there was not in this case a vacancy happening by any casualty not provided for, and therefore Mr. Lanman was not entitled to a seat. We find among the distinguished names then recorded in favor of this construction, those of Messrs. Benton, Berrien, Dickerson, Eaton, Gaillard, Hayne, Jackson, (now President) King, Lloyd, of Maryland, Macon, Tazewell, and Van Buren. It is not for me to pronounce upon the correctness of a decision thus established; but if it was right, it not only covers, but goes beyond my position. It is true that, in some similar cases, Senators have been permitted to sit here, but they all passed without consideration, except that of Mr. Tracy, who was held entitled to a seat, by a party vote, in a period of high excitement—all those who were called federalists voting for, and all those who were called democrats against him. Tempora mutantur. However we may be branded as the federalists of this day, our doctrine appears to have been the republican doctrine of that period. The constitutions of each of the States, in the cases referred to, provided that their Governors should see that their laws were faithfully executed; and their laws directed those Governors "to fill up all vacancies, happening in the recess" of their respective Legislatures, by temporary appointments; so that there exists no ground upon which to build up a construction in favor of the power of the Federal Executive, which does not equally sustain that of the State Executive, in each of these instances. Without further discussion of the principles connected with this subject, we might regard it as never to be shaken while the constitution lasts, that the President alone cannot fill any vacancy occasioned by the refusal of the Senate to concur in his nominations; and that if he, having had a fair opportunity to consult his constitutional advisers, should refuse or neglect to do so in any case where their consent to the appointment is required, he has no power to supply the vacancy existing at the expiration of their session.

Before I close my remarks upon the constitutional rights of the President and Senate, suffer me to say, sir, that there cannot be, in a free Government, a more dangerous principle than that of implied Executive power. To control it, we cannot keep too steadily in view, that delegated authority should always be either strictly construed, or distinctly defined, and that, by the terms of the constitution, power, not expressly ceded, is reserved to the people or the States. I shall be gratified to see some farther evidences than any yet developed, to make good the remark of the gentleman from Tennessee, when he expressed his pleasure at beholding the administration majority of the American Senate "contending against all those doctrines which are calculated to increase the authority of men in office." We have also been informed, that we live in an age when State rights are the great objects of regard; when a predominating party has taken them into its especial keepings; when the President himself is their grand protector; when our hearts shall be gladdened, and our eyes blessed, with the glorious vision of a party in power no longer warping the constitution from its legitimate construction, to increase the strength of the Federal head, but paring down all forced implications of authority, and restoring to their pristine purity and vigor the sovereign and independent powers of the twenty-four States.

Mr. Foot's Resolution-

Such, we are told, sir, is the primary object of modern reform. But the example of this administration is a sad commentary on so fine a text; and the principles advanced in this debate to sustain it, sap the whole foundation of these lofty pretensions. Reverencing, as I sincerely do, the constitutional rights of the States, I view the avowed principles of the Executive as subversive of the most important powers of that very body where alone the States, as such, are represented. Rob the Senate of these, and of what avail is their mere legislative authority, when the very laws themselves are to be passed upon by judges, and executed by officers, in whose appointment they have substantially no concern? An English King boasted that, while he could appoint the bishops and judges, he could have what religion and laws he pleased; and it was the opinion of Roger Sherman, in adverting to that remark, that, if the President was vested with the power of appointing to and removing from office at his pleasure, like the English monarch, he could render himself despotic. A blow at the rights of the States is a blow at the liberties of the people; and whenever the period shall arrive for destroying the latter, the first aim will be to prostrate the powers of the former, in the Senate. Those who framed the constitution foresaw this, and, so far as human wisdom could guard against the evil, they provided for it, by ordaining that no State shall ever be deprived of her equal suffrage, in this body, by any change of constitution. Hic murus aheneus esto. Here lies the bulwark against consolidation of the Government—the barrier for the protection of the States against the encroachments of Executive power; and the American who shall succeed in breaking down this defence will bury in its ruins the liberties with the constitution of his country. The effort to destroy it, in order to be successful, will never be made in open and avowed hostility; but the first approaches of the enemy will be gradual, crafty, and disguised. Many a Scipio will thunder "war to the knife's blade" against the foe whom he secretly encourages, until, by successive restrictions upon the rights of the Senate, the salutary powers of the States are stolen imperceptibly away, and most probably under this very pretence of enabling the Executive to see that the laws are faithfully executed.

Let us now, sir, briefly, in conclusion, while we commemorate the day which inducted our Chief Magistrate to office, review his administration of the past year, apply to it the test of these principles, and calmly inquire whether any constitutional interposition of the Senate be requisite to check the abuses of power. This anniversary recalls the pledges of the inaugural address: to keep steadily in view the limitations as well as the extent of the Executive authority; to respect and preserve the rights of the sovereign members of our Union; to manage, by certain searching operations, the public revenue; to observe a strict and faithful economy; to counteract that tendency to private and public profligacy which a profuse expenditure of money by the Government is but too apt to engender; to depend for the advancement of the public service more on the integrity and zeal of the public officers than on their numbers; and particularly to correct those abuses which, it was then charged, had brought the patronage of the Federal Government into conflict with the freedom of elections, and counteract those causes which had placed or continued power in unfaithful or incompetent hands. The lateness of the hour warns me that I ought not to trespass on your attention, by inquiring how far all these pledges have been redeemed; and the examination of all the topics presented by such a general inquiry might lead me beyond the "exiguo fine," within which I am admonished that an American Senator should confine himself, when speaking of an American President. But it is true, and ought to be observed on this day, that our public officers are increased in number, and not diminished in salary; that the promised retrenchment has terminated in a recommendation to establish additional bureaus, with more public agents, and increased demands on the treasury, to swell to an almost boundless extent the influence of the Executive by a general extension of the law which limits appointments to four years, and by the establishment of a Government bank; and that a general system of proscription for a manly exercise of the right of opinion, under the pretence of rotation in office, has brought the patronage of the Executive into full conflict with the freedom of elections. Turning from the investigation of minor subjects, which might by possibility be considered as mere topics for partisan effect, and with a nobler purpose than to subserve the petty interests of any sect, or any party, our attention is forcibly arrested by some instances, in which these pledges have been so violated that their tendency, if not immediately, at least consequentially, and by the force of example, is subversive of the dearest interests of our people, and of the most sacred institutions of our republic.

When we look to the manner in which the pledge to observe a strict and faithful economy has been redeemed, we find the expenses of Government increase, through the instrumentality of these rewards and punishments for political opinion. Outfits, salaries, and all the incidental expenses attending the recall of nearly the whole of our diplomatic corps, and the appointment of others to supply their places, have caused large drafts upon the treasury, and laid the foundation for increasing demands upon it. But without dwelling to estimate how many tens or hundreds of thousands of dollars have been expended in punishing opponents, or inquiring how profusely the public bounty has been lavished upon favorites, we have something more important to consider. We know that, if funds for such purposes have been taken from the strong box, without appropriations, the President must have dipped his hands into the nation's treasure in opposition to the constitution, which it is our duty to support. Money cannot be drawn from the treasury except in consequence of appropriations made by law; and the radical act of the first of May, 1820, after limiting the powers of the President in relation to transfers of appropriations in the army and navy, provides, in the fifth section, "that no transfers of appropriation from or to other branches of expenditure shall thereafter be made." May we not inquire now, from what fund the money has been drawn to defray the greatly increased expenses of our foreign missions? These expenses were not provided for, during the last session of Congress, by any law: for they were not foreseen or anticipated. If then the diplomatic fund was insufficient for these purposes, either the nation has been brought in debt to accomplish them, or the constitution and the law have been violated by unauthorized drafts on the treasury. It is certain that we are now called upon to appropriate largely, either to pay a debt incurred, or to supply a deficiency in some other fund not appropriated for these expenses. If the Executive can recall our foreign agents for party purposes, or to promote friends, even where no legislative appropriation has been made for these objects, Congress has virtually no control over our foreign intercourse, and we may hereafter expect that our ministers abroad will be withdrawn on the accession of every new incumbent of the Presidency; that new men will be sent to supply their places; and that the whole relations of the country with foreign Powers will be changed, or thrown into confusion, at the end of every four years. Admit the power of the Executive, without appropriation, to recall and to appoint ministers, and by the operation to bring the nation in debt, for the public good; yet show us how the public good required this increased expense. Take a case for example, and let some ingenious advocate of the administration assign a reason why our late minister near the court of St. James was recalled. Mr. Barbour had acquitted himself faithfully in every public trust which had ever before been confided to him, and was at the time of his recall discharging, with honor to himself and his country, the high duties of his mission. In what respect was he thought to be either incompetent or unfaithful? Was any new policy to be adopted in our relations with England which he would not espouse? Take another case, and inform us why the gallant Harrison, the hero of Fort Meigs, the victor at Tippecanoe and the Thames—a veteran in council, as well as in the field—distinguished for his virtues in all the relations of the citizen, the soldier, and the statesman; why, I ask, was he proscribed as unfit to represent his country abroad, and withdrawn from Colombia, to make room for Thomas P. Moore? He had scarcely arrived at Bogota—the ink was still fresh on the Executive record which informed the President that it was the advice of the Senate that he should represent us there, when the order for his removal was announced. This could not have been done for any official misconduct. There had been no time to inquire into that. Was his fidelity distrusted, then? Or how did the public good require his dismissal? Think you it will tell well in the annals of history, that he who had so often periled life and limb, in the vigor of manhood, to secure the blessings of liberty to others, was punished for the exercise of the elective franchise in his old age? Sir, it was an act, disguise it as we may, which, by holding out the idea that he had lost the confidence of his country, might tend to bring down his grey heirs with sorrow to the grave. But the glory he acquired by the campaign on the Wabash, and by those hard-earned victories for which he received the warmest acknowledgments of merit from the Legislature of Kentucky, and the full measure of a nation's thanks in the resolutions of Congress, can never be effaced; and any effort to degrade their honored object will recoil on those who make it, until other men, in better days, shall properly estimate his worth, and again cheer his declining years with proofs of his country's confidence and gratitude. If, then, these acts, and others of a similar character, be hostile to the spirit of the constitution, can we regard the expenditure of public money they have occasioned as a proper redemption of those pledges which, on this day last year, so much delighted us, "to observe a strict and faithful economy, and to keep steadily in view the limitations as well as the extent of the Executive power?"

The pledge to preserve the rights of the sovereign members of our Union, as well as the defence of the administration, made by the gentleman from Tennessee, lead us to the reflection that more members of Congress, who were friendly to the election of the present Chief Magistrate, have been appointed to office by him, within the compass of a single year, than have been appointed by any other President during the whole course of an administration of eight years. The consequences of this were foreseen and deprecated by the founders of our Government, but the provision which they inserted in the constitution to prevent them has proved inadequate to its object. Such was the opinion of a favorite constitutional lawyer, who, in an address to the Tennessee Legislature, on the 7th of October, 1825, explained this subject so fully that I shall be pardoned for producing a large extract from that valuable state paper, especially after the gentleman from Tennessee has adverted to it, and made an argument upon it.

"With a view [says he] to sustain, more effectually, in practice, the axiom which divides the three great classes of power into independent constitutional checks, I would impose a provision, rendering any member of Congress ineligible to office under the General Government, during the term for which he was elected, and two years thereafter, except in cases of judicial office. The effect of such a constitutional provision is obvious. By it, Congress, in a considerable degree, would be free from that connexion with the Executive department which at present gives strong ground of apprehension and jealousy on the part of the people. Members, instead of being liable to be withdrawn from legislating on the great interests of the nation, through prospects of Executive patronage, would be more liberally confided in by their constituents; while their vigilance would be less interrupted by party feelings and party excitements. Calculations, from intrigue or management, would fail: nor would their deliberations, or their investigation of subjects, consume so much time. The morals of the country would be improved, and virtue, uniting with the labors of the Representatives, and with the official ministers of the law, would tend to perpetuate the honor and glory of the Government. But, if this change in the constitution should not be obtained, and important appointments continue to devolve on the Representatives in Congress, it requires no depth of thought to perceive that corruption will become the order of the day; and that, under the garb of conscientious sacrifices to establish precedents for the public good, evils of serious importance to the freedom and prosperity of the republic may arise. It is through this channel that the people may expect to be attacked in their constitutional sovereignty, and where tyranny may well be apprehended to spring up, in some favorable emergency. Against such inroads, every guard ought to be interposed; and none better occurs than that of closing the suspected avenue with some necessary constitutional restriction."

It is interesting to examine how far this administration has actually practised on these maxims. Why, within the very first year, six members of the Senate,* being one-eighth of the whole body, as it was composed during the twentieth Congress, have been appointed to some of the most important offices within the gift of the Executive. As yet, the message of this session reiterates the principles of the Tennessee letter, with a slight reservation, by way of covering the case as it now exists. By that letter, judges alone might be selected from the members of Congress. By the late message we are informed that "the necessity of securing in the cabinet, and in diplomatic stations of the highest rank, the best talents and political experience, should, perhaps, (even here we have a querre) except these from the exclusion." If it be, "perhaps," necessary to change the constitution to save us from doing wrong, why not do right without the change? The new reservation is a flat departure from the maxims of 1825; and still even that does not cover the acts of the Executive: for we have not only diplomatists and cabinet ministers (important officers!) chosen from the members of Congress, "within the term for which they were elected, and two years thereafter," but important appointments of a very different character, even in the post office and the customs, continue to devolve on them, convincing those who have become proselytes to the Tennessee doctrine, without any great depth of thought, that corruption may become the order of the day, and that, under the garb of conscientious sacrifices for the public good, evils of serious importance to the freedom and prosperity of the republic may arise. But the gentleman from Tennessee, who called our attention to the letter, and without whose notice of it I should hardly have adverted to it, says—

[Here Mr. GRUNDY explained. He stated that he had alluded to the letter in reply to the Senator from Indiana, Gen. NOBLE.]

Mr. CLAYTON continued. Sir, the honorable gentleman's reply was, that the people ought to have changed the constitution, but that, without some constitutional restraint, the President was under no obligation to practise what he formerly preached. However valid that defence may appear, it is not the opinion of my constitutional lawyer: for, in that same letter, he says, "it is due to myself to practise upon the maxims recommended to others." These and similar pledges obtained for him thousands of votes, during the canvass of 1828, and ought to have been redeemed.

"When the blood burns, how prodigal the soul Lends the tongue vows."

Moreover, it will require much "depth of thought" to convince us that a President cannot do what he thinks right, without some constitutional restriction to prevent him from doing what he knows to be wrong; or that a man of sound mind and good disposition cannot avoid the destruction of his own family unless you treat him like a madman, by tying his arms and depriving him of the means of doing injury.

There was, however, no pledge in the inaugural so striking or so important, as the recognition of that obligation, then said to be inscribed on the list of Executive duties, by the recent demonstration of public sentiment, to counteract those causes which brought the patronage of the General Government into conflict with the freedom of elections. Sir, your Postmaster General, wielding the patronage of his Department over clerks, deputies, contractors, and agents, in numbers amounting to nearly eight thousand men, has, for political effect, removed from public employment, in pursuance of a general system, so vast a proportion of the old and faithful public servants connected with that immense establishment, that its resources and its energies are impaired, public confidence is diminished, and suspicion, darkening this great avenue to light, as she spreads her dusky pinions over it, whispers that some of its recesses have been converted, for political purposes, into posts of espial on the private intercourse of your citizens. The public press, too, by the instrumentality of which alone this republic might be prostrated; by the influence of which a President might be swelled into a monarch; has been—not shackled by a gag law—no, sir, but subsidized, by sums approximating to the interest on a million of dollars, granted in the way of salaries, jobs, and pensions, to partisan editors, printers, proprietors, and all the host, directly and indirectly, connected with and controlling it. The appointment of editors to office is not casual, but systematic; they were appointed because they were editors. In the days of the French Revolution, when the press was bought up with the public funds, the country was flooded with envenomed effusions from the jacobin prints. The post of profit was then erected in the kennel, where a venal pack-bayed, like bloodhounds, for murder. Marat was distinguished, as the editor of a revolutionary journal, for violence and vituperation; and, having published his demand of two hundred and sixty thousand heads, as a sacrifice to liberty, was soon elevated to one of the highest offices of the republic, where, as a member of the infernal triumvirate, which deluged France in tears and blood, he combined the cunning malice of Robespierre with the native ferocity of Danton. He was a compound of the vices of both his coadjutors; of all that on earth was flagitious, mean, inhuman, and inexorable: for he came from the schools of a faction which trained its disciples to cry havoc without mercy, when bounty lured them up the path to blood and death. The examples of that day teach us how easy is the transition from the hireling libeller to the brutal murderer; and that he whose habits have long accustomed him to live upon the ruins of private reputation, would shed the blood of his victim with pleasure, if paid to do the deed of death. An independent, able, high minded editor is an honor to his country, and to the age in which he lives. He is the guardian of the public welfare, the sentinel of liberty, the conservator of morals; and every attempt to allure or to coerce him to desertion from his duty should be regarded as an insult and an injury to the nation whose interests he is bound to defend. It is less manly in an assailant, and not less indicative of hostility, to bribe the sentry on the walls of your citadel, than to gag him and hurl him from its battlements. It is more dangerous to corrupt the press by the prospect of office, than absolutely to silence it by seditious laws; because, although by the latter course it may be destroyed, yet by the former it may be made the engine of tyranny. The charge of an undisguised effort to subdue its energies in the days of the elder Adams, brought down upon the heads of all who were friendly to the sedition act the full measure of public condemnation; and it yet remains to be seen what will be the effect produced by an attempt to buy and prostitute it. We have a pack in full cry upon the trail of every man whose integrity of purpose will not suffer him to bend before power; and friends, and character, and happiness, are torn from him by them, with as little remorse as was felt by the bloodhounds of the old French litter. Can all these things be justified by the examples of the illustrious Jefferson? Sir, his real friends will at all times spurn the imputation which the very question conveys. They will remind you that the first prominent act of his administration was to disembarass and untrammel the press; to disengage that "chartered libertine" from the shackles of authority, and leave him free as mountain air. They will tell you that the great maxim he adhered to till the latest period of life, was, that "error of opinion should always be tolerated while reason was left free to combat it;" that he rewarded the office hunting libeller who had slandered his predecessors with a view to gain by his election, with his unconcealed and unmitigated scorn and contempt; that he bought no man's services with gold, adopted no system of pensioning presses with office, offered no lures to libellers, employed no assassins of character. Three years ago, when the great Western Statesman, who has, for his independence, been hunted like a wild beast, filled, with honor to his country, the office of Secretary of State, he became an object of the bitterest vituperation, by discharging some half dozen printers from the petty job of publishing the laws; and although the whole extent of this exercise of patronage, as it was then called, did not amount to more than a few hundred dollars, yet it was considered as an exertion of power vitally dangerous to the country—as tending to establish a Government Press. Such a press was said to be more alarming to the liberties of the people than a palace guard of six thousand men; and the acts of the Secretary were denounced as being calculated to "sap the vigor, degrade the independence, and enfeeble the vigilance, of the sentinels on the watch-tower of liberty, whose beacon lights should blaze with pure and undying lustre." But now, when so many of those very sentinels have been subsidized by office, and the new stipendiaries have formed in battalia about the throne, presenting their pikes, in close array and forty deep, for its defence, the lofty eloquence of these patriot orators is heard no more within our walls; their harps hang on the willows; and instead of ringing an alarm through the land, they are hushed into the deepest silence and the most tranquil repose.

In this brief and hasty review of the prominent characteristics of the first year of this administration, [said Mr. C.] we have observed those acts which, in the opinion of the honorable member from Tennessee, will have no more effect upon the American public than "an attempt to agitate the ocean by throwing pebbles on its surface." We find, however, that the removals to which he referred have not amounted only to the dismissal of a "few subordinate officers," but to a thorough revolution among the most important and most faithful functionaries of the Government; and it ought to be remembered that even the subordinate officers alluded to were freemen. I may know less of this world than the able and experienced member from Tennessee, but I still think this nation will look to an act of tyranny, which tramples a faithful servant under foot, or turns him out with scoffs and contempt, however humble his condition may have been, with feelings very different from those manifested by the advocates of power. They may not care for the little salaries, but they will look to the principle of Executive action—to the motive which makes that action dangerous. Does the honorable gentleman recollect the reason for which John Hampden refused to pay the ship money? The sum for which he contended amounted only to a few pence, yet the claim of a British monarch to it was resisted to the utmost, and the feelings of an English public were agitated like the ocean in a storm, not on account of the sums to be paid under the illegal exaction, but because it was an encroachment on their rights, and an abuse of power. Every genuine American republican carries the spirit of John Hampden in his bosom. Surely the honorable member's own high estimate of national character will not suffer him to entertain the degrading idea that an English public, under an English monarch, cherished a loftier sense of liberty, or a more determined spirit of resistance to the abuses of authority, than his own countrymen. Has he forgotten the reason which induced our ancestors to resist the tea duties and the stamp tax? Was it only the sum to be levied which set this continent in a flame, or was it the oppressive principle upon which those claims were founded? If the mal-administration of Executive power has been such as even to "exceed the conception" of that great patriot, whose opinions we both reverence so highly, why is it that the honorable member views with such contempt the sum of the salaries awarded to Executive partisans, and all the distress and anguish inflicted on the sufferers by proscription, while he overlooks the principles which have been violated, and the constitution which has been trampled under foot? Here is the ground on which we have arraigned your administration; and although its friends may laugh its victims to scorn, they should recollect that what is theirs to day may shortly be in the power of another; though they now consider this as a mere gossamer, floating in the political atmosphere, and have even told us it is a feather, which can weigh nothing with the people, they should recollect that this feather is torn from the plumage of the American eagle, and that the transgression which they now regard as so venial, may be a precedent to sanction the usurpation of power for the destruction of the liberties of the people.

Having closed my remarks in reply to honorable gentlemen, suffer me now to say, sir, that it has been no part of my object to embitter the feelings of my associates by personal allusions to them, although I have intended, upon the challenge of the gentleman from Tennessee, to speak out as "boldly, frankly, and freely," as he might reasonably desire. But if any luckless arrow of mine, inadvertently shot, rankles in the bosom of any member here, he is welcome to send it back with his best force, provided he does not poison its point. My objects, I trust, however, have been above such warfare. I have endeavored to preserve unimpaired the rights of the tribunal established by our forefathers as the only common umpire for the decision of those controversies which must arise in the best regulated political families, and to show that, without the aid of such a tribunal, we must sink back into that anarchy which, among all other nations, and in all former ages, has been the sure harbinger of tyranny. I have labored to sustain what I believe to be the right and duty of the Senate: to interpose a barrier against the improper exercise of Executive power, which now controls, either directly or indirectly, nearly every avenue to every station, whether of honor or profit, within the gift of twelve millions of people. But, if the sentiments which have been avowed by gentlemen of the majority on this floor should be supported by the American people, their giant party, which has already borne upon its shoulders a weight greater than the gates of Gaza, will, in the overthrow of both these objects, wrench the very pillars of the Government from their foundations. Then we shall find how dreadful are the consequences of such doctrines. Upon their construction of Executive power, should one, possessed of the temper and ability which have so often characterized the consuls and chiefs of other republics, obtain the Presidency—such a man as Napoleon meant to describe when he spoke of the Russian "with a beard on his chin"—exercising, as he may, in the spirit of oriental despotism, perfect command over the army, the navy, the press, and an overflowing treasury, the merest driveller may foresee that our liberties will fare like the "partridge in the falcon's clutch." The very sentinels of our freedom will be bribed by him, with our own gold; and even many of those who have so triumphantly borne aloft the stripes and stars, amidst the thunders of battle, will be compelled to "beg bitter bread," or to turn the steel, which we have placed in their hands, against our own bosoms. He will readily gain to his purposes a flock of those voracious office hunters, whom we have seen brooding over the spoils of victory, after a political contest, like so many vultures after a battle, perched on every dead bough about the field, snuffing the breeze, and so eager for their prey that even the cries of the widow and the orphan cannot drive them from the roost. It has been said, and I believe truly, that we can never fall without a struggle; but, in the contest with such a man, thus furnished by ourselves with "all appliances and means to boot" against us, we must finally sink. For a time our valleys will echo with the roar of artillery, and our mountains will ring with the reports of the rifle. The storm of civil war will howl fearfully through the land, from the Atlantic border to the wildest recesses of the West, covering with desolation every field which has been crowned with verdure by the culture of freemen, and now resounding with the echoes of our happiness and industry. But the tempest must subside, and be succeeded by the deep, calm, and sullen gloom of despotism; after which, the voice of a freeman shall never again be heard within our borders, unless in the fearful and suppressed whispers of the traveller from some distant land, who shall visit the scene of our destruction, to gaze in sorrow on the melancholy ruin.

ABOLITION OF DUTIES, TAXES, &c.

The Senate, on motion of Mr. BENTON, proceeded to the further consideration of the bill, introduced by himself, for the abolition of sixteen millions of duties, &c. &c.

[When this subject was last under consideration, a question of order was raised by Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, whether, on account of a section of it, which proposed to raise the duty on certain articles, this bill was within the constitutional power of the Senate to originate it; which question, the Vice President not choosing to exercise his prerogative of deciding, had submitted to the decision of the Senate.]

Mr. BENTON declined saying any thing on this question, his only object being to have a decision one way or the other, that his bill might be advanced so as to take the usual course of bills thus introduced.

The yeas and nays having been required, and ordered to be taken, on the question of order—

Mr. WEBSTER suggested that it could hardly be expected that, if a question of this importance, in a constitutional view, was to be gravely decided upon a point of order, it could be so without some discussion. This discussion, he thought, might well be avoided, at present, by the gentleman's withdrawing his bill, or modifying it so as to take out the feature excepted to.

The VICE PRESIDENT said that the bill might be withdrawn by the gentleman who introduced it, with the unanimous consent of the Senate, but not otherwise.

Mr. BENTON then asked leave to withdraw the bill.

No objection being made, the bill was withdrawn by Mr. BENTON from the table of the Senate.

SATURDAY, MARCH 6, 1830.

The Senate was chiefly occupied this day in discussing some provisions of the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1830.

MONDAY, MARCH 8, 1830.

GEORGIA AND THE CHEROKEES.

Mr. FORSYTH made the following motion; in doing which he said that he considered the documents therein referred to necessary to a full examination of the question concerning the laws of Georgia and the Indian tribes residing within that State:

"That the remonstrance of the State of Georgia against treaties previously formed by the United States with the Indians in that State, and against the intercourse law of 1796; and the report of the House of Representatives of Georgia, of the 11th February, 1786, be printed."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN moved an amendment, the object of which was to include also the laws of Georgia, recently passed, extending jurisdiction over the Cherokee Indians.

The PRESIDENT observed that he was informed by the Secretary that these laws were not on the files of the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said he supposed that the Secretary could obtain them.

Mr. FORSYTH said he had no objection that the laws of Georgia should be printed, but he presumed that all the laws of all the States having relation to the same subject, ought also to be printed. He said he would accept the proposition of the gentleman from New Jersey as a modification of his resolution, if the objects of it were extended so that it should embrace the laws of all the States in which Indians have resided, concerning their relations.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said that this amendment would cause too much delay. To wait till the Secretary had procured and printed all these laws would be to wait till the session of Congress had closed. The only tendency, then, of this proposition, would be to defeat the object he had in view. It appeared strange, that, when a question is to be discussed in relation to the laws of Georgia, the materials which are deemed necessary for that discussion will not be given to us. It cannot, [said Mr. F.] be disguised, nor denied, that the principal question we have to decide, is in relation to the right of Georgia to legislate as she has done. If that question is settled, all will be at an end: but until that question is settled, how are we to decide on the right of Georgia to pass those laws? How can we decide on their policy or expediency, until these laws are before us? How are we to illustrate the issue between this nation and the State of Georgia and the Cherokees, without the laws of Georgia, which materially belong to it? And how will that issue be illustrated by the laws of Delaware, Maine, New Hampshire, or of any other State? If gentlemen wish to have the laws of the other States, he, [Mr. F.] had no objection; but he wanted to see the laws of Georgia, to assist him in the argument which this important question will necessarily bring on; and he hoped that the Secretary would be able to furnish them. Some time ago, [said Mr. F.] I moved a resolution that the Secretary of War furnish information to the Senate, stating the progress which certain Indian tribes had made in the mechanic arts, their advance to a state of civilization, and their condition as regards agriculture, &c. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FORSYTH] then moved an amendment to the resolution I offered, and I objected to it, because it tended to defeat the object I had in view. I wanted information to aid me in a due investigation into the situation of the tribes of Indians particularly claiming our consideration; but the resolution as amended embraced all the Indians in the several States. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia prevailed, and the Secretary of War was thus asked to give information as to all the Indians within the United States. I have now waited seven weeks for this information, and, as far as I know, we are no nearer it now than we were when the resolution passed. So it will be with this resolution, if its objects are made as comprehensive as the gentleman's amendment proposes. Why branch out this resolution, when the question which we have to consider refers simply to the right of Georgia to legislate as she has done? Why embarrass it with asking for the printing of all the laws of the States relating to the Indians, from the commencement of this Government? My object is to bring the legislation of Georgia towards the Cherokees to the view of the Senate, to enable me to decide the issue between them. Will the laws of other States [Mr. F. asked] give us any assistance in deciding this issue? The laws of New York, of Massachusetts, or Rhode Island, or of any other State, [he said] had no connexion whatever with, or any relation to, the question the Senate is called upon to discuss. Mr. F. hoped the Senate would keep the call for the laws of the several States, if they desired to have them, separate from his proposition, which could be accomplished in a week, whereas that of the gentleman from Georgia would produce much delay.

Mr. FORSYTH, in reply, stated, that the first objection of the gentleman to his amendment was, that the postponement of the information which it would cause, would be so long as to render it useless. He supposed [said Mr. F.] that it will be necessary to make an extensive search, and to print volumes before the information can be laid before the Senate. Having examined this subject attentively, I can assure the gentleman that the information can be procured without the delay he anticipates, and that the printing of it will not occupy more than ninety pages, as a friend of his in the other House, after a minute examination, had estimated. It can be had in proper time also. But the gentleman says that such information is not necessary, and that the laws of Georgia only are required. What was the question to be considered? The gentleman has said it was as to the right of Georgia to legislate, in the exercise of jurisdiction, over the Indian tribes residing within her limits. Are the laws of Georgia alone important to a due consideration of this question? The gentleman talks of the policy, of the expediency, and of the humanity, of these laws extending jurisdiction over the Indians? Were these questions to be submitted to the Senate when the right of the State to legislate in this matter was admitted? If the right is in Georgia to pass these laws, the manner of executing them is not to be discussed here. The Senate—the Congress of the United States—is not the place where the State of Georgia is to be arraigned for the exercise of her admitted rights. But, if the question is to be debated here as to the policy, the expediency, and the humanity of her laws, and those laws are therefore to be called for, why not include also the laws of other States? Is any difference to be made between Georgia and Alabama, Georgia and Mississippi, Georgia and Massachusetts, or any other States? The right exercised by Georgia, we claim she has a power to exercise; and when a question as to this right is made, we will appeal to our sister States, and demand to be judged by their acts. And when the manner in which the laws have been executed is questioned, we will appeal to the same examples, and will show that we have acted towards the Indians with more humanity—more justly, more kindly, and more generously, than any of them. Mississippi has been more generous than any of the States, for she has extended to the Indians all the rights of citizenship. But, with this exception, Georgia has been more just, more humane, and generous, in her policy towards the Indians, than any State of the Union, whether in the East, in the North, in the South, or in the West. If I am willing to gratify the gentleman from New Jersey, why does he refuse to consent also to the printing of the laws I propose? The gentleman says, the question to be discussed here is confined to the Cherokees, Georgia, and the United States. I think differently: I think it involves the case of all the Indians residing in all the States, however small or large their numbers may be.

The gentleman [said Mr. F.] alludes to a resolution he offered some time ago, and to the decision of the Senate on it, and on the amendment I offered to it. He complains that the information desired has not been presented to us, and has not arrived in time to suit his purpose. Was the amendment I offered the cause of this delay? The gentleman asked for information respecting the condition of the Cherokee Indians, who are at least six hundred miles distant from us. Suppose the information he sought for was not in the department to which he applied, where could it be found but among the Cherokees? And from whom could it be procured unless from the agents of the Government who reside amongst them? Some time must, therefore, necessarily be occupied in transmitting it to us, and he hoped the information would be had in proper time to enable us to use it to the best advantage. As to the laws of Georgia which are wanted, the only advantage they can be of, will be, to afford gentlemen an opportunity to address themselves to the passions and prejudices of members of the Senate, and of the people out of it. They can be used with effect for such a purpose, and this I anticipated when the subject was first agitated. Therefore, I wish to be put in possession of materials to repel the insinuations, should any be made, against the conduct of the State of Georgia. The gentleman can have the laws of Georgia for his own use without this resolution, but if he wishes to be supplied with them in the more formal manner, I am perfectly willing, provided they alone are not singled out for the theme of his investigation. All we ask is a fair development of the subject, and a full examination of its details; and then the decision of this branch of the Legislature and of the other will not fail to be satisfactory to the people of the United States, as well as of the State of Georgia.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN said that, so far as respected the anticipations of the gentleman that the laws of Georgia would be made a theme for enlisting the prejudices or exciting the passions of any one, he hoped the gentleman would be disappointed, and, [said he] as to the manner in which he supposes I intend to use them, I know he will be disappointed. If the interests of the Indian tribes are not to be protected but by the aid of the prejudices and passions of the Senate, and of the people out of the Senate, I hope their interests will fail. If nothing addressed to the honest understandings of the Senate and of the people will produce a conviction of the rights of the Indians in this question, I hope their rights will fail to be sustained. I disclaim [said Mr. F.] the aid of all such arguments, and I cannot but express my surprise at the anticipations of the honorable Senator. I hope that the rights of the Indians will be fully and fearlessly examined on this floor. I know they are but a poor and feeble people, and that the State of Georgia is a great State. But, poor and feeble as they are, I will raise my voice in support of whatever may appear to be their just rights. It is for the reasons I have stated before, that I wish to have the laws of Georgia printed which have produced the excitement throughout the country, and the discrepancies between the departments of Government, of which we have had evidence. It is said, if Georgia possesses the right to legislate on this subject, we have no occasion to look at her laws. For aught that appears, it may be as the gentleman maintains, that Georgia has afforded the Indians within her territory more protection than any other State. The gentleman says she has been more humane in her policy, and more conciliating in her conduct towards them than any of her sister States. If so, let us [said Mr. F.] have the proof. Let us see her laws, and we will be the better enabled to speak of her generosity.

Public rumor has informed us that Georgia has acted unkindly towards the Indians, and it is said that the law which has been passed concerning them, and which has produced so great an excitement, will go into operation on the 1st of June, 1830. We are called upon to decide the right of Georgia to pass such a law. Rumor, I have long learnt to know, has a thousand tongues, not one of which may report the truth; and it may be, so far from these reports being true, that the laws of Georgia actually afford that protection and kindness to the Indians which the gentleman claims for them. Grant [said Mr. F.] the simple abstract right of Georgia to legislate over all her citizens, and to extend her jurisdiction over the Cherokees, yet what can this avail, if, as rumor speaks, she does, in exercising it, come in direct collision with treaties made between the Cherokees and the United States? Why, then, embarrass the amendment I have proposed for obtaining information on this very point, by encumbering it with all the laws of all the other States relating to the Indians? The gentleman asks, why not include the laws of Alabama, &c. in the amendment? It is because neither Alabama, nor any of the other States, has passed a law which will go into operation next June, and which has been the cause of so great an excitement as the law of Georgia which is in question. All I want, then, is the law of Georgia; and if gentlemen wish to have other laws, which will occupy eighty or ninety printed pages, and take some time to collect, let them make a distinct proposition for them. I do not wish that a resolution calling for information, directly connected with the scene in which this question originated, should be embarrassed with extraneous inquiries. As to the resolution I heretofore offered, and the delay of the information it called for, which the gentleman has attempted to explain the cause of, by stating that it had to be obtained at a distance of six hundred miles from this, I would ask him whether the amendment he then offered tended to expedite it. If the information was to be procured from a source six hundred miles distant in one direction, would a proposition tend to accelerate it which required additional information from Maine, Rhode Island, &c. a thousand miles of distance in an opposite direction? Mr. F. trusted that his amendment would meet the views of the Senate, and that the laws of Georgia, which are to undergo consideration here, and which have produced an excitement throughout the country, would be furnished for the information of the Senate.

MARCH 9 TO 15. Heirs of Robert Fulton.—Louisville and Portland Canal.—Mr. Foot's Resolution.

[SENATE.]

The question was then taken on Mr. FORSYTH'S amendment to the amendment of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, and agreed to—21 to 20.

The question on the amendment to the resolution as amended, was then put, and decided in the affirmative; and the resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

TUESDAY, MARCH 9, 1830.

On motion of Mr. LIVINGSTON, the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution heretofore offered by Mr. FOOT, and Mr. L. addressed the Senate till 3 o'clock, when he gave way for a motion to adjourn.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 10, 1830.

The Senate were this day principally occupied in the consideration of Executive business.

THURSDAY, MARCH 11, 1830.

HEIRS OF ROBERT FULTON.

The bill to recompense the heirs of Robert Fulton, deceased, was read the third time.

The question being on the passage of this bill, which proposed the grant of a township of land to the heirs of Robert Fulton, in consideration of benefits rendered by him to the country, the yeas and nays thereon were required by Mr. FORSYTH, with the view that the decision, involving a question of much importance on constitutional grounds, should be a solemn one.

Whereupon arose a debate of much interest, and, in a constitutional view, of much importance. The gentlemen who engaged in the debate, were, Mr. FORSYTH, Mr. LIVINGSTON, Mr. BROWN, Mr. BARTON, Mr. TAZEWELL, Mr. SMITH, of Md. Mr. JOHNSTON, of Lou. Mr. HAYNE, Mr. SMITH, of S. C. Mr. SANFORD, and Mr. NOBLE.

The question being finally taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, it was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barton, Chambers, Dudley, Johnston, Knight, Livingston, Robbins, Sanford, Willey—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Barnard, Bell, Benton, Brown, Burnet, Chase, Dickerson, Ellis, Foot, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Grundy Hayne, Hendricks, Holmes, Iredell, Kane, King, McKinley, McLean, Marks, Naudain, Noble, Ruggles, Seymour, Smith, of S. C. Sprague, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, White, Woodbury—33.

So the bill was rejected.

FRIDAY, MARCH 12, 1830.

LOUISVILLE AND PORTLAND CANAL.

The bill to authorize a subscription of stock on the part of the United States, in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, was taken up, and, after considerable debate, in which the bill was advocated by Messrs. HENDRICKS, JOHNSTON, and ROWAN, and was opposed by Messrs. TAZEWELL and HAYNE, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Barnard, Barton, Benton, Burnet, Chambers, Chase, Dudley, Foot, Grundy, Hendricks, Johnston, Kane, Livingston, McLean, Marks, Naudain, Robbins, Rowan, Ruggles, Seymour, Silsbee, Smith, of Md. Willey—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bell, Brown, Dickerson, Ellis, Forsyth, Frelinghuysen, Hayne, Holmes, Iredell, Knight, Smith, of S. C. Sprague, Tazewell, Troup, Tyler, White, Woodbury—18.

[The bill directed an additional subscription, on the part of the United States, to the stock of the company, for one thousand shares, at one hundred dollars each.]

Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, MARCH 15, 1830.

MR. FOOT'S RESOLUTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by Mr. FOOT; when Mr. LIVINGSTON concluded his speech, commenced on the 9th instant.

[The following is a full report of it.]

The important topics that have been presented to our consideration, [said Mr. L.] and the ability with which the questions arising out of them have been hitherto discussed, cannot but have excited a very considerable interest; which I regret exceedingly that I shall be obliged to interrupt, and greatly disappoint those who look for a continuance of "the popular harangue, the tart reply, the logic, and the wisdom, and the wit," with which we have been entertained. For, sir, you can expect nothing from me but a very plain, and, I fear, a very dull exposition of my views on some of the subjects comprised in this excursive debate, unembellished by eloquence, unseasoned by the pungency of personal allusions. For I have no accusations to make of sectional hostility to the State I represent, and, of consequence, no recriminations to urge in its behalf, no personal animosity to indulge, and but one—yes, sir, I have one personal defence to make; a necessary defence against a grave accusation; but that will be as moderate as I know it will be complete, satisfactory, and, I had almost said, triumphant.

The multiplicity and nature of the subjects that have been considered in debating a resolution with which none of them seem to have the slightest connexion, and the addition of new subjects, with which every speaker has thought it proper to increase the former stock, has given me, I confess, some uneasiness. I feared an irruption of the Cherokees, and was not without apprehensions that we should be called on to terminate the question of Sunday mails, or, if the Anti-Masonic Convention should take offence at the secrecy of our executive session, or insist on the expulsion of all the initiated from our councils, that we should be obliged to contend with them for our seats. Indeed, I had myself serious thoughts of introducing the reformation of our national code, and a plan for the gradual increase of the navy, and am not yet quite decided whether, before I sit down, I shall not urge the abolition of capital punishments. In truth, the whole brought forcibly to my recollection an anecdote told in one of the numerous memoirs written during the reign of Louis XIV. too trivial, perhaps, to be introduced into this grave debate, but which, perhaps, may be excused. A young lady had been educated in all the learning of the times, and her progress had been so much to the satisfaction of the princess who had directed her studies, that, on her first introduction, her patroness used to address her thus: "Come, Miss, discourse with these ladies and gentlemen on the subject of theology. So, that will do. Now talk of geography; after that, you will converse on the subjects of astronomy and metaphysics, and then give your ideas on logic and the belle lettres." And thus the poor girl, to her great annoyance, and the greater of her auditors, was put through the whole circle of the sciences in which she had been instructed. Sir, might not a hearer of our debates, for some days past, have concluded that we, too, had been directed in a similar way, and that you had said to each of the speakers, "Sir, please to rise and speak on the disposition of the public lands; after that you may talk of the tariff; let us know all you think on the subject of internal improvement; and before you sit down, discuss the powers of the Senate in relation to appointments, and the right of a State to secede from the Union; and finish by letting us know whether you approve or oppose the measures of the present or the six preceding administrations." The approximation, sir, of so many heterogeneous materials for discussion, must provoke a smile; and most of those who have addressed you, while they lamented that subjects unconnected with the resolution had been introduced into debate, rarely sat down without adding to the number. For my own part, I think the discussion may be turned to useful purposes. It may, by the interchange of opinion, increase our own information on all the important points which have been examined, while, not being called on for a vote, we may weigh them at leisure, and come to a conclusion, without being influenced by the warmth of debate. The publication of what has been said will spread useful information on topics highly proper to be understood in the community at large.

The recurrence which has necessarily been had to first principles is of incalculable use. The nature, form, history, and changes of our Government, imperceptible or disregarded at the time of their occurrence, are remarked; abuses are pointed out; and the people are brought to reflect on the past and provide for the future.

It affords a favorable opportunity, by explanations that would not otherwise have been made, to remove prejudice and doubts as to political character and conduct. For instance, sir, it has already produced one which I consider very important. The Senator from Massachusetts, who so eloquently engaged the attention of his auditors in the beginning of the debate, took that occasion to disavow any connexion with the Hartford Convention; to declare, in unequivocal terms, that he "had nothing to do with the Hartford Convention." Sir, I heard this explicit declaration with great pleasure, because, on my arrival here as a member of the other House, in which I first had the satisfaction of being acquainted, and associating with that Senator, I received an impression (from whom, or how, or where, it would be impossible for me now to tell) that, although not a member of that convention, he had, in some sort, favored, promoted, or approved of its meeting; and, being only on such terms of social intercourse as one gentleman has with another, without that intimacy which would have justified my making a personal inquiry, I remained in doubt on the subject. It gave me, therefore, I repeat, great satisfaction to hear a declaration which has so completely eradicated every suspicion that the Senator from Massachusetts lent his countenance to that injudicious, ill-timed, and dangerous measure, to which others have given stronger epithets of disapprobation, and which were probably not unmerited. Sir, I happen to know something, not of the proceedings or views of that body, but of the effect its existence had in encouraging our enemy in exciting hopes of disunion, nay, of disgraceful adherence to their cause. While these worthy citizens were occupied in deliberating on the plans, whatever they were, which drew them together in the East; while they, and others associated with them in party feeling, were devising means of putting an end to the war, by vilifying those who declared, and detracting from the merit of those who conducted it; by opposing every measure for prosecuting it with vigor, and obstructing our means of defence; by denouncing the war itself as unjust, and the gallant exploits of our army and navy as unfit subjects for rejoicing; while these men were thus employed at one extremity of the Union, others were differently engaged at the other. A small but gallant band, directed by their heroic leader, were striving also to put an end to the war, but by far different means—by means of brave, uncompromising, uncalculating resistance; their attacks were made upon the enemies of their country, not upon its Government; among them were militiamen, who, without any constitutional scruples about passing the boundary of their State, had marched more than a thousand miles beyond those boundaries in search of the enemy. They found him, and glorious victory at the same moment. Joined to my brave constituents, they gave a most signal defeat to more than three times their number, and signalized the close of the war by an action in itself capable of putting an end to the contest. Immediately after this great event, I was sent on a mission to the British fleet. Circumstances protracted my stay on board the admiral's ship for several days; during which, having been formerly acquainted with an officer high in command, I discovered, not only from his conversation, but that of almost all the officers, that the utmost reliance was placed on the Hartford Convention, for effecting a dissolution of the Union, and the neutrality of New England. I have no evidence that these hopes and expectations were derived from any communication with any member of that body; but I know that the enemy were, as must naturally have been the case, encouraged by the appearance of division which that meeting was calculated to produce. It was made the topic of conversation as often as civility to me would allow, and was never referred to but with an ill-concealed triumph. An assembly, on whose deliberations were founded such insolent expectations, so injurious to the patriotism and integrity of a part of my country, whose inhabitants I had always been taught to respect—such an assembly could not but have raised the most unfavorable impressions of its object; and the suspicion of having favored or promoted its meeting, necessarily derogated from the high opinion which might otherwise have been entertained of the discretion or patriotism of any one to whom it attached.

As this debate has offered an occasion of making the disavowal to which I refer, so, if it should (as I sincerely hope it may) produce a similar disclaimer of that construction of the constitution which assumes an uncontrolled power, under the general expression of providing for the general welfare, it will completely annihilate one of the most dangerous party dogmas, and verify what has been so frequently said, that federalism was extinct; and, on the other hand, an open avowal of that doctrine will put us on our guard against its operation; so that the frank interchange of sentiment that may be expected, must, in every view, be beneficial.

Yet, Sir, I should, notwithstanding these ideas of the utility of the debate, have taken no part in it but for these considerations:

The importance of the subject of the resolution to the State I represent;

The appeals that have been made to my recollection in the course of the discussion;

And the necessity of repelling a charge implicating me, and others with whom I acted, in a charge of hostility to the Father of his Country.

The original resolution, now completely abandoned, and only incidentally referred to, must form a prominent figure in the observations I shall address to the Senate. The subject it involves is one of deep interest to my State; and the policy of the General Government with respect to its public land within our boundaries, shall be freely canvassed. Representing, with my worthy colleague, the interests of that State, I should betray those interests were I not to seize this favorable opportunity of making known the true situation of our claims on the justice of the Union. I confine myself to my own State; the others are too ably represented to need my aid. Some gentlemen have thought that they could trace the measures of which they complain to particular sections of the Union, and I must not be understood as censuring this course. Though I do not think it necessary for me, others, who undoubtedly understand this subject better than I do, think that it is so for them. It is not for me to blame them.

My friend from Missouri has, with his characteristic diligence, collected a mass of evidence on this subject, which is, perhaps conclusive; but this it does not suit my purpose to examine; I will not attempt any such research. The measures of which I shall complain are those of the nation. I should bewilder myself, do injustice to others, and cause useless irritation, were I to seek, in old journals or forgotten documents, for the names of those who voted for or against the measures of which I am forced to complain, or try to discover what river or what geographical line divided them. All those votes, I am bound to believe, were given from proper motives, though from erroneous views. I feel no sectional or personal hostility, and will endeavor to excite none. In avowing this course, I am far from arraigning that which some of my friends have pursued; they are the best judges of their own griefs, and the best mode of redressing them. For my own part, I repeat, that all of which I shall complain are the acts and omissions of the whole Government: and I state them, only because I hope and believe that, when they shall be fully known, compensation for injuries and injurious omissions will be offered, and all stipulations faithfully performed.

Louisiana was ceded by France to the United States in 1803. By the treaty of cession the United States acquired all the vacant lands within the province, and the sovereignty over it; but under the following conditions:

To maintain the inhabitants in the enjoyment of their property;

To admit them, as soon as possible, into the Union, according to the principles of the Federal constitution.

Neither of these conditions have been faithfully performed according to the spirit of the stipulation.

To maintain the inhabitants in the enjoyment of their property, it was essential that all disputed claims to it should be submitted to the decision of a court, whether such claims were made by individuals or the Government. Yet all the titles disallowed by the Government were directed to be decided by commissioners of its own choosing, holding their offices at the will of the President. This was not only doing injustice to us, but was an infringement on the constitutional distribution of power, by which the judicial functions of the United States are vested in a supreme and inferior courts, of which the judges are to hold their offices during good behavior, who are to take cognizance of all controversies to which the United States are parties, and from the decisions of the latter of which an appeal lies to the former. Now, no one can deny that, to decide on the validity of a title to land, is a judicial function; that the United States are parties to all the controversies in relation to their titles to public lands; and that commissioners are not such judges as are intended by the constitution. Yet, sir, you refuse to give us the enjoyment of two millions and more of acres, claimed by citizens of my State, under perfect grants, made by the former sovereigns of the province, because your commissioners, under the instructions of an Executive department, have refused to ratify them. Year after year, for more than twenty years, they have petitioned for their right under the treaty, or for a judicial inquiry into their title; year after year you have refused this just and reasonable demand. You have partially granted it to the adjoining States and Territory of Missouri, Alabama, and Arkansas, but have pertinaciously, unjustly, and cruelly, refused it to us. We have, also, in common with the adjoining States of Missouri, Mississippi, and Alabama, (all in part or in the whole taken out of the territory ceded by treaty) been deprived of the benefits of the judiciary system of the United States. Lives and fortunes submitted to the legal decision of a single man: Lives without appeal—fortunes, under two thousand dollars, without appeal. Both, in my opinion, have been more than once illegally sacrificed to this cruel neglect of our rights.

To understand the next grievance of which I complain, the attention of the Senate must be drawn to the topographical features of the country, as well as its statistics and geographical position. In the short distance of four degrees of latitude, the extent of this State on one side of the Mississippi, and two on the other, that river, by its meandering course, and the division of its waters by the Delta, presents banks of near fifteen hundred miles on both sides—the other rivers falling into it nearly as much more. All these are subject to annual inundation; and, in the whole alluvial soil, the banks of the river are the highest ground, which descends on an inclined plane to the level of the ocean. It follows, from this configuration, that the banks of the river must be secured by dikes, or that the whole of the alluvial country must be submerged, during every annual rise of the river. The construction of these dikes was a duty imposed on the first settlers of the province, as a condition of their grants; and this mighty river, encased in high and solid embankments, for nearly two hundred miles of its course, attests how faithfully this condition was fulfilled—a wonderful work, when compared with the slender population by which it was effected. By the terms of the cession, the United States became the proprietor of all the vacant lands; but they have not considered themselves liable to any of the duties that would have attached to the property, had it been in private hands; they expressly exempt themselves, and even those to whom they may sell, during five years, from taxes, or any contribution to Government; and, practically, have refused to make any of the improvements necessary, not only for reclaiming their own lands, but for protecting their inhabitants from the effects of the inundations which have been described; and, in numerous instances, parishes have been obliged, in their own defence, to perform this expensive operation for you. Now, sir, the State contains thirty-six millions of acres, of which your commissioners have confirmed, and you have granted and sold, only five millions; so that you now own six-sevenths of the whole State. That one-seventh, which is in private hands, supports a population of more than two hundred thousand souls, and raises an agricultural produce, beyond its own consumption, of eight millions of dollars. Yet, with this evident advantage, resulting from a settlement of the old titles, and the sale of the lands in the State, which, at the same rate, would give a population of more than a million, and an export nearly equal to that of all the rest of the States, you have only sold two hundred and fifty thousand acres of the public land; and you refuse to try, or to allow just claims to the amount of two millions more; so that, with the richest soil in the world, we are condemned to a scanty population, and to see the owners of six-sevenths of our soil refusing to contribute to the expenses of our Government, forcing us to defend their property, as well as ours, from destructive inundations, and more destructive invasions, and for more than a quarter of a century, by delaying the disposition of the lands, breaking that which I shall prove was the most important condition on which they received the country.

That condition was not only security for property, but “that the inhabitants should be incorporated in the Union, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal constitution;” that is to say, that the country should be erected into a State, as soon as it could be done, according to the principles of the constitution; but there was no principle to oppose its being done instantly. Yet, notwithstanding the most spirited remonstrance, made in the first year after the cession, a remonstrance now on your files, and which testifies, not only the desire to enjoy the privilege, but shows the ability to exercise it, you kept them in the subordinate grade of a territory for more than eight years, and you lopped off the greater part of the province, out of which, without their consent, you have made an extensive territory, and a more extensive State. It is true, sir, that, at this late period, you brought Louisiana into the Union; you assigned their boundaries; you approved of their constitution; and you admitted their Senators and Representatives into the councils of the nation. But is this all that is necessarily implied by the ob-
